PREFACE

TO THE

FIRST EDITION.

THE advantages which learning has received, from the invention of Printing, are doubtleſs very great: but by extending the dominion of knowledge ſo much beyond its former limits, there was a neceſſity introduced of compiling ſuch general collections, as are now frequent under the names of BIBLIOTHECS, LEXICONS, DICTIONARIES, &c. We do not mean for the bare interpretation of words, for ſuch were always common; but for the explanation of things, of which, indeed, there want not ſome examples among the Antients, but none that bear a very near reſemblance to thoſe in uſe among the Moderns. For the ſtate of literature in different ages makes different methods, and different inſtruments, requiſite for its attainment, in contriving of which, able men become great benefactors to the Republic of Letters.

By degrees, however, the number of books of this ſort have increaſed to ſuch a height, as to be in danger of loſing their utility; which evil was no ſooner perceived, than ſome active and induſtrious men endeavoured to correct it, by applying the ſame remedy, in reſpect to theſe collections, which their authors pretended to have uſed, with regard to the multitude of books written on the ſubjects their collections referred to. Thus, inſtead of Geographical, Poetical, or Hiſtorical Dictionaries, ſeparately; they ſtudied to give us all theſe in ONE. A great and uſeful deſign indeed, but much more eaſily conceived than executed; and the bare attempting to execute it, brought in a new kind of writing on this ſubject: for beſides Hiſtorical, which is become a very extenſive term, we very ſoon found, that, in the opinion of the learned, Critical Dictionaries were alſo neceſſary.

We have already of each, and of all theſe kinds in our language, either originals or tranſlations, and yet we preſume to hope for the favour of the public, in regard to a new work of this ſort, which we now preſent to the world, as in ſome meaſure more perfect than any hitherto publiſhed; the ſeeming boldneſs of which expreſſion will be taken off, if the reader conſiders, that it is the only reaſonable motive which could induce us to undertake, or him to approve, it. But as we cannot expect to be believed upon a bare aſſertion, we ſhall in this Preface, give a ſuccinct account of the origin, improvements, and cenſures of Hiſtorical Dictionaries, in order to ſhew on what grounds we judged this work to be neceſſary. We ſhall next explain the nature of this deſign, and thereby render it evident, that it differs from, and comprehends more, than any of this kind extant: And laſtly, we will take the liberty of pointing out ſome of the uſes to which it may be applied, and from whence it will appear highly requiſite and uſeful to the ſtudy of Britiſh Hiſtory.

I. The firſt Hiſtorical Dictionary, or rather the firſt attempt in that way, was the work of our learned and induſtrious countryman NICHOLAS LLOYD (a), Fellow of Wadham-college in Oxford, who ſpent thirty years in compiling it. Some indeed conſider GESNER's (b) work in this light, and conſequently the abridgments of it; and others the Dictionary of CHARLES STEPHENS, from the materials collected by ROBERT STEPHENS his father (c). But whoever conſiders and compares the work of Mr. LLOYD with theſe, will ſee it is a very different thing, and built upon a much broader foundation. To ſay the truth, if we regard the author's intention, we ſhall find this a very perfect and excellent work, and when we call it an attempt, we mean no more, than that the author confined his views to a part only, of what has been ſince conſidered as the ſubject of an Hiſtorical Dictionary; and not at all as an inſinuation of his not coming up to what he promiſed; for it had been happy, as well for the public as for themſelves, if thoſe who extended his plan had ſucceeded as well.

(a) The title of his book was, Dictionarium Hiſtoricum, Geographicum, Poeticum, Gentium, Hominum, Deorum, Gentilitium, Regionum, Inſularum, Locorum, Civitatum, &c. ad Sacras & Profanas Hiſtorias Poetarumque fabulas intelligendas neceſſaria, Nomina, quo decet ordine, Complectens & Illuſtrans, &c. Oxon. fol. 1670. It was printed again with great additions at London, 1686, folio.

(b) The title of Geſner's book was, Bibliotheca Univerſalis, ſive Catalogus omnium Scriptorum locupletiſſimus, &c. Tiguri 1545, in folio. Abridged by Lycoſthenes, Simler, and Friſius.

(c) Publiſhed in 1596, in 4to. afterwards in 1621, 1628, 1633.

We ſtand indebted for the ſcheme of an Hiſtorical Dictionary, in its utmoſt extent, to a French Eccleſiaſtic, LEWIS MORERI, who formed it before he was twenty-five years of age, and executed it before he was thirty (d). The public has certainly great obligations to him on this account, and though he has been cenſured ſeverely for daring beyond his ſtrength, yet his name will live as long as his book, which is ſtill in great vigour, and perhaps after all, he has been blamed with very little reaſon. As ſoon as he had taken orders, he was ſent to Lyons, with directions to preach on the points controverted between Papiſts and Proteſtants; and finding that this required an extenſive knowledge of Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, he compoſed for his private uſe a Common-Place Book, which at the inſtance of his friends he ranged in alphabetic order, and ſent it abroad in one volume in folio, in 1674, with the title of An Hiſtorical Dictionary, or a Miſcellany of Sacred and Prophane Learning.

(d) See the Preface to the Baſle edition of 1731.

It will immediately occur to the candid and ingenuous reader, that there was nothing of vanity or ſelf-conceit in this proceeding. The method he took was very agreeable to his purpoſe, and when converted into a Dictionary, if it proved defective, he was amongſt the firſt who diſcovered and became ſenſible of its defects. He thought himſelf obliged alſo to remove them, and his application to this was ſo aſſiduous, that it brought him into a kind of decay, which wore him away gradually, ſo that he died while his book was printing a ſecond time (e), with the addition of another volume, which however appeared in 1681, by the care of the Sieur Perayre, who was Under-Secretary to M. Pompone, Miniſter of State, with whom Moreri had alſo lived ſome time as his Chaplain, but quitted his houſe, that he might attend more cloſely to his Dictionary.

If we were to judge univerſally of the value of works by the number of impreſſions, there are very few that will ſtand in rank ſuperior to this of Moreri, as may be diſcerned by the following account of its editions. I. At Lyons, 1674, in folio. II. At Paris, (though begun at Lyons) by the Sieur Perayre, and dedicated by him to the King, in two volumes, 1681. III. At Paris, printed exactly from the ſecond, 1683, in two volumes. IV. At Paris, 1687, in two volumes. V. At Lyons, 1688, in two volumes, with ſome additional articles. VI. At Amſterdam, 1691, by the celebrated M. le Clerc, in four volumes, taking in the Supplement printed at Paris as a third volume, in 1689. VII. At Amſterdam, nearly a copy of the former, 1694, in four volumes. VIII. At Amſterdam, without any conſiderable alterations, 1698. IX. At Paris, by the care of M. Vaultier, 1699, in four volumes. X. At Amſterdam, by the care of M. le Clerc, 1702, in four volumes. XI. At Paris, by M. Vaultier, with large augmentations, 1704, in four volumes. XII. At Paris, by the ſame editor, 1707, in four volumes. XIII. At Paris, by the care of M. du Pin, 1712, in five volumes. In 1714, they printed a Supplement in one large volume at Paris, and in 1716, by the care of M. Bernard, at Amſterdam, a Supplement in two volumes, folio. XIV. At Paris, 1718, in five volumes. XV. At Paris, by the care of ſeveral eminent perſons, 1724, in ſix volumes. XVI. At Baſle in Switzerland, 1731, in ſix volumes. XVII. At Paris, 1732, in ſix volumes. XVIII. At Amſterdam, 1740, in eight volumes.

This was tranſlated into Engliſh in 1694, but very indifferently. It was ſent abroad again by Mr. Jeremy Collier, and to this there have been ſeveral Supplements added. It has been alſo tranſlated into German more than once, and into Low-Dutch, but whether the Sclavonian verſion, which was intended by the late Czar Peter I. who employed ſeveral learned perſons therein, was ever finiſhed, is uncertain; nor can we aſſert, whether the Italian tranſlation, for which Propoſals were publiſhed in 1728, ever appeared or not. We may judge, however, from hence, how well the learned world in general was pleaſed with the deſign of this work, how little ſoever ſome critics might be ſatisfied with the execution. The form was the object of cenſure, not the matter; and it was this general approbation, which excited ſo many learned perſons to contribute their endeavours to carry it to the higheſt degree of perfection, an honour that would never have been beſtowed, but upon what was highly valuable in its nature.

Yet this vaſt ſucceſs, inſtead of defending the Hiſtorical Dictionary from, ſeems to have drawn upon it, the reſentment of the critics. The name of the Dictionaire Bourgeois, or the Dictionary of the Vulgar (f), was given at once by way of character and contempt. M. Menage is ſaid to have declared, he would never read it becauſe it abounded with faults, and if he once got them into his head he ſhould, ſhould not eaſily get them out again (g). He was a man of good ſenſe and great learning, and therefore this deciſion of his has been greatly applauded. But might not one aſk without offence, How he came to know that there were abundance of faults in the book without reading it? or whether he could have acquired a tenth part of his learning, if he had conſtantly adhered to this rule, and read no books that were ſaid to have faults in them. M. le Clerc (h) was a fairer judge: he aſſerted that there were many faults in Moreri's Dictionary, he owned that it was impoſſible it ſhould be otherwiſe, he pointed out the principal ſources of thoſe errors, and afterwards, according to thoſe rules, he corrected the book.

(g) Menagiana, p. 27, 28. Tom. i. Amſterdam, 1713.

But when the judgments of the learned and unlearned had been ſufficiently exerciſed upon this ſubject, a great genius undertook to examine it, and promiſed to place it in its true light, by compiling a Dictionary of faults, in which all the miſtakes in Moreri's great work ſhould be corrected as well as expoſed. The public however thought, and that very juſtly, it was much too mean an employment for Mr. Bayle, to compoſe a kind of table of the errata in Moreri's Dictionary, and therefore expreſſed a deſire, that he would rather give them ſomething of that kind which was entirely his own. He acquieſced in this deciſion, and in 1697, publiſhed his Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary, which was received with general approbation by the beſt judges. In the execution of this work, he judged it requiſite to give a plain, clear, ſuccinct detail of facts in the text, and to illuſtrate this by a body of notes, which might ſerve by way of commentary, and give the reader ſatisfaction in thoſe points, that in the text were but barely mentioned, and yet deſerved a particular diſcuſſion.

This method of Bayle's was indubitably a great advantage, and this advantage in the hands of a man of extenſive learning, lively imagination, and happy expreſſion, appeared with all its luſtre. Our language was ſoon enriched with this treaſure, and though the verſion had no very high reputation, yet the excellence of the original gave it ſuch weight, that in a ſhort time the price became exceſſive, and we have ſince ſeen the greateſt eagerneſs in its favour expreſſed by the public, when that work was again tranſlated. By this we may learn with certainty, that the method and expreſſion of Mr. Bayle were as much calculated to inſtruct and to pleaſe, as the deſign of Moreri; and that, by joining theſe, an author might hope to render an Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary perfect; provided ſuch a plan was laid down, as there was a reaſonable proſpect of filling up from authentic materials. This was the rock that Moreri and moſt of his editors ſplit upon. They were for augmenting the number of their articles at all events, though the public complained that many of their articles already were too ſhort, void of authorities, unintereſting, and from theſe faults, altogether inſipid and unpleaſant: whereas Mr. Bayle, confining himſelf to ſuch articles only as he knew were either in themſelves, or could be made by him, entertaining to every reader, left it in the power of none to charge him with haſte, want of judgment, or inaccuracy.

It is not at all difficult, from the conſideration of theſe particulars, to diſcern the cauſes, why notwithſtanding all the pains taken about theſe noble and valuable works, they are both incomplete, and, which is worſe, are likely to remain ſo; every new edition of MORERI, with an increaſe of articles bringing an augmentation of errors, which, as M. LE CLERC long ago very judiciouſly obſerved, is an evil not to be cured, but by the joint labours of learned and induſtrious men in ſeveral countries, ſupported by a royal purſe. The Dutch bookſellers, after the deceaſe of Mr. Bayle, had a project for augmenting his performance, by procuring from the learned in different parts of Europe, ſelect articles for that purpoſe; but it does not appear that they have met with ſucceſs; or if they had, we have reaſon to believe, it would have turned rather to their profit than the advantage of the public, by ſwelling the bulk of that work, and leaving it ſtill incomplete, which, though ſatisfactory enough to them, would ſcarcely pleaſe any body elſe.

But after all, may not ſome method be found, without having recourſe to theſe direct Supplements to MORERI or BAYLE, of compaſſing by degrees, what, by the univerſal voice of the learned world, is declared to be ſo much wanting? Is it not both very poſſible and very practicable, to compile, in the method of Mr. BAYLE, in the ſeveral countries of Europe, complete Bodies of the Perſonal Hiſtories of the great and eminent perſons that have flouriſhed in them? Would not ſuch DICTIONARIES as theſe be, from the nature of this plan, in a great meaſure exempt from thoſe inconveniences, which made both M. LE CLERC, and Mr. BAYLE, deſpair of ſeeing any thing of this kind perfect? Would not the BRITISH, FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, and DUTCH BIOGRAPHIES, compoſe a body of this ſort of Hiſtory, abundantly more correct, and infinitely more uſeful, than any thing that hitherto has, or is hereafter likely to appear, under the form of SUPPLEMENTS to this or that DICTIONARY, undertaken either by one or more learned men in the ſame country, where they muſt be under inſuperable difficulties, both as to the procuring and judging of their materials? And will not ſome honour ariſe, ſome proportion of glory be due to the country, where this deſign, ſo uſeful to learning in general, as well as ſo beneficial to that country itſelf, ſhall be firſt ſet on foot?

II. It was with this view, that the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA was undertaken: it was in order to collect into one Body, without any reſtriction of time or place, profeſſion or condition, the memoirs of ſuch of our countrymen as have been eminent, and by their performances of any kind deſerve to be remembered. We judged that this would be a moſt uſeful ſervice to the Public, a kind of general MONUMENT erected to the moſt deſerving of all ages, an expreſſion of gratitude due to their ſervices, and the moſt probable means of exciting, in ſucceeding times, a ſpirit of emulation, which might prompt men to an imitation of their virtues. This was the firſt and great motive to the attempting ſuch a collection, towards which, indeed, we ſaw there were conſiderable materials ready prepared, though no ſign of any ſuch building's being ever traced, or that there had ever been a thought, either as to the expediency or poſſibility of erecting ſuch a ſtructure; a BRITISH TEMPLE OF HONOUR, ſacred to the piety, learning, valour, public-ſpirit, loyalty, and every other glorious virtue of our anceſtors, and ready alſo for the reception of the WORTHIES of our OWN TIME, and the HEROES of POSTERITY.

We very ſoon ſaw and were apprized of the difficulty of our taſk, and of the ſkill as well as labour neceſſary towards performing it with any degree of elegance and exactneſs. We ſaw that multitudes of Lives were already written, in different manners and from different motives, which varied widely as to almoſt all the facts that are common to them, and which would not admit of any reconciliation. We ſaw that general characters, high-flown panegyricks, or outrageous ſatires, had very frequently appeared under the appellation of Lives, without any regular ſeries of facts, with little or no reſpect to dates, and digeſted rather according to the whim and fancy of the writer, than in obedience to the laws which reaſon, and the practice of the beſt authors have eſtabliſhed, in reference to this kind of writing. We ſaw that moſt general Collections were too ſhort, and that many particular Lives were too prolix, that ſome were trifling, others tedious, and very many ſo careleſsly and incorrectly written, as to be of very little, if of any, ſervice, towards ſuch a work as we propoſed.

But the conſideration of theſe obſtacles, inſtead of diſmaying us, made us the more reſolute. We were far from being inſenſible of the pains we were to take; but at the ſame time, the neceſſity of undertaking them grew more and more apparent: we foreſaw that patience and induſtry were requiſite to ſecure ſucceſs in ſuch a deſign; but we ſaw too, that if this work was long delayed, neither patience nor induſtry would be able to accompliſh it. In this ſituation, the firſt thing to be conſidered was METHOD, and in reſpect to this we were determined to that of BAYLE; not from a blind and ſuperſtitious regard to the veneration the learned world have for his memory, and the high eſteem they profeſs for his excellent performance in this way, but becauſe it appeared to us the moſt natural, eaſy, and comprehenſive, the beſt adapted to our purpoſe, and the moſt likely to give our readers ſatisfaction, and not at all the worſe for his having invented, uſed, and thereby recommended it to the approbation of the learned.

The next thing that claimed our attention was the materials ready prepared, that is to ſay, the Collections already in the hands of the public: of the true value of which, it was neceſſary to form a right idea, to ſelect from them whatever was conducive to our deſign, and carefully to avoid their errors, at the ſame time that we preſerved their excellencies. We were thoroughly ſatisfied, that if we failed in theſe particulars, the public would not heſitate at doing them juſtice at our expence; and, therefore, we were extremely nice in our ſcrutiny; and, as the general remarks we made on this ſubject, in an advertiſement formerly prefixed to the firſt volume, have been very well received by the ableſt judges, we flatter ourſelves, that what we now offer more at large upon the ſame head, will not be diſagreeable, as it leads to ſhew, as well the uſes and value of each of theſe Collections, as the reaſonableneſs, and even the neceſſity of embodying, as we have done, the ſubſtance of theſe ſeparate Collections, with many new Lives, which entered into none of them, in the performance now offered to the world.

We muſt begin (though the work was never publiſhed, and there are but very few MS. copies extant) with the Catalogue compoſed by JOHN BOSTON (i), a Benedictine Monk of the famous monaſtery of St. Edmond's-Bury in Suffolk, in the reign of Henry IV. (not Henry VI., as by the miſtake of the Printer it ſtands in the learned Dr. Gale's (k) Preface) who viſited all the abbies in England, examined their libraries, made an Alphabetical Catalogue of the books they contained, noted the firſt lines, gave a ſuccinct account of the authors, and a ſhort cenſure of their writings, grounded on other mens judgments as well as his own, and very accurately marked in what libraries they were to be met with (l). He it was who gave the firſt example of that method, which ſucceeding writers purſued: but if we may venture to judge from another work of his, not altogether unlike this in its kind (m), he was a more exact, and more conſiderate author, than moſt who have followed him, and therefore we have the more reaſon to complain, that ſo uſeful and curious a treatiſe is ſtill with-held from the Public.

(k) In Præfat. ad XV. Script.

Upon this plan, the celebrated JOHN LELAND, one of the moſt able, and, beyond compariſon, the moſt induſtrious of our Antiquaries, compoſed his admirable Commentaries of Britiſh Writers, in four books, which of all the numerous, I had almoſt ſaid numberleſs works, which for his country's honour he undertook, was by him left moſt perfect. As it now appears, we do not diſcern the diſtinction of books mentioned by various writers, but undoubtedly it is the ſame work they mention, and one of the moſt valuable extant (n). In it our author gives us a Literary Hiſtory of Britain, from the times of the Druids, to the cloſe of the XVth century, with his cenſure of the authors, and ſhort catalogues, written with much learning, and no leſs modeſty. He was Library-Keeper to King Henry VIII., and had from him a licence to examine the libraries of all religious houſes in England, for which purpoſe he took many long and weary journies, purely to collect matter for this, and ſeveral other pieces relating to our Hiſtory and Antiquities, which, had he lived to finiſh, he would have left little for others. But alas! he was firſt prevented by a phrenſy, and before he was perfectly reſtored to his ſenſes, was taken off by death, April 18, 1552 (o), to the irreparable loſs of his country, and of the learned world.

JOHN BALE, a native of Suffolk, and ſome time Biſhop of Oſſory in Ireland, was the next who undertook a work of this nature. The firſt edition, printed moſt part of it at Ipſwich, he publiſhed in 1549 (p), ſome years before Leland died, whoſe work he mentions in his Preface, and tells his readers that it was earneſtly expected, but it does not appear he had then ſeen it, and from ſome other of his writings, it is evident he had not (q). But in his exile on account of religion, he had leiſure to review and augment this work, which came out at Baſil, A. D. 1557, and again, A. D. 1559, in folio, and therein he acknowledges his having borrowed largely from Leland. It would have done great honour to his book, if he had either copied his author exactly, or had imitated his manner, and ſpoken of the authors he mentions with equal decency and temper. But from being a bigotted Papiſt, he became as violent a Proteſtant, and with great bitterneſs reflects upon moſt of thoſe from whom he differed in opinion, and ſuffers his paſſions to tranſport him frequently, not only beyond the bounds of modeſty, but truth. He goes above fifty years lower than Leland, and takes in a great many more authors, even within the compaſs of time common to them both: but he is not either ſo good a judge, or ſo exact a writer as the former. He is very apt to multiply books, and frequently converts the chapters of a book, into diſtinct treatiſes. He had many great helps and opportunities towards compleating his performance, and kept a very extenſive correſpondence for that purpoſe, which enabled him to add abundance of Scots and Iriſh Lives. He had in his own poſſeſſion a large treaſure of MSS. relating to our Hiſtory, and it muſt be owned, there are many things in his book that are not to be found elſewhere: but then he is hardly to be relied on, eſpecially where there is the leaſt room to ſuſpect he might be prejudiced: for there, as we ſhall in many inſtances ſhew, he had little or no command of himſelf, but allowed more to his temper than authorities; for he very ſeldom produces any voucher for what he ſays, though ſometimes he could hardly expect to be believed without it. The very bad uſage he met with from Papiſts

(as the reader may ſee at large in his article) in ſome meaſure may excuſe the man, but cannot at all operate in giving credit to his book.

The next author of this ſort in point of time is JOHN PITS, in every reſpect the oppoſite of JOHN BALE before mentioned (r). He was a Hampſhire man, deſcended from parents in no great circumſtances, his mother being ſiſter to the famous Dr. SANDERS. He was bred while a boy at Wincheſter ſchool, and removed from thence to Oxford, where, after ſtudying two years, he imbibed Popiſh opinions, fled over to Flanders, reſumed his ſtudies at Douay, travelled from thence to Rome, and after receiving Prieſt's orders there, went to France: but troubles ariſing there, he withdrew into Lorrain, thence he went to Ingoldſtadt in Bavaria, where he received his Doctor's degree: after this he returned a ſecond time into Lorrain, and ſoon after left it, to go in quality of Confeſſor to the court of the Dutcheſs of Cleves; and, upon her deceaſe, he returned a third time into Lorrain, where he obtained a Deanery, in poſſeſſion of which he died about 1616 (s). It is evident from this account of his life, that he could not be very well qualified for the work he undertook, and indeed he has executed it very indifferently. He commends LELAND's performance highly, which, except as it is involved in BALE's book, he never ſaw, in the judgment of friends and foes (t). He abuſes BALE plentifully, whoſe work with all its imperfections he copies, and has added to them a multitude of faults of his own making. He brings down his account to 1614, when he finiſhed his book, which however was not publiſhed till 1619, after the author's death; and one reaſon, we are told, for making it public, was to bring BALE's book into diſuſe, by ſupplying the Romaniſts with another work of the ſame nature: and very probably, the preſerving the memories of the exiles of that Church, might be another motive to the rendering it public, which, for its merits in other reſpects, it could ſcarcely have deſerved.

(r) His title-page repreſents this Work as a firſt volume only, but nothing farther was ever publiſhed.

We have a very comprehenſive Catalogue of the SCOTS writers, drawn up by THOMAS DEMPSTER of Mureſk (u), an itinerant Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres, who, after viſiting different parts of Europe, and undertaking the inſtruction of youth at Paris and other places, retired at laſt into Italy, where he compoſed his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Scots Nation, which however is really no more than a haſty Catalogue of Authors, a very ſuperficial account of their lives, and a very imperfect and incorrect detail of their writings. He was undoubtedly very zealous for the honour of his country, which prompted him to give a place in his Catalogue, to many that had no title to it from their writings. He alſo made no ſcruple of borrowing great men from other countries, to make his Collection the more illuſtrious; thus, St. ALBAN, Venerable BEDE, and Pope ADRIAN IV., were all Scots (w), if we truſt to his book. It is this vain humour of his, that has contributed more than any thing elſe to ſink the credit of his performance, which, in other reſpects, is little inferior to BALE's, and much ſuperior to PITS's, for DEMPSTER was truly a man of learning, and, with regard to the Lives of his contemporaries, it ſeems to be a faithful, though not a judicious, Collection. He was a furious Papiſt, lived an exile for his religion, and therefore we may be ſure, he beſtows no very good character on Proteſtant authors. Yet his love for his country ſomewhat qualifies this; and perhaps his book might have been more perfect, if he had lived to put the laſt hand to it, or if it had been ſo much as publiſhed by one of his countrymen: but it had not this good fortune: it was printed at Bononia in 1627, about two years after DEMPSTER's death, by one very affectionate to his memory, but an indifferent editor for all that.

The learned in Ireland have been more fortunate in an Hiſtorian, than either thoſe of England or Scotland: for Sir JAMES WARE (x), a man of ſolid abilities, extenſive knowledge, and indefatigable induſtry, one who had taken vaſt pains in other reſpects, in preſerving and putting into order the Hiſtory of his country, both Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, as alſo its Antiquities, reſolved to extend his care likewiſe to its writers, of whom he publiſhed a very accurate account in 1639, divided into two parts, the firſt containing the natives, the ſecond ſuch learned perſons as though born in other countries, were beneficed and paſſed their days in that iſland. This work has no imperfections, but ſuch as were unavoidable at the time in which it was compoſed, and the worthy author ſpared no labour to correct moſt of theſe in a ſecond edition, which he was actually preparing for the preſs at the time of his deceaſe, in 1666. The world, however, has not been deprived of the great improvements made by him on this ſubject, the contents of which appear to advantage, in the third volume of the Engliſh tranſlation of his Works, very lately publiſhed, publiſhed (y), and which altogether, fully juſtify the compliment paid him by Biſhop NICOLSON, who ſtiles him the CAMDEN of Ireland (z). Had the works hitherto mentioned (LELAND's excepted) been penned like this, they would have been far more uſeful, and we ſhould have been better able to have relied upon them, which now we cannot do, where any other materials lie within our reach. But had theſe books been ever ſo well executed, it is evident they could have ſupplied us only with the Memoirs of Men of Letters, ſo that how uſeful ſoever they might have been in that reſpect, they could not be ſaid to bear any proportion to the advantages propoſed from a book of this kind, which not only comprehends the ſubſtance of all theſe performances, and continues their ſubjects, upon a more extenſive plan, down to our own times, but alſo takes in many other heads equally curious and uſeful, and much more agreeable and entertaining. But to proceed at preſent with the view of our materials.

(y) This Hiſtory of the Iriſh Writers makes the entire third volume of the Tranſlation of Sir James Ware's Writings, by Walter Harris, Eſq; who has continued the Hiſtory to the preſent time.

(z) Iriſh Hiſtorical Library, p. 20.

We have no Collection, which, from its title and plan, promiſes ſo much as FULLER's, who undertook to give us the Worthies of England: but he is far from performing this: his Lives are in effect no more than ſhort characters, interſperſed now and then with remarkable ſtories, which are not always to be depended upon, and there is very little new in him: BALE, FOX, and STOWE, are his principal authors, from whom he takes plentifully in this, as well as in his Church Hiſtory. There are others who have paſſed harſher ſentences on his labours; but our buſineſs is not to decry thoſe who have gone before us, but barely to repreſent how far they are, or are not, helpful towards the filling up this deſign. Dr. FULLER's foundation was broad, but the ſuperſtructure is not anſwerable. We may ſay the ſame of his Church Hiſtory, and of his ABEL Redivivus, all of them proving him to be a fanciful, rather than a faithful, writer, very little concerned about dates or circumſtances; and, if one might be indulged for once in his manner of ſpeaking, rather deſirous of making his readers merry than wiſe. It may be alledged, however, that this was the humour of thoſe times, and that he erred with numbers, which, though an indifferent, is yet ſome excuſe.

As the taſte for this kind of knowledge improved, ſome abler, and more accurate writers began to appear; among whom we may reckon the Oxford Antiquary ANTHONY WOOD, who, after penning with great care and induſtry the Hiſtory and Antiquities of that famous Univerſity, undertook to give us the Writers alſo, for two centuries before, and the Prelates likewiſe who had been bred at Oxford within the ſame ſpace. Some have cenſured this work in very coarſe terms, and without queſtion it is far enough from being perfect: the ſpleen of the author diſcovers itſelf frequently, the compoſition is by no means elegant, and there is an unuſual bluntneſs and aſperity in the language. Yet, with all theſe defects, it is out of compariſon more uſeful and inſtructive than any thing that had appeared before. Authorities are here cited, which are abſolutely wanting in FULLER and LLOYD (another writer of Worthies); and though, from the Tranſcriber or Printer's faults, there are many miſtakes, yet here are dates, and the Lives are ranged in an eaſy and intelligible method; ſo that we may truly affirm, one half of the learned men of this part of the iſland, have their names, the capital particulars of their Lives, and a tolerable catalogue of their writings preſerved, for that period to which his Collections relate. It was once hoped, we ſhould have ſeen like attention ſhewn towards the learned men educated at Cambridge; and had the work been executed as it was deſigned, by the late reverend and excellent Mr. BAKER, it muſt have been a maſterly performance; ſince, with all the care and induſtry of WOOD, he had a fine genius, a piercing underſtanding, and wrote a correct ſtile, equally removed from the ſtarched ſetneſs of a ſententious writer, and from that luxuriancy of language that produces long and languid periods. But beſides all theſe, he had ſtill greater qualities, ſuch as calmneſs of mind, candour of heart, and a moſt unſuſpected integrity. We may juſtly therefore regret the loſs of ſuch a work, from ſuch a man; but as his Collections are ſtill preſerved, we may yet hope to ſee their contents by ſome lucky accident or other. In the mean time Mr. WARD's Lives of the Profeſſors in Greſham-College, may ſerve as a ſpecimen, how ſuch Collections ought to be formed, ſo as to ſtand out of the reach of cenſure.

We might extend theſe remarks much farther, but that in ſome reſpects it would be a needleſs, in others an unpleaſant taſk. The Lives of our POETS have been often, but never well, written: LANGBAIN is too conciſe, and his follower, who pretends to have improved him, has much miſtaken his talent, and done very little honour to thoſe he has attempted to celebrate. We have very few memorials of PHYSICIANS, though ſcarcely any nation has produced better; and as to DIVINES, the greateſt part of their memoirs are rather funeral orations or panegyricks than narratives. Yet ſome ſingle Lives we have, of a moderate compaſs, admirably well written; as for inſtance, WALTON's Life of Sir HENRY WOTTON, SPRAT's Life of COWLEY, and the Life of Sir WILLIAM TEMPLE by an intimate friend. Some great men have alſo left excellent materials, for repreſenting their own actions in a fair and true light, ſuch as the great Lord Treaſurer CECIL, the famous Chancellor CLARENDON, and the celebrated Earl of STRAFFORD.

Upon the whole it is very apparent, that hitherto there has nothing appeared of the ſame nature with our deſign. Some plans have been too narrow, as ſhutting out all Lives of action except by accident; others too extended, by taking in the remarkable perſons of other nations as well as our own: ſo that we have built upon nobody's foundation, and are at liberty to make the moſt we can of the ſcheme we have choſen. In the next place we readily confeſs, and have ſpent ſome time in giving evidence againſt ourſelves, that there is no want of materials, and that the blame muſt fall upon us, if they are not well put together. But granting we ſhould be ſo fortunate as to ſucceed, it may very well be demanded, of what ſingular uſe and advantage will this work be? What will it afford beyond our former helps? Why ſhould we add this to the many Dictionaries already publiſhed? To which we anſwer, that it will be of general advantage, that it will contribute vaſtly to facilitate the attainment of the moſt uſeful kind of knowledge, and that to make this more plainly appear, will deſerve ſome farther obſervations.

III. It is very evident from this view of the work, that the title of it will be exactly fulfilled, that is to ſay, it will be a complete Body of Britiſh Biography, and contain a much larger, and more methodical Collection of Perſonal Hiſtory, than hitherto has ever appeared. In it the reader will find, not only our moſt famous Divines, and moſt eminent Scholars, with a clear and rational account of their works, but alſo the memoirs of our ableſt Stateſmen, our great Captains, our moſt illuſtrious Seamen, and our worthieſt Patriots: in ſhort, all who have rendered themſelves remarkable in public poſts, or deſerve to be remembered for their private virtues, and theſe too in all ages, from the earlieſt accounts our Hiſtorians contain, down to the preſent time; ſo that it will equally ſerve, to give us juſt notions of the merit of our remoteſt anceſtors, and of their poſterity. It will be of uſe alſo to ſucceeding times: for this Body of Lives being once in the hands of the Public, improvements will be continually made, and every man of genius, every perſon endowed with a generous and liberal ſpirit, will become more ſteady and more aſſiduous, as well as more eager in purſuit of knowledge and virtue, when he is ſenſible that his labours will not be buried in oblivion, but that whatever he glorioufly atchieves will be faithfully recorded.

But the bare ſetting down of facts and dates, though in itſelf highly uſeful, and of great importance to Hiſtory, is but half the merit of this work. For at the ſame time that the text is to the full as copious, and, by the exactneſs of the authorities, much more correct than the articles of MORERI, the notes make a perpetual commentary, in the manner of BAYLE, in which all doubtful points are examined, diſagreeing relations compared, and the truth, from thence, ſet in a clear light. By this means, abundance of hiſtorical paſſages that are ſcattered in works upon other ſubjects, in prefaces to books, or in looſe pamphlets, are ſecured from being overlooked, and brought into their proper places, of which many inſtances might be given, if their number did not, in ſome meaſure, render it unneceſſary. Thus, in the Life of Archbiſhop ABBOT, the reader will find many facts that relate to him, taken from authors very difficult to be met with, and extracts from ſome that are ſcarcely to be had at all, by which all our General Hiſtorians are corrected, and the whole of that Prelate's life and adminiſtration, is fairly and fully ſet forth to public view. In the article of Pope ADRIAN IV., our own and foreign writers are compared, and thereby ſeveral circumſtances rectified, as to which our Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians were very widely miſtaken. The article of ALLEYN the Player is very curious, and contains a multitude of circumſtances, that, if they had not been drawn together for the uſe of this work, would never have appeared. Beſides, in ſeveral articles there have been inſerted inſerted papers from the cloſets of the curious, that hitherto had not ſeen the light; as in the article of Dr. ANTHONY, the proceſs of his Aurum Potabile at large, which was formerly reputed a medicine of great value; and, in the article of BALES the Writing-Maſter, there is the famous Lineal Cypher, invented by the Marquis of Worceſter, which though mentioned by him in a work lately reprinted, yet the ſecret itſelf was firſt made public here.

We may from hence perceive, that it enables us to ſee the moſt material points in our Hiſtory, in all the ſeveral lights in which they have been placed by different authors, accompanied frequently with obſervations and remarks, that ſerve to explain and illuſtrate them, ſo as to clear up truth more effectually, than it was poſſible to do by any other method. As for inſtance; ARDEN's treaſon, of which our Hiſtorians ſpeak ſo variouſly and ſo doubtfully, is, under his article, ſhewn to have been a ſtate artifice of a great Miniſter, to whom this gentleman had given offence. The caſe of Archbiſhop ABBOT's killing the Keeper, is ſhewn in a different light from that in which it has been repreſented, either by friends or enemies; and it is plainly demonſtrated, that it had nothing to do with his laſt ſuſpenſion, though mentioned as the pretence for it, by ſome of our beſt Hiſtorians. The Character of Lord Chancellor BACON is vindicated from many calumnies, and his corruption as fairly ſtated from the beſt authorities. Many other inſtances might be given, even in the compaſs of the firſt volume; but theſe are abundantly ſufficient to prove the truth of this aſſertion, and to let the reader ſee, that never any work was better calculated to render our Hiſtory perfectly intelligible, to throw light even on the obſcureſt paſſages, and to ſet matters of fact, as well as the characters of particular perſons, in that point of view in which they ought to be conſidered, independently of the prejudices of times, and the preposſeſſions of many of our Hiſtorical Writers, who, from their being miſled by paſſion, or for want of proper lights, have either fallen ſhort of, or exceeded the truth.

By this means, the work before us becomes both a Supplement and a Key, not only to our General Hiſtories, but to particular Memoirs; ſo that by comparing the characters of great men, as drawn by particular pens, with their articles in this Biographical Dictionary, we ſee how far they are conſiſtent with, or repugnant to, truth. By it alſo we are enabled, where characters are omitted, to ſupply them, and to find diſtinct and particular relations of remarkable facts, which are barely mentioned, or but ſlightly deſcribed in other books. By it alſo we are enabled to recover or rectify dates, which are either omitted or miſtaken, if they have any relation to conſiderable perſons, as almoſt all memorable actions have: and whereas moſt Hiſtories drop even the greateſt men when no longer concerned in great affairs, we can here follow them in their retreats, and ſee how their private life agreed or diſagreed, with the maxims owned by them in their more active ſcenes of life. We can alſo trace, by this means, the beginnings of their greatneſs, and learn the ſteps by which they roſe to thoſe high poſts and employments, which gave them place in Hiſtory, and be thereby enabled to apprehend more fully, and underſtand more clearly, what is ſaid of them. We may add to this, that we have an opportunity likewiſe of ſeeing the families from which they roſe, or which are deſcended from them; ſo that we are able to connect our Antient with our Modern Hiſtory, and from thence to diſcover an infinite number of curious and uſeful circumſtances, which otherwiſe might eſcape our notice.

If, inſtead of conſidering it in this general manner, and in reſpect to the bulk of our Hiſtory, we examine it more cloſely, and reflect on the relation it bears to the particular branches of that ſtudy, we ſhall find it of no leſs utility. For example, as to Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; Biſhop GODWIN has given us a very ſuccinct detail of the ſucceſſion of our Prelates in their reſpective Sees, and his work has been very accurately continued down to the preſent time. Yet even with reſpect to the moſt eminent men, theſe accounts are very ſhort, and in all other Catalogues they are ſtill ſhorter and leſs correct, ſo that frequently they raiſe our curioſity without ſatisfying it. But here we can immediately turn to the Lives of moſt of theſe Prelates, and take a view of their moſt conſiderable actions both before and after they were honoured with the mitre. We may ſay the ſame thing with reſpect to the Law, of which we have a like ſeries of ſucceſſions, but nothing more: whereas, in this work, almoſt all our Chancellors, our moſt diſtinguiſhed Judges, and many other eminent men of that honourable and learned profeſſion, have their memoirs preſerved, and their principal actions recorded. We may affirm the like of our Miniſters of State, the Generals of our armies, and our Sea-officers, to which we may add, thoſe Orators who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves in either Houſe of Parliament, where liberty of ſpeech, as it is an excellence in our Conſtitution, contributes alſo to render this work particularly valuable, by introducing into Britiſh Biography, characters that will ſcarcely be found in any foreign work of the ſame kind.

With reſpect to Men of Letters, we have been as careful as it was poſſible, and though we have not, as in ſome other Collections, preferred them to men who have paſſed their days in action, yet we have made it our ſtudy to repreſent their characters fairly and fully, and to gratify the reader with correct catalogues of their works. This we have done with reſpect to polite as well as grave writers, and have endeavoured to retrieve, as far as lay in our power, the memoirs of Philoſophers, Phyſicians, Mathematicians, Chemiſts, &c. that have not been hitherto taken notice of in this manner. We have likewiſe given a ſuccinct account of any diſputes or controverſies in which they were engaged; and where any opportunity offered, we have not failed to mention the ſubſtance of ſcarce treatiſes, and, where the ſubject required it, extracts from them, referring, at the ſame time, to the books, where farther ſatisfaction might be had on thoſe heads. Where works have been publiſhed without a name, or where authors have thought fit to make uſe of diſguiſed or fictitious appellations, we have given what light we could, and have ſupported what we ſay by proper authorities, agreeably to the deſign of making this a Critical as well as an Hiſtorical Dictionary. And with the ſame view we have ſometimes corrected the miſtakes of other writers, with as little prejudice as was poſſible to their reputation, being thoroughly ſenſible, that in many caſes thoſe miſtakes were involuntary, and, at the time they wrote, perhaps not to be avoided.

As to the Lives of the remarkable perſons that have flouriſhed in Scotland and Ireland, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that due care has been taken to eſtabliſh a correſpondence with the learned in both thoſe countries, which we hope will ſufficiently appear in the articles included in this work. We have alſo been very diligent in comparing, where it was practicable, hiſtorical facts with records, which is the only means of recovering and aſcertaining dates. We have likewiſe conſulted thoſe large collections of letters and papers publiſhed for fifty years paſt, and have had recourſe to ſeveral Collections that are not yet printed, by which means a multitude of uſeful and curious particulars have been brought to light, and very large chaſms, in Collections of this kind formerly made, have been filled up, to a degree, even beyond our expectations. The mention of this, leads us to make our acknowledgments to ſuch as have favoured us with theſe communications, and whoſe names are mentioned in the courſe of this work where it is requiſite, and where we were permitted to uſe that freedom.

The memoirs of ſuch of our countrymen as, either on account of their good or ill fortune, have ſpent the greateſt part of their days in foreign parts, have been collected with all the care and circumſpection poſſible, and no diligence has been wanting, to procure the beſt intelligence that could be had in ſuch caſes; and we hope it will appear, that many errors committed by foreign writers, in reſpect to ſuch perſons eſpecially, have been rectified. With the view of doing the greater juſtice in this particular, we have conſulted, as the reader will perceive by frequent citations from them, moſt of the Hiſtories of Popes, Cardinals, and Religious Orders, publiſhed abroad; as well as the memoirs of foreigners who have reſided in England, and ſuch as have inſerted particular parts of our Hiſtory in their works, not to mention the ſeveral foreign Dictionaries, in which, for the moſt part, Engliſh Lives are remarkably defective, and perſons of the ſame name are frequently confounded, which ſhews how much preferable our Plan is to one that might appear more general, but which, at the ſame time, muſt ſubject us unavoidably to the like miſtakes. Theſe obſervations ariſe naturally from the ſubject, and are moſt of them requiſite to do juſtice to our readers and to ourſelves, and to make it appear that a work of this importance has been conducted throughout with mature deliberation, and that being apprized of the many and great difficulties that lay in our way, we have not failed to uſe all the induſtry, and to employ all the ſkill that was in our power, to overcome and ſurmount them; not that we have the vanity to ſuppoſe we have been always ſucceſsful; but there is reaſon to hope for ſome indulgence from the public, when men have ſpared no pains or aſſiduity in its ſervice, which is all the excuſe we have or deſire to plead.

There

There are many other points relative to the ſeveral heads into which we have divided this Preface, that might have been examined, and would have contributed to prove the neceſſity as well as utility of a work like this; but we choſe rather to leave theſe to the reflection of the learned and judicious peruſer, than to expatiate too much on a ſubject, which we hope is already ſufficiently clear. For the principal motives to an undertaking right in itſelf, being once placed in a true light, ſuch as are well acquainted with the ſubject which they concern, eaſily enter into all their branches, and often penetrate farther than thoſe who laid them down; and we are willing to leave this in the reader's power, rather than fatigue him with a multitude of obſervations and remarks, which, however juſt, however pertinent in themſelves, become tedious and troubleſome when carried beyond their proper bounds. This we thought neceſſary to mention, that thoſe, who, in peruſing this diſcourſe, or the book to which it belongs, perceive many more advantages than are here pointed out, may not conceive they were wholly unknown or unattended to by us; but may rather be ſatisfied that we paſſed them by, to leave no room for the diſagreeable imputation, of having exhauſted a ſubject all lovers of Britiſh Hiſtory are ſo well verſed in, that with the greateſt eaſe they are capable of reaching its utmoſt receſſes, without the aſſiſtance of a guide. Something, on the appearance of a Collection like this, after ſo many which at firſt ſight ſeem of the ſame nature, it was abſolutely requiſite to ſay, in juſtice to ourſelves and to the public, which is enough to account for our prefixing this Preface; and the fear of diſpleaſing our judges by ſaying too much, and detaining them too long, is the proper apology for not extending it farther; and will, in the eyes of equitable Critics, excuſe us for not inſerting many things, that might otherwiſe be thought conſiderable omiſſions. In an age leſs learned, a longer Preface would have been not only tolerable but agreeable: but in this, when almoſt every reader enters into the method as well as matter of the books that come before him, it is enough to touch the principal heads of enquiry.

One thing, however, we muſt be permitted to mention before we can conclude; and that is, the care taken to bring all remarkable articles into our BIOGRAPHY at once, and under the ſame alphabet, ſo that the memorable facts throughout our whole Hiſtory, the diſputable points relating to Chronology, the circumſtances attending every event of importance, as well as the characters and actions of the perſons principally concerned in them, may be all readily found and repreſented to the reader, ſupported by proper evidence, and explained, by the compariſon of what has been advanced concerning them by different writers. To have left out articles of note, would have been unpardonable in an HISTORICAL, and to have treated ſuch articles ſuperficially, unworthy of a CRITICAL DICTIONARY. The fulfilling our Plan, after we were ſatisfied of its being approved by the PUBLIC, became our indiſpenſable duty, and to that we have conſtantly attended in the choice, and in the manner of treating our articles. If, therefore, they appear more numerous than might be expected, or the doing them juſtice requires a little more room than at firſt might be conceived requiſite, let it be conſidered, how far the reputation of our country, the honour of our anceſtors, the reſpect due to the memories of great men, and the vaſt importance of ſetting worthy examples before the eyes of poſterity, are concerned. When we reflect ſeriouſly upon this, and on the cruelty, we might even ſay impiety, of ſacrificing the glory of great characters to trivial circumſtances, and mere conveniency, it might juſtly be apprehended, that the world would rather reſent our timidity, if we ſhould diſtruſt their approbation of the liberty neceſſary to be taken in this reſpect, than cenſure us for doing at once, and in the eaſieſt and moſt effectual manner, what, ſome time or other, muſt have been done, if we had been too ſcrupulous in the performance of what we undertook. Architects are ſeldom cenſured for ſmall miſtakes in their eſtimates, if the ſtructure they propoſed to erect, be but uniform and complete. Beſides, a palace finiſhed at once, is always cheaper, as well as more beautiful, than when helped out by additional buildings, made neceſſary from the cramping of the firſt deſign.

We have now executed, in as narrow a compaſs as poſſible, what we propoſed at the entrance of this Diſcourſe, and therefore have nothing to do more than to conclude it. We have ſhewn how theſe kind of Dictionaries came firſt into uſe, and why they were received with ſuch univerſal eagerneſs and avidity.

In giving the Hiſtory of MORERI's performance, we have explained the cauſes which hindered that work from being carried to perfection, even by the moſt able and learned men in Europe: in our account of Mr. BAYLE's deſign, we have deſcribed the manner in which he gave that ſuperior value to an undertaking of this ſort, and ſhewed how, inſtead of a Library for the Ignorant, it might be made the Treaſure of the Learned: we have pointed out the reaſons why it ſeems to be impoſſible, or at leaſt impracticable, ever to carry either of theſe works to the higheſt degree of perfection, by a mere addition of Supplement after Supplement: we have propoſed a new method of attaining this, and of giving the extent of MORERI's plan, and the accuracy of BAYLE's deſign, to one and the ſame work: laſtly, we offer to the Public this ſpecimen of the poſſibility of ſuch a performance; and ſhould they honour the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA with their approbation, it will very probably prove the means of exciting, in other countries, a deſire to erect the ſame kind of general monument, to the memory of deſerving perſons, which would effectually juſtify what we have laid down on that head, and furniſh a more complete Body of Perſonal Hiſtory, than, as yet, the world has ſeen, or ſo much as expected.

PRE-

PREFACE

SECOND EDITION OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

EVERY judicious reader muſt be ſenſible, that it would be impoſſible to write a complete Preface to this Work till the whole of it ſhall be finiſhed. It is, however, neceſſary to ſay ſomething here as well with regard to the preſent deſign in general, as to ſeveral particular circumſtances, which require immediate notice. The deſign, as mentioned in the title-page, is to give a ſecond edition of the Biographia Britannica, with corrections, enlargements, and the addition of new lives. The new lives will form a very important part of this undertaking. It is apprehended that they will amount to more than three hundred articles; and it will be our endeavour, by having recourſe, as far as lies in our power, to the moſt original information, to render them peculiarly authentic. This is the caſe with thoſe which occur in the preſent volume. The aſſiſtance we have received is ſuch as reflects no ſmall honour upon us; and we truſt that it will encourage others to be ready in beſtowing a ſimilar aid. It is one advantage of our Work, that, as it is not confined to a narrow compaſs, we can fully avail ourſelves of the helps which may be afforded us. We can enter more largely into characters, facts, literary productions, and incidental queſtions than compendious Biographies; from the proper utility of which, however, we have no inclination to detract. In the writing of new lives, we do not include thoſe only that have been determined ſince the publication of the firſt edition, but ſeveral names which might, and, indeed, ought to have had a place in that edition. The ſelection of theſe names, ſo as to eſcape the charge of omiſſion or ſuperfluity, will be a taſk of ſuch difficulty, as to require the candid allowance of our readers for the unavoidable differences of taſte and judgment.

The additions to the former articles will be numerous, and, in ſome caſes, of conſiderable extent. Thoſe to ADDISON and Lord BACON, in the preſent volume, are particularly large. In the additions to ADDISON, there is an important and curious paper relative to that great man's quarrel with Mr. Pope; for which we are indebted to a moſt eminent and reſpectable perſon, who hath not indulged us with the liberty of mentioning his name. The enlargements conſiſt either of new circumſtances in the lives of celebrated men, or of farther extracts and remarks with regard to their characters, works, and actions. The additional matter is, for the moſt part, inſerted at the end of each article.

As to a number of corrections which have already occurred, or will hereafter occur, in the courſe of the undertaking, it would be needleſs to point them out diſtinctly. It is ſufficient to rectify in ſilence any little inaccuracies of language or ſentiment, or any ſlight miſtakes in dates and facts, which will almoſt unavoidably take place in ſo voluminous a publication. We have exerted ourſelves, in this reſpect, with conſiderable attention; and the inſtances in which we have made the ſmaller neceſſary alterations, would appear, if carefully examined, to be very numerous. But we do not wiſh to be underſtood as having performed more than we have actually done. We do not pretend to write this great work over again, or, where there is no apparent cauſe for doubt or ſuſpicion, to re-examine every fact. This would be an endleſs, as well as a needleſs taſk. Where the writers who preceded us, and who were men of diſtinguiſhed hiſtorical knowledge, had all the materials before them which we could have, and plainly exerted great ability, impartiality, and diligence in making uſe of theſe materials, there could be no call upon us to diſpute the truth of their narrations, or the fidelity of their references. Whatever articles ſhall be found to have been drawn up with any deficiency of care and attention, muſt have a proportionable liberty taken with them; and we are afraid that this part of our employment will be increaſed, when we come towards the latter end of the work. It is to be regretted that Dr. Campbell ceaſed to write, after the cloſe of the fourth volume. The Supplement, in particular, was ſo haſty and imperfect a performance, that, excepting in a few inſtances, we purpoſe to cancel it entirely. Accordingly, in the preſent volume, we have given new lives of ABERNETHY and ARBUTHNOT. In that of ABERNETHY, beſides its being capable of improvement in other reſpects, we were furniſhed, by the Rev. Mr. Joſiah Thompſon, of St. Mary Axe, with ſome curious eccleſiaſtical information concerning the Preſbyterians in Ireland, and the ſteps which were taken, previous to the obtaining of the Act of Toleration in that country. The account of Dr. Arbuthnot, in the Supplement, was tranſcribed, almoſt verbatim, from the memoirs of him prefixed to the two little volumes of what are called his Miſcellanies. This, as the compoſition ought to be our own, would of itſelf have been a ſufficient reaſon for writing a freſh life of the Doctor, even if we had not otherwiſe been enabled to render it more perfect.

In a work drawn up by various perſons, it is not eaſy for them always to concur in the ſame views of things. There are ſeveral inſtances in which we do not agree with the ſentiments advanced, and the repreſentations given, by our learned predeceſſors; and yet, where they were not merely incidental modes of expreſſion, of no ſignificance to the main article, it would have been improper to ſtrike out, or new model what they had ſaid. It would have been depriving them of that right which they undoubtedly had to ſtate facts according to their own ideas: in theſe caſes, therefore, we have taken the liberty, in ſubſequent notes, of declaring our difference of opinion, with the reaſons on which that difference is founded.

A few articles, in the firſt volume of the Biographia, were of ſo little comparative importance, that they might, perhaps, originally have been ſpared. But, as they take up a very ſmall ſpace, and ſome perſons may wiſh to have them retained, we have preſerved them in the preſent edition. There is only one inſtance wherein we have omitted an article, which is that of ATHERTON. This man had not the leaſt claim, from his abilities or public actions, to a place in the work. The ſtory of him is ſhocking and indelicate, and told in a manner extremely diſagreeable. Doubts, likewiſe, have lately been ſuggeſted concerning part of the facts related of him. On theſe accounts, we were happy to find that our own inclination, of dropping him entirely, was confirmed by the opinion of ſeveral gentlemen, diſtinguiſhed for their learning and judgment.

It is proper to take notice, that we have changed the ſignatures at the end of the lives, and have placed, in their ſtead, the initial letters of the real names of each of the authors, ſo far as they have come to our knowledge. The articles formerly marked T, were drawn up by Mr. Broughton, and thoſe ſigned G and R, by Mr. Oldys. The ſignatures of Dr. Campbell were E and X, that of Mr. Morant C, and that of Dr. Nicolls P. We know not who was the writer of the lives, in this volume, which have the letter D annexed to them; and, therefore, we have let that letter ſtand as before.

With reſpect to the aſſiſtance we have received, we are not yet able to do full juſtice to our benefactors. Many of them will be ſpecified in the courſe of the ſeveral Articles to which their communications belong. Other names, to whom we have already been obliged, will hereafter be enumerated. Among thoſe whoſe favours are not confined to a ſingle Article, we have the honour of mentioning the noble and learned Peer, to whom the preſent Volume is inſcribed. Sir William Muſgrave hath permitted us to make uſe of the curious Collection of Anecdotes and Memoranda, which was of ſuch ſignal benefit to the late ingenious and worthy Mr. Granger, in compiling his Biographical Hiſtory of England. Thomas Aſtle, Eſq; hath communicated a number of MSS., corrections and additions, which were made, by Mr. Humphrey Wanley, to Wood's Athenæ Oxonienſes. To Dr. Percy, beſides his own valuable aſſiſtances, which will be acknowledged in their proper places, we are indebted, for directing us to the purchaſe of a large and uſeful body of Biographical materials, left by Mr. Oldys. To Dr. Hunter, the Rev. Dr. Douglas, Mr. Archdeacon Blackburne, the Rev. Mr. Duncombe, Mr. Reed of Staples Inn, Robert Dingley, Eſq; J. C. Brooke, Eſq; of the Herald's College, and Richard Gough, Eſq; we ſtand obliged on various accounts. But our moſt particular acknowledgments are due to Sir David Dalrymple of Hailes, Bart. one of the Lords of Seſſion and of Juſticiary in Scotland. This gentleman, whoſe accurate and extenſive acquaintance with Britiſh Hiſtory, Antiquities, and Biography, requires no encomium, hath favoured us with a ſeries of obſervations, reaching through ſeveral volumes of our Work; and which have enabled us to correct and improve it in various important reſpects. Such auſpicious beginnings encourage us to hope for the aſſiſtance of other intelligent and learned men; and, indeed, we already know, that we ſhall hereafter be enabled to enlarge the liſt of our benefactors.

It is ſcarcely neceſſary to inform our readers, that we have endeavoured to avail ourſelves of the many hiſtorical and miſcellaneous productions which have appeared ſince the firſt publication of the Biographia Britannica. This will be evident in the courſe of the undertaking. We always produce our authorities; and it is a rule with us, never to refer to a book which we have not ſeen. If any facts be derived from ſecondary information, we have cited the authors alone from whom they are taken.

From the Article of Mr. THOMAS BAKER it will be evident, that, as occaſion calls for it, we ſhall not neglect an application to our two juſtly celebrated Univerſities. To theſe illuſtrious ſeats of learning, we ſhall have recourſe, as upon other accounts, ſo particularly for intelligence concerning the many ornaments of Science and Literature educated in them. We need not ſay, that we ſhall not be inattentive to the valuable collections in the Britiſh Muſeum.

It is our wiſh, and will be our aim, to conduct this publication with real impartiality. We mean to riſe above narrow prejudices, and to record, with fidelity and freedom, the virtues and vices, the excellencies and defects of men of every profeſſion and party. A work of this nature would be deprived of much of its utility, if it were not carried on with a philoſophical liberality of mind. But we apprehend that a philoſophical liberality of mind, whilſt we do full juſtice to the merit of thoſe from whom we differ either in religious or political opinions, doth not imply in it our having no ſentiments of our own. We ſcruple not to declare our attachment to the great intereſts of mankind, and our enmity to bigotry, ſuperſtition, and tyranny, whether found in Papiſt or Proteſtant, Whig or Tory, Churchman or Diſſenter. A hiſtory that is written without any regard to the chief privileges of Human Nature, and without feelings, eſpecially of the moral kind, muſt loſe a conſiderable part of its inſtruction and energy.

We know not whether any apology will be deemed needful, for our having indulged ourſelves in ſome remarks and reflections on ſuch incidents and ſubjects as occaſionally came in our way. Since the work we are publiſhing is critical, as well as hiſtorical, it is hoped that our conduct in this reſpect doth not require an apology. It is well known how much Monſ. Bayle's grand performance was recommended by his ingenious obſervations and diſcuſſions. We are deeply ſenſible how inferior we muſt always be to that great man in his excellencies, and it is no part of our inclination to copy after him in his defects. But, while we reject his ſcepticiſm and licentiouſneſs, we ſhould rejoice to poſſeſs the ſame ability of applying facts to valuable purpoſes. Biography may be conſidered in two lights. It is very agreeable and uſeful, when it hath no other view than merely to relate the circumſtances of the Lives of eminent men, and to give an account of their writings. But it is capable of a ſtill nobler application. It may be regarded as preſenting us with a variety of events, that, like experiments in Natural Philoſophy, may become the materials from which general truths and principles are to be drawn. When Biographical knowledge is employed in enlarging our acquaintance with Human Nature, in exciting an honourable emulation, in correcting our prejudices, in refining our ſentiments, and in regulating our conduct, it then attains its true excellence. Beſides its being a pleaſing amuſement, and a juſt tribute of reſpect to illuſtrious characters, it riſes to the dignity of SCIENCE; and of ſuch ſcience as muſt ever be eſteemed of peculiar importance, becauſe it hath MAN for its object.

AARON and JULIUS (Saints) ſuffered martyrdom together, during the perſecution under the Emperor Diocletian, in the year 303 [A], about the ſame time with St. Alban (a), the protomartyr of Britain (b) [B]. What their Britiſh names were, we are no where told; it being uſual with the Chriſtian Britons, at the time of baptiſm, to take new names from the Greek, Latin, or Hebrew. Nor have we any certainty as to the particulars of their death; only that they ſuffered the crueleſt torments. They had each a church erected to his memory [C]; and their feſtival is placed, in the Roman Martyrology, on the firſt of July. They are here joined together in one article, becauſe, like Saul and Jonathan, in their death they were not divided (c).

[A] AARON and JULIUS ——— ſuffered martyrdom together, in the year 303.] Venerable Bede, who mentions the martyrdom of theſe two ſaints (and of many others of both ſexes, in different places, who were put to death with the crueleſt torments) calls them Citizens of Urbs Legionum. Paſſi ſunt ea tempeſtate Aaron & Julius, Legionum Urbis Cives, aliique utriuſque ſexus diverſis in locis perplures, qui diverſis cruciatibus torti, & inaudita membrorum diſcerptione lacerati, animas ad ſupernæ civitatis gaudia perfecto agone miſerunt (1). Urbs Legionum, or the City of Legions, was a name given by the Romans to ſeveral cities of Britain; as Leiceſter, Exeter, and Caer-Leon, the metropolis of Wales: which laſt muſt here be meant, becauſe the churches, dedicated to St. Aaron, and St. Julius, were built in that city, and the bodies of the ſaints themſelves interred there (2).

[B] ——— About the ſame time with St. Alban.] That St. Alban, nevertheleſs, claims the honour of the protomartyrdom, appears from the teſtimony of Matthew of Weſtminſter; who, mentioning the martyrdom of St. Alban under the year 303, adds, by way of Corollary, that Aaron and Julius, and many others, both men and women, ſuffered at the ſame time in Britain; St. Alban, however, being the protomartyr of the Engliſh, or the firſt who impurpled Britain with his blood. Eodem tempore paſſi ſunt in Britannia Aaron & Julius, cum aliis pluribus viris & fœminis, qui ad deſiderabile cæleſtis Hieruſalem gaudium per martyrium convolarunt; exiſtente tamen beato Albano protomartyre, qui Britanniam primitivo ſanguine purpuravit (3).

[C] They had each a church erected to his memory.] Giraldus Cambrenſis, deſcribing the city of Caer-Leon (4), tells us, the bodies of Aaron and Julius lie buried in that city, each of whom has a church dedicated to him; that of Julius graced with a choir of nuns, and that of Aaron with a famous order of canons. And Biſhop Godwin tells us (5), that the remains of theſe churches, or chapels, were viſible not very long ſince; the one ſituated on the eaſt ſide, the other on the weſt ſide of the town, about two miles diſtant from each other.

ABBADIE (JAMES) was born at Nay in Berne, in the year 1658 (a), as there is good reaſon to believe, though ſome indeed ſay, that he was born in 1654 (b). He ſtudied at Puy Laurent, at Saumur, at Paris, and at Sedan; at which laſt place, he received the degree of Doctor in Divinity. He intended to have dedicated himſelf very early to the miniſtry, but the circumſtances of the Proteſtants in France, rendered it impracticable there, for which reaſon, he readily accepted the offer of the Count d'Eſpenſe, who had a conſiderable poſt in the ſervice of the Elector of Brandenburgh, who deſired to carry him with him to Berlin, where the Elector intended to ſettle a French miniſter (c). It is not very clear, at what time he arrived in that city, but it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that it might be either in 1680, or 1681. He reſided there for many years with great reputation, and in high favour with the Elector Frederick William; making now and then a trip to Holland, on account of publiſhing his writings, which were received with great applauſe (d). At firſt, the congregation of French Refugees at Berlin was but thin, but after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, numbers retired into Brandenburgh, and were received with the utmoſt compaſſion; ſo that Mr. Abbadie had a great charge, of which he took all imaginable care, and, by his intereſt, rendered them many ſervices at court (e). In the ſpring of the year 1688, the Elector died, and our author then accepted of a propoſal made him by the Marſhal Schomberg, to go with him firſt to Holland, and then into England, with the Prince of Orange. In the latter end of the ſummer of the year 1689, he followed that great man into Ireland, where he remained till after the battle of the Boyne, which happened in July 1690, wherein his patron was killed, which occaſioned his return to England (f). He became quickly afterwards, miniſter of the French church at the Savoy; but the air diſagreeing with him, he went over again to Ireland (g); where, in conſequence of King William's recommendation of him to the government there for ſomething conſiderable, he would have been promoted to the deanery of St. Patrick's, if he had been acquainted with the Engliſh language. But, on this account, it was thought improper to place him in the greateſt preferment in the city of Dublin. However, he obtained the deanery of Killaloo, with one or two little things annexed to it, in order to make him amends for his diſappointment; though with theſe helps he had not above half the value of what had been intended for him. His preferments amounted, at firſt, to 240 pounds per annum; but afterwards, upon a great ſcarcity of money in Ireland, he was obliged to let them, during incumbency, for 120 l. a year; a neceſſity to which many other clergymen, as well as himſelf, were, at the ſame time, reduced. Mr. Abbadie had repeated promiſes of being farther provided for; but they were not carried into execution (b). His occaſions, and eſpecially the printing of his books, called him frequently into England and Holland; in both which places he was extremely beloved. He was ſtrongly attached to the cauſe of his Royal Maſter, as appears by his elaborate defence of the Revolution, and his hiſtory of the Aſſaſſination Plot (i). He gave alſo very high proofs of his loyalty to King George the Firſt; and would doubtleſs, if he had lived longer, have ſhown the like reſpect to his late Majeſty. In 1726, Mr. Abbadie growing old, and finding that he wanted an amanuenſis to aſſiſt him in his ſtudies, ſolicited ſome farther promotion, and went into England for that purpoſe; being ſtrongly recommended by the excellent Archbiſhop Boulter, to Lord Carteret, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and to Dr. Gibſon, Biſhop of London; but with what ſucceſs doth not appear (k). If there were any intentions in his favour, they were fruſtrated by his death; for he departed this life at Mary-le-bon, on the 25th of September, 1727, aged, according to ſome accounts, ſixty-nine (l), according to others, ſeventy-three (m). He had great natural abilities, improved by a large ſtock of ſolid and uſeful learning; was a moſt zealous Proteſtant, and, without flattery, one of the moſt eloquent men of the age, in which he lived. His works, of which the reader will find an account in a note [A], bore many editions in his lifetime, and are ſtill in eſteem

Mr. Bayle commends this piece alſo, as one of the moſt perfect in its kind (2); and indeed, it has been always ſo eſteemed, as well by the Roman Catholick as the reformed divines. The Abbé Houteville, a late writer, ſpeaks of it in theſe terms: 'The moſt 'ſhining of thoſe treatiſes for defence of the Chriſ-'tian Religion, which were publiſhed by the Pro-'teſtants, is that written by Mr. Abbadie. The 'favourable reception it met with, the praiſes it 'received almoſt without example immediately after 'its publication, the univerſal approbation it ſtill 'meets with, render it unneceſſary for me to join 'my commendations, which would add ſo little to 'the merit of ſo great an author. He has united in 'this book, all our controverſies with the infidels. 'In the firſt part, he combats the Atheiſts; the 'Deiſts in the ſecond; and the Socinians in the 'third: philoſophy and theology enter happily 'into his manner of compoſing, which is in the true 'method, lively, pure, and elegant, eſpecially in 'the firſt books; for towards the end, he ſeems to 'have leſs fire. I ſee methinks there, a dryneſs 'which looks like the ſhore left by the ebb of the 'full tide of eloquence (3).' This work was tranſlated into Engliſh, and into High Dutch, in which language it hath gone through two editions with notes (4).

This is the less surprising with regard to his treatise on the Revelations, and some of his controversial and occasional writings. But we apprehend that even his capital productions are not, at present, much read; at least, in our own country [B]. Upon the whole, Mr. Abbadie's imagination, learning, and eloquence, appear to have been superior to his judgment.

It was this book, that Dr. Henry Lambert, Bishop of Dromore, caused to be translated into English, and afterwards disliking that version, translated it himself, for the instruction of the Roman Catholicks in his diocese. It is written in a very warm pathetick stile, but not without a tincture of enthusiasm, which appeared still more strongly in the subsequent piece (9). The year following, he revised the French translation of the Common Prayer Book, which he likewise dedicated to his Majesty King George I. (10).

Avec une nouvelle & très sensible demonstration de la Verité de la Religion Chrétienne*, Amsterdam 1723, in four vols. 12*mo*. The Triumph of Providence and Religion, or the opening the Seven Seals by the Son of God, &c. This is one of the boldest Commentaries on the Revelations, that ever was published. It must, however, be allowed, that there are in it abundance of surprising things, and the strongest proofs, that the fire of the author's imagination, was not at all damped by his years (11). Besides these, he published several single sermons, and other little tracts, which it is not necessary to mention. In 1727, he sent abroad proposals for printing all his works, as well those already published, as many that he had by him ready for the press, in four volumes 4*to*. But before he could bring his design to bear, he was taken away by death (12).

[B] At least in our own country.] One of the worst effects arising from the vast multiplicity of new publications is, that it occasions old works, which have great merit, to be laid aside, and almost forgotten. Many instances might be given of this; but we shall probably find cause, in the course of our undertaking, to resume the subject, with respect to more important writers.

C. and K.

ABBOT (George) Archbishop of Canterbury: A man, whose extraordinary abilities, high rank in the church, and influence in publick affairs, deserve that the circumstances of his life should be transmitted to posterity with the greatest accuracy and impartiality possible. He was born October 29, 1562, at Guilford, in Surry, of very worthy parents (a); remarkably distinguished by their steady zeal for the Protestant Religion; for their living long, and happily together, and for their singular felicity in their children [A]. While his mother was pregnant with this son, she is said to have had a dream which proved at once an omen, and an instrument of his future fortunes. Her dream was this: She fancied she was told in her sleep, that if she could eat a Jack, or Pike, the child she went with would prove a son, and rise to great preferment. Not long after this, in taking a pail of water out of the river Wey, which ran by their house, she accidentally caught a Jack, and had thus an odd opportunity of fulfilling her dream. This story being much talked of, and coming to the ears of some persons of distinction, they offered to become sponsors for the child, which was kindly accepted, and they had the goodness to afford many testimonies of their affection to their godson while at school, and after he was sent to the university (b). Such were the good effects of his mother's dream [B]. When he was grown up to an age proper for receiving the first tincture

[A] For their singular felicity in their children.] Mr. Maurice Abbot was by trade a Clothworker, and settled at the town of Guilford, in Surry, where he married his wife Alice March, and suffered for his stedfastness in the Protestant religion, through the means of Dr. Story, who was a great persecutor of such persons in the reign of Queen Mary (1). But these storms being blown over, they passed the remainder of their days quietly, living together fifty-eight years. She deceased September 15, 1606, and he September 25, the same year, the former being eighty, and the latter eighty-six years of age (2). They left behind them six sons, of whom Robert the eldest, was then one of the King's chaplains, our author, George, had been thrice vice-chancellor of Oxford, and their youngest son Maurice, was at this time an eminent merchant of the city of London (3).

[B] Such were the good effects of his mother's dream.] The story of this dream was first published by Mr. Aubrey, tincture of learning, he was ſent with his eldeſt brother Robert (of whom in a ſubſequent article) to the free-ſchool, erected in their native town of Guilford, by King Edward VI; and having paſſed through the rudiments of literature, under the care of Mr. Francis Taylor, who had then the direction of that ſchool (c), he was in 1578 removed to the univerſity of Oxford, and entered a ſtudent in Baliol College (d). On November 29, 1583, being then bachelor of arts, he was elected probationer fellow of his college; and afterwards proceeding in the faculty of arts, he entered into holy orders, and became a celebrated preacher in the univerſity (e). He commenced bachelor of divinity in 1593, and proceeded doctor in that faculty, in May 1597; and in the month of September, of the ſame year, he was elected maſter of Univerſity College (f). About this time it was, that the firſt differences began between him and Dr. Laud, which ſubſiſted as long as they lived, and were the cauſe of great uneaſineſs to both (g). In the year following, which was 1598, he publiſhed a Latin work which did him great honour; and which was afterwards reprinted in Germany (h). On March 6, 1599, he was inſtalled dean of Wincheſter, in the room of Dr. Martin Heton, who was preferred to the biſhoprick of Ely: Dr. Abbot being then about thirty-ſeven years of age (i). Some writers ſay that he was alſo dean of Glouceſter (k), but this is abſolutely a miſtake [C]. In 1600, he was vice-chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford (l), and diſtinguiſhed himſelf while in that high office, by the opinion he gave with reſpect to the ſetting up again the croſs in Cheapſide, about which there were great diſputes; but in the end he carried his point againſt Dr. Bancroft, then Biſhop of London, and afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury; which gained him great reputation, as appears by a tract publiſhed on that ſubject (m) [D]. He likewiſe publiſhed the ſame year his ſermons on the prophet Jonah, which were received with great applauſe (n). In 1603, he was again choſen vice-chancellor of the univerſity, and diſcharged that office a ſecond time with general approbation (o). In the ſucceeding year 1604, that tranſlation of the Bible which is now in uſe was made by the direction of King James; and Dr. Abbot was the ſecond of eight learned divines in the univerſity of Oxford, to whom the care of tranſlating the whole New Teſtament (excepting the Epiſtles) was committed (p). He likewiſe publiſhed this year an anſwer to Dr. Hill's Reaſons for upholding Popery (q). In 1605, he was a third time vice-chancellor (r). In the ſucceeding year, he

Aubrey, in the year 1696 (4). He ſeems, from what he ſays in another work of his, to have enquired afterwards very carefully into the truth of it; which was atteſted to him by the miniſter, and ſeveral of the moſt ſober inhabitants of Guilford (5): yet it muſt be owned, that it is not a little ſtrange this dream ſhould never be taken notice of before, eſpecially conſidering the humour of the times in which the archbiſhop lived, and the proneneſs of Fuller and Lloyd, who have both written accounts of this biſhop, to ſet down whatever carried in it any thing of the wonderful.

[C] That he was dean of Glouceſter is abſolutely a miſtake.] This is very evident, from conſulting the ſucceſſion of the deans of Wincheſter and Glouceſter. Dr. Abbot was inſtalled dean of Wincheſter, March 6, 1599, as appears by the regiſter (6), and on June 3, 1609, Dr. Thomas Moreton was inſtalled, on the promotion of Dr. Abbot to the ſee of Litchfield and Coventry (7); ſo that the latter plainly held this deanery nine years. As for that of Glouceſter, Dr. Griffith Lewis was ſucceeded therein, after he had held it ſeven years, by Dr. Thomas Moreton, in 1607 (8), who was removed to Wincheſter, upon the promotion of Dr. Abbot; from whence, I imagine, the miſtake muſt have proceeded. Mr. Bayle, in his article, has heightened his error, for he makes Dr. Abbot ſucceed Dr. Moreton, in the deanery of Glouceſter (9), which was excuſeable in him, as a foreigner; but it is ſurpriſing to find ſuch as write Engliſh hiſtories, ſetting down falſe facts of this nature, merely through want of attention.

[D] A tract publiſhed on that ſubject.] The croſs at Cheapſide was taken down in the year 1600, in order to be repaired; and upon this occaſion, the citizens of London deſired the advice of both univerſities on this queſtion; Whether the ſaid croſs ſhould be re-erected or not? and Dr. Abbot, as vice-chancellor of Oxford, gave it as his opinion, that the crucifix with the dove upon it ſhould not be again ſet up, but approved rather of a pyramid, or ſome other matter of mere ornament, for the reaſons aſſigned in his letter. In this determination he acted conſiſtently with his own practice, when in his ſaid office he cauſed ſeveral ſuperſtitious pictures to be burnt at the market-place of Oxford; and among the reſt, one in which was the figure of God the Father, over a crucifix, ready to receive the Soul of Chriſt; and he profeſſes in this letter, that he was moved to ſuch proceedings by his own obſervation and experience. 'I remember, ſays 'he, in that college (Baliol) where I firſt lived, a 'young man was taken praying, and beating his 'breaſt, before a crucifix in a window; which 'cauſed the maſter and fellows to pull it down, 'and ſet up other glaſs. Which example, makes 'me nothing doubt, but that the croſs in Cheapſide 'hath many, in the twilight and morning early, 'who do reverence before it, beſides Campian, 'whoſe act is famous, or rather infamous, for it. 'And, I am informed, that ſo much hath been ſignified by the neighbours, or inqueſt, making preſentments concerning the circumſtances of this 'cauſe. By all which, I do conclude, that it is a 'monument of their ſuperſtition; a great inducement, and may be a ready way to idolatry; and 'that there can be no tolerable uſe of this matter, 'which may be able to countervail the dangers and 'obloquy ariſing upon the retaining of it; and ſo 'much the rather, becauſe it is perceived that 'many evil-affected men do make their advantage 'from hence, to inſinuate into the minds of their 'credulous hearers, that it is a token of the return 'of their faith again into this land, ſince their 'monuments are not extinguiſhed in the chief ſtreet 'of our greateſt city.' He afterwards deſires, that the reader would obſerve, he ſays, the magiſtrates are to redreſs ſuch enormities: 'For, continues he, 'I do not permit inferior men to run headlong 'about ſuch matters; and to rend, break, and 'tear, as well within, as without, the churches; 'which was that which Luther reprehended; but 'the advice and conſent of ſuperior powers is to be 'had herein, that all things may be done decently, 'and in order.' He held it therefore neceſſary, that they ſhould apply to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (Whitgift) and to the Biſhop of London (Bancroft) for inſtructions (10). The iſſue of the matter was, that the croſs only was erected again, without either the body, or the dove, which was agreeable in the main to the ſentiments of the vice-chancellor, and heads of houſes at Oxford.

he is said to have had a great ſhare in the troubles of Laud, who was called to an account by the vice-chancellor, Dr. Ayry, for a ſermon of his preached before the univerſity (s); and that year likewiſe, he loſt his father and mother (t). In 1608, died his great patron Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorſet, Lord High Treaſurer of England, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, ſuddenly at the council table, at whoſe funeral, Dr. Abbot preached a ſermon, which was afterwards printed, and generally recommended (u). After his deceaſe, Dr. Abbot became chaplain to George Hume, Earl of Dunbar, and Treaſurer of Scotland, one of King James's early favourites, and who had all along had a very high ſhare in his eſteem, and with him he went this year into Scotland, in order to aſſiſt in the execution of a very important deſign, for eſtabliſhing an union between the Churches of that kingdom and this: wherein he behaved with ſo much prudence and moderation as gained him a very high character, and is thought to have been the firſt ſtep to all his future preferment (w) [E]. [E] The firſt ſtep to all his future preferments.] There is no point in which all the writers who mention this Prelate, more clearly agree, than in this, that his journey to Scotland brought him into that height of favour with the King, which ſo ſuddenly raiſed him in little more than three years, from Dean of Wincheſter, to Archbiſhop of Canterbury: yet it has ſo fallen out, that hitherto his tranſactions in Scotland have lain ſo much in the dark, that it is a very difficult thing to diſcern how he merited by them ſo high a ſhare of the Royal favour. To explain therefore this hitherto untouched point, ſhall be the buſineſs of this note, the rather becauſe it will ſhew how unjuſtly this great man has been charged with unfriendlineſs to the eſtabliſhment of the Church of England, and coldneſs in regard to the Hierarchy. King James had ſuffered ſo much before his acceſſion to the Crown of England, from the ſpirit and power of the Preſbyterians in Scotland, that he was greatly ſet on reſtoring the ancient form of Government by Biſhops, in that kingdom; the care of which was principally entruſted to the Earl of Dunbar, to whom Dr. Abbot was now chaplain (11). That noble Lord, who is by all writers allowed to have been both the wiſeſt and beſt man of all the favourites of that nation, had proceeded ſo far in this matter two years before, as to obtain an act for the reſtitution of the eſtates of Biſhops; but the Preſbyterians made ſo ſteady a reſiſtance, that the conſequences which were hoped from the reſtoring of that order, were in the utmoſt danger of being diſappointed. But by the ſkill and prudence, the ſound ſenſe, and great moderation of Dr. Abbot, theſe difficulties were removed, and the clergy of Scotland, who had refuſed to admit the Biſhops for their moderators in their church ſynods, were brought to a better temper, and things put into ſuch a train, as afterwards produced the entire eſtabliſhment of the Epiſcopal Order in Scotland; for which the King had been ſo long ſtruggling, and to ſo little purpoſe. The account given by the famous hiſtorian of the Church of Scotland, ſufficiently proves the truth of what has been aſſerted. 'About 'the end of June (1608) ſays he, the Earl of Dun-'bar came from court, and with him two Engliſh 'Doctors, Abbot and Higgins. Dr. Maxy, one 'of the King's chaplains came by ſea. It was re-'ported, that no ſmall ſums of money were ſent 'down with him, to be diſtributed among the mi-'niſters and ſome others. The Engliſh doctor 'ſeemed to have no other direction, but to perſuade 'the Scots that there was no ſubſtantial difference in 'religion between the two realms, but only in 'things indifferent, concerning government and 'ceremonies; and to report, that it was his ma-'jeſty's will, that England ſhould ſtand as he found 'it, and Scotland as he left it. But when he came 'to St. Andrews, Mr. Robert Howie, a man of a 'ſeditious and turbulent ſpirit, declaimed againſt 'the diſcipline and government of our Kirk; and 'then they uttered their mind in plain terms: no 'order was taken with ſo manifeſt a breach, after 'the laſt conference. This was the policy of the 'aſpiring Biſhops, to cry peace, peace, and to crave 'ſilence of their oppoſites; when, in the mean 'time, they minded not to be ſilent themſelves, when 'they found occaſion (12).' This very clearly proves, that it was by a kind and moderate, not a haughty and ſevere behaviour, that the Engliſh doctor, as he calls Dean Abbot, won ſo much upon the Scots miniſters, as to bring them into a compliance with the King's deſires; ſo that in two years afterwards, the Lord High Treaſurer, Dunbar, who was entirely governed in this matter by the advice of his able chaplain, procured an act in the General Aſſembly, by which it was provided, 'That the 'King ſhould have the indiction (or calling) of all 'General Aſſemblies: That the Biſhops, or their 'deputies, ſhould be perpetual moderators of the 'dioceſan ſynods: That no excommunication, or 'abſolution, ſhould be pronounced without their 'approbation: That all preſentations of benefices 'ſhould be made by them; and that the depriva-'tion or ſuſpenſion of miniſters, ſhould belong to 'them: That every miniſter at his admiſſion to a 'benefice, ſhould take the oath of ſupremacy, and 'canonical obedience: That the viſitation of the 'dioceſe ſhall be performed by the Biſhop or his 'deputy only: And finally, that the Biſhop ſhould 'be moderator of all conventions, for exerciſings 'or propheſyings, which ſhould be held within 'their bounds (13).' All which were afterwards ratified and confirmed by authority of the parliament of that kingdom. Such were the merits of Dr. Abbot in this reſpect, and ſo great juſtice was there done to them by his noble patron, the Treaſurer, in the report he made to his majeſty, of the Dean's behaviour in this reſpect, that, in conjunction with the ſervice rendered his majeſty, by giving his unqueſtioned teſtimony in the affair of Gowrie's conſpiracy, he was raiſed ſo high, and ſo firmly fixed in the eſteem of his royal maſter, as that no oppoſition could prevent his arriving at the ſupreme dignity in his profeſſion (14). As a proof of his advancing his fortune by this means, it may not be amiſs to tranſcribe the obſervation of a contemporary hiſtorian, after Dr. Abbot was raiſed to the archiepiſcopal dignity, who tells us, 'That the firſt preacher, and the firſt in that 'embaſſage, which King James ſent into Scotland, 'to eſtabliſh thoſe neighbouring churches, was he, 'whoſe eminency both for place and piety is now 'worthily foremoſt in guiding our own; and whoſe 'bleſſed travels in that ſervice, as they were accept-'able to God, his majeſty, and that nation; ſo 'are they a document to others, how powerful and 'admirably ſucceſsful true learning is, where it is 'guided with true prudence; and where piety and 'the love of God's glory is linked with charity and 'zeal of man's good (15).'

[A regard to truth obliges us to add, that Dr. Abbot went as far as any other court chaplain could do, in that extravagant flattery of his royal maſter, which was ſo much the faſhion of the time, and which was by no means confined to eccleſiaſtics. Speaking of King James (16), he ſays, 'whoſe 'life hath been ſo immaculate and unſpotted in the 'world, ſo free from all touch of viciouſneſs and 'ſtaining imputation, that even malice itſelf, which 'leaveth nothing unſearched, could never find true 'bleminſh in it, nor caſt probable aſperſion on it. 'Zealous as David; learned and wiſe, the Solomon 'of our age; religious as Joſias; careful of ſpread-'ing Chriſt's faith as Conſtantine the Great; juſt 'as Moſes; undefiled in all his ways as a Je-'hoſaphat or Heſekias; full of clemency as ano-'ther Theodoſius.' If Mr. Walpole had ſeen this paſſage, he certainly would not have ſaid, that 'honeſt Abbot could not flatter (17).' It is probable, from the preceding extract, that his adulation contributed, at Edinburgh upon this occaſion, a proſecution was commenced againſt one George Sprot, Notary of Aymouth, for having been concerned in Gowrie's conſpiracy eight years before, for which he was tried before Sir William Hart, Lord Juſtice General of Scotland, condemned and executed. A large account of this affair was drawn up by the judge, and a narrative prefixed thereto, by Dr. Abbot, who had been eye-witneſs of all that paſſed, and this was publiſhed at London, in order to ſettle the minds of the people, with regard to that conſpiracy; which had been hitherto looked upon as a very myſterious affair, and about the reality of which there had been very great doubts (x) [F]. The King knew ſo well the difficulties that were to be encountered in this northern nation, that it gave him very high ideas of the abilities of the man, who was able to overcome them; and therefore, when another ſet of men filled tributed, together with other cauſes, to accelerate his promotions. But let it be remembered in his favour, that he appears, in the latter part of his life, to have maintained a greater degree of chriſtian ſimplicity. It hurts an ingenuous mind to reflect, that ſuch groſs flattery was paid to our monarchs, by men otherwiſe of reſpectable characters; men who were diſtinguiſhed by their profeſſion of piety, and by the gravity and ſtrictneſs of their manners. Perhaps the taſte of the age was not ſufficiently refined to perceive the difference between fulſome panegyric, and that delicate turn of compliment which prevails in a highly poliſhed ſtate of ſociety. Perhaps people were brought up with ſuch an extravagant veneration for princes, that they did not dare, even in their own minds, to judge of the actions of their ſovereigns with a becoming freedom. But, after all, it is to be feared that the flattery of the times we are ſpeaking of, as well as of other times, is principally to be charged to ſelf-intereſted views and purpoſes. ——— Lord Cromarty repreſents Dr. Abbot as having been providentially in Scotland, in the year 1608, about ſome concerns of his own (18). This is a ſurpriſing inſtance of careleſſneſs: for the Doctor expreſsly ſays (19), that he was at Edinburgh that year, 'by the commandment of his Majeſty.']

'While the King was in this dangerous ſituation, 'his attendants growing impatient to know whither 'he had retired, one of Gowrie's attendants entered 'the room haſtily, and told them that the King 'had juſt rode away towards Faulkland. All of 'them ruſhed out into the ſtreet; and the Earl, in 'the utmoſt hurry, called for their horſes. But 'by this time, his brother had returned to the 'King, and, ſwearing that now there was no remedy, he behoved to die, offered to bind his 'hands. Unarmed as James was, he ſcorned to 'ſubmit to that indignity; and cloſing with the 'aſſaſſin, a fierce ſtruggle enſued. The man in 'armour ſtood, as formerly, amazed and motionleſs; and the King dragging Ruthven towards a 'window, which during his abſence he had perſuaded the perſon with whom he was left, to 'open, cried, with a wild and affrighted voice. "Treaſon! Treaſon! Help! I am murdered!" 'His attendants heard, and knew the voice; and 'ſaw, at the window, a hand which graſped the 'King's neck with violence. They flew with 'precipitation to his aſſiſtance. Lennox and Mar, 'with the greater number, ran up the principal 'ſtair-caſe, where they found all the doors ſhut, 'which they battered with the utmoſt fury, endeavouring to burſt them open. But Sir John Ramſey, entering by a back-ſtair, which led to the 'apartment where the King was, found the door 'open; and ruſhing upon Ruthven, who was ſtill 'ſtruggling with the King, ſtruck him twice with 'his dagger, and thruſt him towards the ſtair-caſe, 'where Sir Thomas Erſkine and Sir Hugh Herries 'met, and killed him; he crying with his laſt 'breath, "Alas! I am not to blame for this "action." During this ſcuffle, the man, who had 'been concealed in the ſtudy, eſcaped unobſerved. 'Together with Ramſey, Erſkine, and Herries, 'one Wilſon, a footman, entered the room where 'the King was, and before they had time to ſhut 'the door, Gowrie ruſhed in with a drawn ſword 'in each hand, followed by ſeven of his attendants 'well armed, and with a loud voice threatened 'them all with inſtant death. They immediately 'thruſt the King into the little ſtudy, and ſhutting 'the door upon him, encountered the Earl. Notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers, Sir John 'Ramſey pierced Gowrie through the heart, and 'he fell down dead without uttering a word; his 'followers having received ſeveral wounds, immediately fled. Three of the King's defenders were 'likewiſe hurt in the conflict. A dreadful noiſe 'continued ſtill at the oppoſite door, where many 'perſons laboured in vain to force a paſſage; and 'the King being aſſured that they were Lennox, 'Mar, and his other friends, it was opened on the 'inſide. They ran to the King, whom they unexpectfilled the King's head and heart with apprehenſions, he had recourſe to Dr. Abbot, as the fitteſt perſon, to put things again into the right channel. The caſe was this; his majeſty being engaged in the mediation of peace between the crown of Spain, and the United Provinces; by which the ſovereignty of the latter, was to be acknowledged by the former: he demanded the advice of the convocation then ſitting, as to the lawfulneſs of eſpouſing the cauſe of the States (y). Upon this opening, they launched at once

'expectedly found ſafe, with tranſports of congratulation; and he, falling on his knees, with all 'his attendants round him, offered ſolemn thanks 'to God for ſuch a wonderful deliverance. The 'danger, however, was not yet over. The inhabitants of the town, whoſe Provoſt Gowrie was, 'and by whom he was extremely beloved, hearing 'the fate of the two brothers, ran to their arms, 'and ſurrounded the houſe, threatening revenge, 'with many inſolent and opprobrious ſpeeches 'againſt the King. James endeavoured to pacify 'the enraged multitude, by ſpeaking to them from 'the window; he admitted their magiſtrates into 'the houſe; related to them the whole circumſtances of the fact; and, their fury ſubſiding by 'degrees, they diſperſed (22)." The motives of the two brothers for attempting to commit ſo deteſtable an action, the end they had in view, and the accomplices on whom they depended, were altogether unknown. From the words of Ruthven it might be thought, that they intended to revenge their father's death: but the injuries their father had ſuffered could ſcarcely be imputed by them to the King, who, beſides his youth, was, at that time, under abſolute ſubjection to the violence of a faction; and had afterwards endeavoured to repair the wrongs done to the father, by conferring benefits on the children. Three of Earl Gowrie's attendants, who were executed at Perth, for aſſiſting him in the attack upon the King's ſervants, could give no light into the motives by which their maſter was actuated. Andrew Henderſon, the Earl's ſteward, who, upon a promiſe of pardon, confeſſed himſelf to be the man that had been placed in the ſtudy by Gowrie's command, did not know for what end that ſtation had been aſſigned him (23). The whole tranſaction appeared ſo dark, that when the account of it was carried to Edinburgh, and the miniſters of that city were commanded, by the Privy Council, to return public thanks to God, for the protection he had ſo viſibly afforded the King in the late conſpiracy, they refuſed to enter into any detail of particulars. They offered to give public thanks for the King's ſafety, but alleged, that they could not deliver from the pulpit, what appeared to be dubious and uncertain. At length, however (Mr. Robert Bruce excepted), they were all prevailed upon, though with great difficulty, to own that they were convinced of the truth of the conſpiracy. No ſcruples appeared in the proceedings of Parliament. The puniſhment due to traitors was inflicted on the dead bodies of the two brothers; their eſtates and honours were forfeited; the ſurname of Ruthven was aboliſhed; and the fifth of Auguſt was appointed to be obſerved annually, as a day of public thankſgiving (24). James appointed alſo, after his acceſſion to the throne of England, a weekly commemoration of his deliverance, by a Tueſday's ſermon at court (25). The diſcoveries of Sprot, if true, undoubtedly proved that the two brothers had not carried on their machinations without aſſociates. Theſe diſcoveries were extorted from him, partly by torture, and partly by voluntary confeſſion; but he adhered to his confeſſion to the laſt.] On the execution of this Sprot, an account of his ſhare in the conſpiracy was publiſhed, with a preface to the reader, ſubſcribed by Dr. Abbot, and almoſt as large as the account itſelf (26). As this little tract is become very ſcarce, it may not be amiſs to give ſome paſſages from it. 'There 'are few in this iſland, ſays he, of any underſtanding, but have heard of the traiterous, and bloody 'attempt of the Earl Gowrie and his brother, againſt 'the perſon, and life, of our moſt bleſſed Sovereign. 'Wherein albeit there were ſuch evidences, and arguments, as that any man who would have taken 'notice thereof, might have been ſufficiently informed therein, even at the very firſt, and afterwards, 'by the clear depoſitions (for moſt pregnant circumſtances) and ample atteſtations of many 'perſons of honour and quality; the parliament 'of that kingdom took full knowledge thereof, 'and accordingly proceeded to the forfeiting of 'the whole eſtate of that Earl, and of his 'heirs for ever: yet ſome humorous men, whom 'in that reſpect I may juſtly term unthankful 'unto God, and undutiful to their King, out of 'fond imaginations, or rather, if you will, ſeditious 'ſuppoſitions of their own, did both at home and 'abroad, by whiſperings and ſecret buzzings into the 'ears of the people (who were better perſuaded of 'them than indeed there was cauſe), employ their 'wits and tongues, to obſcure the truth of that 'matter, and to caſt an imputation where it was 'leaſt deſerved. Which, when God had permitted, 'for the ſpace of ſome years to rankle and feſter in 'the bowels of thoſe who were the authors of it; 'the ſame God, in his wiſdom, at laſt meaning to 'cure them, if they would be cured, of that malady, 'diſcovered that in the ſame treaſon, although 'carried never ſo ſecretly, there were other confederates, of whom hitherto the world had taken no 'kind of knowledge. And albeit two of the perſons 'intereſted in that buſineſs were lately dead, and 'departed unto far greater torment than all the 'earth could lay upon them (unleſs they died repentant), yet it was apprehended, that a third party 'remained, who had foreknowledge of that conſpiracy, and was able to utter much of the ſecrets of 'it: one George Sprot, a notary, inhabiting at 'Ayemouth, a place well known in that county. 'Which matter, or ſome part thereof, being made 'known to an honourable perſon, a moſt faithful 'ſervant to His Majeſty (27): firſt, by ſome words 'that fell from Sprot himſelf, and afterwards, by 'ſome papers found upon him; it was ſo wiſely carried, and ſo prudently brought about, by the 'great care and diligence of that nobleman (God 'Almighty bleſſing the buſineſs) that ſo much was 'revealed, as followeth in this treatiſe, upon the 'acts to be ſeen, which are here ſet down at large, 'word for word, as they agree with the proceſs 'original, and other examinations, that ſuch as 'have been averſe, may at laſt receive ſatisfaction. 'Touching all which I ſhall ſay nothing, but only 'report that which befel upon the day of his death, 'when he ſuffered for that treaſon. Having then 'the ſentence paſſed on him, upon Friday, Auguſt '12, 1608, in the forenoon, and publicly being 'warned to prepare himſelf to his end, which muſt 'be that day after dinner, he moſt willingly ſubmitted 'himſelf unto that puniſhment, which (as he then 'acknowledged) he had juſtly deſerved. And being left to himſelf, till dinner time was expired, 'then came to him into that private place where he 'remained, ſome of the reverend biſhops, diverſe 'lords of the Seſſion (28), two of the Engliſh miniſters, there employed by his majeſty, with diverſe other miniſters of the town of Edinburgh. 'Before whom he firſt acknowledged and avouched 'his former confeſſion to be true, and that he would 'die in the ſame; and then falling on his knees, in 'a corner of that room where he and they then 'were, in a prayer to God uttered aloud, he ſo paſſionately deplored his former wickedneſs, but eſpecially that ſin of his, for which he was to die, 'that a man may juſtly ſay, he did, in a ſort, deject and caſt down himſelf to the gates of Hell, as 'if he ſhould there have been ſwallowed up in the 'gulph

Together with his conſtant and extraordinary Behaviour at his Death, in Edinburgh, Auguſt 12, 1608. Written and ſet forth by Sir William Hart, Knight, Lord Juſtice of Scotland. Whereby appeareth the treaſonable device betwixt John, Earl of Gowry, and Robert Logane, of Reſtalrig (commonly called Leſterig), plotted by them for the cruel murthering of our moſt gracious Sovereign. Before which treatiſe, is prefixed alſo a preface, written by George Abbot, Doctor of Divinity, and Dean of Wincheſter; who was preſent at the ſaid Sprot's execution. London, printed by Melch. once into the wide ſea of politics, and inſtead of ſatisfying the King's ſcruples, excited new jealouſies and apprehenſions, as appears by a very ſingular letter written by him to

'gulph of deſperation: yet, preſently laying 'hold upon the mercies of God in Chriſt, he 'raiſed himſelf, and ſtrangely lifted up his ſoul 'unto the throne of grace, applying joy and com-'fort to his own heart ſo effectually, as cannot well 'be deſcribed. In the admitting of this conſolation 'into his inward man, he burſt out into tears, ſo 'plentifully flowing from him, that for a time they 'ſtopped his voice. The ſight, and hearing where-'of, wrought ſo forcible an impreſſion in thoſe per-'ſons of honour, and learned men, who beheld him, 'that there was ſcarce any one of them, who could 'refrain tears in the place, as diverſe of themſelves 'that day did witneſs unto me (29). ——— After-'ward being brought to the ſcaffold where he was to 'die, he uttered many things, among which, I ob-'ſerved theſe: He acknowledged to the people, 'that he was come thither to ſuffer moſt deſervedly; 'that he had been an offender againſt Almighty 'God, in very many reſpects; but that none of his 'ſins was ſo grievous unto him, as that for which 'he muſt die; wherein, notwithſtanding he was not 'an actor, but a concealer only: That he was in-'gyred (involved) in it by the Laird of Raſtal-'rig, and his ſervant, the Laird of Bour, both 'which, he ſaid, were men that profeſſed not reli-'gion. Whereupon he exhorted men to take heed, 'how they accompanied with ſuch as are not reli-'gious; becauſe, ſaid he, with ſuch as make not 'profeſſion of religion, there is no faith, no truth, 'no holding of their word, as himſelf had tried and 'found. But touching the treaſon, for the con-'cealing whereof he was condemned, he added, 'that he was preſerved alive to open that ſecret 'myſtery which ſo long had lain hid. That God 'had kept him ſince that attempt of the Earl Gow-'rie, from very many dangers, but notedly from 'one, when being in apparent hazard of drowning, 'he was ſtrangely delivered; which, ſaid he, was 'God's work, that I might remain alive unto this 'happy and bleſſed day, that the truth might be 'made known. And now I confeſs my fault, to the 'ſhame of myſelf, and to the ſhame of the devil; 'but to the glory of God. And I do it not either 'for fear of death, or for any hope of life (for I 'have deſerved to die, and am unworthy to live), 'but becauſe it is the truth, which I ſhall ſeal with 'my blood. My fault, ſaith he, is ſo great, that 'if I had a thouſand lives, and could die ten thou-'ſand deaths, yet I might not make ſatisfaction, 'that I ſhould conceal ſuch a treaſon againſt ſo gra-'cious a King. Theſe, and the like words, when 'he had ſpoken upon one ſide of the ſcaffold, he 'turned him to the ſecond ſide, and afterwards to the 'third (that all the people might hear), where he 'ſpake to the ſame purpoſe as formerly he had 'done (30). ——— And here, being told by the 'ſaid miniſters, and other perſons of quality, that 'being ſo near his departure out of the world, it con-'cerned him to ſpeak nothing but the truth, and 'that upon the peril of his ſoul: he anſwered, that 'to the end that they ſhould know that he had 'ſpoken nothing but the verity, and that his confeſ-'ſion was true in every reſpect, he would (at the laſt 'gaſp) give them ſome apparent token for the con-'firmation of the ſame. Then fitting himſelf to 'the ladder, the executioner cometh to him, and as 'the manner is, aſking forgiveneſs of him; "with "all my heart," ſaith he, "for you do but your "office, and it is the thing I deſire; becauſe ſuffer-"ing in my body, I ſhall in my ſoul be joined to "my Saviour." Aſcending up to the ladder, 'he deſired the people to ſing a pſalm with 'him, which they did with many a weeping 'eye. He named the 6th pſalm, and beginning, 'or taking it up himſelf, in every verſe or line 'thereof, he went before the people, ſinging both 'loud and tunably unto the very end. Then once 'again confirming and avowing his former confeſ-'ſion, he covered his own face, and commending 'his ſoul to God, he was turned off the ladder; 'where hanging by the neck ſome little while, he 'three ſeveral times, gave a loud clap with his hands, 'that all the ſtanders-by might hear, which was the 'ſign or token (as it ſeemeth) which he a little be-'fore had ſaid, that he ſhould give at his laſt gaſp, 'for the ratification and avowing of thoſe things 'which by his confeſſion he had ſo many times de-'clared and delivered. Theſe things were done in 'the open ſight of the ſun, in the King's capital 'town, at the market-croſs in Edinburgh, in the pre-'ſence of diverſe thouſands of all ſorts; of the no-'bility, of the clergy, of the gentry, of the burgeſſes, 'of women and children; myſelf, with the reſt of 'the Engliſh miniſters, ſtanding by, and looking 'on, and giving God the glory, that after ſo long 'a ſpace as eight years and eight days (for ſo it was 'by juſt computation, after the attempt of Gowrie) 'he was pleaſed to give ſo noble a teſtimony unto 'that, which by ſome maligners had been ſecretly 'called in queſtion, without any ground or reaſon. 'I have reported at length, thoſe particulars, which 'I heard and ſaw; which that honourable perſonage 'who wrote this treatiſe following, doth ſomewhat 'more briefly deliver, but yet both of us very truly, 'as thouſands can witneſs (31).'

[It is remarkable, that Archbiſhop Spotſwood ſhould have paid no regard to the confeſſion of G. Sprot. 'Whether or not,' ſays he, 'I ſhould 'mention the arraignment and execution of George 'Sprot, notary, in Eymouth, who ſuffered at Edin-'burgh in the Auguſt preceding, I am doubtful; 'his confeſſion, though voluntary and conſtant, 'carrying ſmall probability. This man had de-'poned, "That he knew Robert Logan of Reſtal-"rig, who was dead two years before, to have "been privy to Gowrie's conſpiracy, and that he "underſtood ſo much by a letter that fell into his "hand, written by Reſtalrig to Gowry, bearing "that he would take part with him in the revenge "of his father's death; and that the beſt courſe "ſhould be to bring the King by ſea to Faſcaſtle, "where he might be ſafely kept, till advertiſement "came from thoſe with whom the earl kept intelli-"gence." It ſeemed a very fiction, and to be a 'mere invention of the man's own brain; for 'neither did he ſhew the letter, nor could any wiſe 'man think that Gowry, who went about that 'treaſon ſo ſecretly, would have communicated the 'matter with ſuch a man as this Reſtalrig was 'known to be. As ever it was, the man remained 'conſtant in his confeſſion; and at his dying, when 'he was to be caſt off the ladder (for he was hanged 'in the public ſtreet of Edinburgh), promiſed to 'give the beholders a ſign for confirming them in 'the truth of what he had ſpoken; which alſo he 'performed, by clapping his hands three ſeveral 'times after he was caſt off by the executioner (32).'

(32) Spotſwood's Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland, p. 509, 3d edition.

The diſcoveries of Sprot, however, were not only credited at that time, but have been conſidered as authentic by two of the lateſt hiſtorians of Scotland, Dr. Robertſon and Mr. Guthrie. There is ſcarcely any thing, in the whole hiſtory of that country, which is attended with greater difficulties and perplexities than Gowrie's conſpiracy. The moſt judicious, as well as the beſt written, account of this extraordinary event, ſeems to be that which we have in Dr. Robertſon; part of whoſe relation of it has already been given (33); and whoſe reflections upon it, together with his ingenious and plauſible conjecture, with relation to the motive and object of Earl Gowrie's attempt upon the perſon of King James, we ſhall inſert; as they cannot fail of being acceptable to our Readers. 'But though it be thus unex-'pectedly diſcovered that Gowrie did not act with-'out aſſociates (referring to Sprot's confeſſion), 'little additional light is thrown, by this diſcovery, 'on the motives and intention of his conduct. It 'appears almoſt incredible that two young men of 'ſuch diſtinguiſhed virtue ſhould revolt all at once 'from their duty, and attempt a crime ſo atrocious 'as the murder of their ſovereign. It appears ſtill 'more improbable, that they ſhould have concerted 'their undertaking with ſo little foreſight and pru-'dence. If they intended that the deed ſhould 'have remained concealed, they could not have 'choſen a more improper ſcene for executing it than 'their own houſe. If they intended that Henderſon 'ſhould have ſtruck the blow, they could not have 'pitched on a man more deſtitute of the courage, to Dr. Abbot, upon this ſubject [G]. It does not appear what effect this letter of the King's produced; but in all probability it anſwered his majeſty's end in writing it, as it is an inconteſtible proof of the confidence he had in the perſon it was written to. At leaſt thus much is certain, that Dean Abbot ſtood ſo high in the King's favour, that on the

'that muſt direct the hand of an aſſaſſin; nor could 'they expect that he, unſolicited, and unacquainted 'with their purpoſe, would venture on ſuch a de'ſperate action. If Ruthven meant to ſtab the King 'with his own hand, why did he withdraw the dag'ger, after it was pointed at his breaſt? How could 'he leave the King after ſuch a plain declaration of 'his intention? Was it not prepoſterous to com'mit him to the keeping of ſuch a timid and falſe 'aſſociate as Henderſon? For what purpoſe did he 'waſte the time, in binding the hands of an unarm'ed man, whom he might eaſily have diſpatched 'with his ſword? Had Providence permitted them 'to embrue their hands in the blood of their ſove'reign, what advantage could have accrued to them 'by his death? and what claims or pretenſions could 'they have oppoſed to the rights of his children? 'Inevitable and inſtant vengeance, together with 'perpetual infamy, were the only conſequences they 'could expect to follow ſuch a crime.

'On the other hand, it is impoſſible to believe that 'the King had formed any deſign againſt the life of 'the two brothers. They had not incurred his in'dignation, by any crime; and were in no degree 'the objects of his jealouſy or hatred; nor was he of 'a ſpirit ſo ſanguinary, or ſo noted for raſh and de'ſperate valour, as to have attempted to murder them 'in their own houſe, where they were ſurrounded 'with many domeſtics, he only with a ſlender and 'unarmed train; where they could call to their aſ'ſiſtance the inhabitants of a city, at the devotion of 'their family, while he was at a diſtance from all aid; 'and leaſt of all would he have choſen for his aſſoci'ates, in ſuch an enterpriſe, the Earl of Mar, and 'the Duke of Lenox, the former connected in cloſe 'friendſhip with the houſe of Gowrie, and the latter 'married to one of the Earl's ſiſters.

'Whichſoever of theſe oppoſite ſyſtems we em'brace; whether we impute the intention of mur'der to Gowrie, or to the King; inſuperable dif'ficulties ariſe, and we are involved in darkneſs, 'myſtery, and contradictions. Perhaps the ſource 'of the whole conſpirrcy ought to be ſearched for 'deeper, and by deriving it from a more remote 'cauſe, we may diſcover it to be leſs criminal.

'To keep the King of Scots in continual depend'ance, was one great object of Elizabeth's policy. 'In order to this, ſhe ſometimes ſoothed him; and 'ſometimes bribed his miniſters and favourites; and 'when ſhe failed of attaining her end by theſe 'means, ſhe encouraged the clergy to render any ad'miniſtration ſhe diſtruſted unpopular, by decrying 'it, or ſtirred up ſome faction of the nobles to op'poſe, and to overturn it. They, unacquainted 'with the arts of undermining a Miniſtry by in'trigues, had recourſe to the ruder practice of ren'dering themſelves maſters of the King's perſon, 'that they might thereby obtain the directions of his 'councils. Thoſe nobles, who ſeized the King at 'the Raid of Ruthven, were inſtigated and ſup'ported by her. Bothwell, in all his wild attempts, 'enjoyed her protection, and found a retreat in her 'dominions. The connections which James had 'been forming of late with the Roman Catholic 'princes, his ſecret negociations in England with 'her ſubjects, and the maxims by which he govern'ed his own kingdom, all contributed to excite her 'jealouſy. She dreaded ſome great revolution in 'Scotland to be approaching, and it was her inte'reſt to prevent it. The Earl of Gowrie was one 'of the moſt powerful of the Scottiſh nobles, and 'deſcended from anceſtors warmly attached to the 'Engliſh intereſt. He had adopted the ſame ſyſtem, 'and believed the welfare of his country to be in'ſeparably connected with the ſubſiſtence of the al'liance between the two kingdoms. During his 'reſidence at Paris, he had contracted an intimate 'friendſhip with Sir Henry Neville, the Queen's 'ambaſſador there, and was recommended by him 'to his court, as a perſon of whom great uſe might 'be made. Elizabeth received him, as he paſſed 'through England, with diſtinguiſhed marks of re'ſpect and favour. From all theſe circumſtances, 'a ſuſpicion may ariſe, that the plan of the con'ſpiracy againſt the King was formed at that time, 'in concert with her. Such a ſuſpicion prevailed in 'that age, and from the letters of Nicolſon, Eliza'beth's agent in Scotland, it appears not to be 'deſtitute of foundation. An Engliſh ſhip was ob'ſerved hovering, for ſome time, in the mouth of 'the frith of Forth. The Earl's two younger 'brothers fled into England, after the ill ſucceſs of 'the conſpiracy, and were protected by Elizabeth. 'And James himſelf, though he prudently con'cealed it, took great umbrage at her behaviour. 'None, however, of Elizabeth's intrigues in Scot'land tended to hurt the King's perſon, but only 'to circumſcribe his authority, and to thwart 'his ſchemes. His life was the ſureſt ſafeguard of 'her own, and reſtrained the Popiſh pretenders to 'her crown, and their abettors, from deſpe'rate attempts, to which their impatience and 'bigotry might, otherwiſe, have urged them on. 'To have encouraged Gowrie to murder his ſove'reign, would, on her part, have been an act of 'the utmoſt imprudence. Nor does this ſeem to 'have been the intention of the two brothers. Mr. 'Ruthven, firſt of all, endeavoured to decoy the 'King to Perth, without any attendants. When 'theſe proved more numerous than was expected, 'the Earl employed a ſtratagem in order to ſeparate 'them from the King, by pretending that he had rode 'away towards Falkland, and by calling haſtily for 'their horſes, that they might follow him. But 'ſhutting James up, mean while, in a diſtant corner 'of the houſe, and by attempting to bind his hands, 'their deſign ſeems to have been rather to ſeize, 'than to aſſaſſinate him. And though Gowrie had 'not collected his followers, ſo as to have been 'able to detain him long a priſoner in that part of 'the kingdom by open force, he might ſoon have 'been conveyed aboard the Engliſh ſhip, which 'waited perhaps to receive him, and he might have 'been landed at Faſt-Caſtle, a houſe of Logan's, 'in which, according to many obſcure hints in his 'letters, ſome rendezvous of the conſpirators was 'to be held. Amidſt the ſurpriſe and terror, into 'which the King muſt have been thrown by the 'violence offered to him, it was extremely natural 'for him to conclude that his life was ſought. It 'was the intereſt of all his followers to confirm him 'in this belief, and to magnify his danger, in order 'to add to the importance and merit of their own 'ſervices. And thus his fear, and their vanity, 'aided by the credulity and wonder, which the con'templation of any great and tragical event, when 'not fully underſtood, is apt to inſpire, augmented 'the whole tranſaction. On the other hand, the ex'travagance and improbability of the circumſtances, 'which were added, detracted from the credit of 'thoſe, which really happened; and even furniſhed 'pretences for calling in queſtion the truth of the 'whole conſpiracy.']

[G] A very ſingular letter written by him to Dr. Abbot, upon this ſubject.] This letter from the King to Dr. Abbot, was firſt publiſhed on occaſion of the famous diſpute between Dr. Sherlock, Dean of St. Paul's, and his adverſaries, on his taking the oaths to King William III., after ſome heſitation, and grounding the defence of his conduct on (Biſhop) Overall's Convocation Book (34). It is not neceſſary here, to enter at all into the merits of that diſpute: but as the letter has a cloſe connection with the hiſtory of the Archbiſhop's life, the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee it (35).

'Good Dr. Abbot,

'I Cannot abſtain to give you my judgment of 'the proceedings in the convocation, as you will 'call it; and both as rex in ſolio, and unus gregis in eccleſia, I am doubly concerned. My title to the 'crown, nobody calls in queſtion, but they that 'neither love you nor me, and you may gueſs whom 'I mean; all that you, and your brethren, have ſaid 'of the death of Dr. Overton, Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, which happened the latter end of April 1609, his majeſty thought of Dr. Abbot as his ſucceſſor, and he was accordingly conſecrated Biſhop of thoſe united ſees, on December 3, in the ſame year (z). But this, it ſeems, did not appear in the King's eyes a ſufficient recompence, for the ſervices rendered him by ſo able a man; and therefore, before he had ſat a month in this biſhoprick, he was tranſlated to London, that ſee becoming void by the death of Dr. Thomas Ravis, and he was accordingly removed thither on the 20th of January following (a). It was but a ſhort time that he poſſeſſed both theſe biſhopricks, and yet in that ſhort time, he ſo remarkably diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the diligent performance of his function, by conſtant preaching, and by expreſſing the utmoſt readineſs to promote learning and learned men, that he obtained a general good character, as appears from ſeveral memorials of thoſe times (b) [H]. While the good biſhop was thus employed, a new opportunity offered of the King's teſtifying his eſteem of, and confidence in, this worthy perſon, by the Archiepiſcopal See of Canterbury's becoming vacant, as it did, on the 2d of November 1610, by the death of Dr. Richard Bancroft (c). The court Biſhops immediately caſt their eyes upon the celebrated Dr. Lancelot Andrews, then Biſhop of Ely, and pointed him out to the King, as one ſufficiently qualified to take upon him the government of the Church; and they thought this recommendation, joined to the King's known regard for the parts and piety of this eminent man, enough to ſecure his promotion to the Primacy (d). But either the King himſelf thought of the Biſhop of London, or he was propoſed to him by his old friend and patron, the Earl of Dunbar; and therefore, without taking the advice of thoſe prelates, his majeſty preferred Biſhop Abbot to the throne of Canterbury, in which he was ſeated on the 9th of April, 1611 (e); and on the 23d of June following, was ſworn of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy council (f). Thus we ſee him, before he had arrived at the age of fifty, exalted to the higheſt dignity in the Church, and celebrated

Your good friend,

JAMES R.

[H] As appears from ſeveral memorials of thoſe times.] While he was Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, it appears that he ſolicited Archbiſhop Bancroft, to beſtow a prebend upon Dr. Thomas James, who was Sir Thomas Bodley's Librarian at Oxford (36). In the year 1610, Thomas Tiſdale, of Glimpton, in Oxfordſhire, Eſq; bequeathed five thouſand pounds to Dr. George Abbot, then Biſhop of London, Sir John Bennet, and Dr. Array, to purchaſe lands for the maintenance of ſeven fellows and ſix ſcholars; which money was laid out in the purchaſe of two hundred and fifty pounds a year. Afterwards, Richard Wightwick, B. D. rector of Eaſt-Iſle, in Berkſhire, gave lands to the yearly value of one hundred pounds, for the maintenance of three fellows, and four ſcholars; upon which, the truſtees beforementioned having repaired, and in a manner rebuilt Broad-Gate-Hall, in Oxford, procured, in the reign of King James, upon their petition ſetting forth theſe facts, a charter of Mortmain, for ſeven hundred pounds per annum, to this new foundation, which was called Pembroke College (37), in reſpect to William, Earl of Pembroke, then Chancellor of the Univerſity; and for our Prelate's activity in accompliſhing this affair, Dr. Thomas Clayton, who was the firſt maſter of the new college, wrote him a very handſome letter of acknowledgment, which is ſtill extant (38). In Auguſt 1610, he conſecrated the new church-yard on the weſt ſide of the Fleet-Ditch, the ground of which had been given to the inhabitants of St. Bride's pariſh, by the Earl of Dorſet (39). His zeal, and indefatigable diligence, in the public exerciſe of his function, was ſo remarkable, and the conduct of his private life ſo exemplary, as well as irreproachable, that we find him celebrated by a poet of that time, for uniting the wiſdom of the ſerpent, with the innocency of the dove (40); which was not only true of him then, but in the whole ſucceeding courſe of his life; wherein it may be truly ſaid, that as his abilities raiſed him to preferment, ſo nothing but his rigid virtue and incorruptible probity expoſed him to thoſe ſtorms of envy and malice, which, however they might affect his fortune, could never ſhake his conſtancy, or prejudice his reputation.

by one of his contemporaries, and a biſhop too, for his learning, eloquence, and indefatigable diligence in preaching and writing, notwithſtanding the great burthen that lay upon him, from the neceſſary attendance on the duties of his high office; eſpecially preſiding in the high commiſſion court, which ſat weekly at his palace, and his regular aſſiſting at the council, which, while his health permitted, he never failed (g). At this time he was in the higheſt favour both with Prince and People; and appears to have had a principal hand in all the great tranſactions in Church and State. He was never eſteemed exceſſively fond of power, or deſirous of carrying his prerogative, as Primate of England, to an extraordinary height; yet as ſoon as he had taken poſſeſſion of the archbiſhoprick, he ſhewed a ſteady reſolution in the maintenance of the rights of the high commiſſion court, and would not ſubmit to Lord Coke's prohibitions (b). He likewiſe ſhewed his concern for the intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion abroad, by procuring his majeſty's application to the States General, againſt Conrade Vorſtius, whom they called to the Profeſſorſhip of Leyden (i); in which affair Sir Ralph Winwood was employed; and when it was found difficult to obtain from the States that ſatisfaction which the King deſired, his Grace, in conjunction with the Lord Treaſurer Saliſbury, framed an expedient for contenting both parties (k) [I]. In all probability this alarmed ſome of the warm churchmen at home, who were by no means pleaſed with the King's diſcountenancing abroad thoſe opinions which themſelves favoured in both univerſities. But whatever their ſentiments upon this matter might be, Archbiſhop Abbot ſeems to have had as great concern for the church as any of them, when he thought it really in danger, as appears by a ſhort and plain letter of his to Sir Ralph Winwood, about one Mr. Amias, who had been appointed preacher in the Engliſh congregation at the Hague, of whom the Biſhop ſays, that he was a fit perſon to breed up the captains and ſoldiers there in mutiny and faction, and, conſequently, very unfit for his office (l). His great concern for the true intereſt of religion, made him a zealous promoter of the match between the Elector Palatine, and the Princeſs Elizabeth; and that Prince coming here in October 1612 (m), his Grace thought fit to invite the nobility that attended him to an entertainment, at his archiepiſcopal palace at Lambeth, where, though uninvited and unexpected, the Elector himſelf reſorted, to ſhew his great reſpect for the Archbiſhop, and was ſo well pleaſed with his welcome, that when he feaſted the members of the privy council at Eſſex Houſe, he ſhewed particular reſpect to the Archbiſhop, and thoſe who attended

[I] Framed an expedient for contenting both parties.] [If the Archbiſhop took ſo active a part in the affair of Conrade Vorſtius as is here repreſented, his Grace's conduct was far from meriting the approbation beſtowed upon it. But the ingenious author of the Confeſſional endeavours to ſhew, that there is no ſufficient proof of King James's having been inſtigated by Dr. Abbot, to act againſt Vorſtius (41). This, however, is aſſerted by Brandt, whoſe words are as follows. 'At laſt, ſome found means, by 'the aſſiſtance of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, 'to engage King James, who then paſſed for the 'moſt learned Prince of his age, in the quarrel 'againſt Vorſtius (42).' Sir Ralph Winwood, likewiſe, in a letter from the Hague to Mr. Trumbull, Engliſh reſident at Bruſſels, in which ſome account is given of the diſputes occaſioned in Holland, by Vorſtius's book De Attributis Dei, ſays; 'The knowledge whereof being come to the 'notice of our Lord of Canterbury, out of the care 'he hath to preſerve religion in its antient purity 'and integrity, he hath ſo far prevailed with his 'Majeſty, that from him I have had charge publicly to proteſt againſt the reception of this Vorſtius, which I have done in the aſſembly of the 'States General (43).'

Theſe are reſpectable authorities; and will be found the more deſerving of credit, when we conſider the Archbiſhop's known averſion to Arminianiſm, and his perſuaſion of that doctrine's being favourable to popery. Nevertheleſs, it is highly probable that James the Firſt's zeal in the affair might carry him farther than was agreeable to the natural moderation of Dr. Abbot's temper. This may fairly be collected from a letter of the Earl of Saliſbury to Sir Ralph Winwood, in which, after relating the pains that had been taken by Sir Noel Caron, the Dutch Ambaſſador, to moderate the King in the caſe of Vorſtius, the Earl adds; 'But, 'Sir, all was ſpoken to a deaf ear; for Almighty 'God doth know the zeal which ſtirreth the King 'againſt that man, ſo kindles in him upon every 'accident of diſcourſe, as we have all reaſon to 'bleſs God in making us ſubject to a King, that, 'without mixture of glory or private deſign, taketh 'ſo much to heart the injury that is done to the 'bleſſed Trinity.' The expedient, referred to in the text, will be fully explained by the following extract from the ſame letter. 'I have entered into 'thought and conferred with my Lord of Canter'bury, what expedient might be found out to ac'commodate things to all parties contentments, 'and have at length reſolved of this courſe, which 'we have cauſed in our two names to be imparted 'to Sir Noel Caron; and you may conceive, that 'we would not have ventured upon it but with 'underhand warrant: That ſeeing the States are 'reſolved to hear Vorſtius, as being enforced thereto 'by the liberty of their countries to yield therein 'unto him; ſo the States do ſuſpend any preſent 'judgment, until they may have ſent the whole 'proceſs of the cauſe in writing abroad to the 'churches of France, Geneva, Switzerland, the 'Palatinate, and Heſſen, to underſtand their ad'vices and opinions in it; that ſo the States may 'thereby be the better grounded to paſs their de'finitive ſentence afterwards, either for or againſt 'Vorſtius: but with this condition, that after Vor'ſtius ſhall have been heard, he be forthwith ſent 'out of the United Provinces, until the States 'ſhall reſolve (upon knowledge of the opinions of 'the churches as aforeſaid), to paſs their definitive ſentence; for if he be found to be an heretic, 'we aſſure ourſelves the States will not receive 'him; if not, his Majeſty hath no cauſe to take 'exceptions againſt him. So that you may obſerve 'theſe gradations which are required; firſt to ſend 'Vorſtius preſently out of Leyden (though it be 'but to ſome other of their towns), until the 'hearing; and after the hearing to ſend him out 'of the provinces, until the States do pronounce 'their ſentence conformable to the opinions of the 'churches; and ſo either keep him out for ever, 'or reſtore him if he be innocent (44).' Among other cauſes of the King's oppoſition to Vorſtius, reaſon of ſtate has been aſſigned; but nothing of that ſort appears in Winwood's Memorials. The whole affair ſeems to have originated in religious opinion and prejudice; and ſcarcely any thing can ſet James the Firſt's pedantry and bigotry in a more contemptible light, than his interfering ſo warmly in ſuch an inſignificant concern as the appointment made by a foreign power to a profeſſorſhip of divinity in one of its own univerſities.]

him (n). [The feſtivity occaſioned by the arrival of the Elector Palatine was interrupted, for a time, by the illneſs and death of Henry, Prince of Wales, who departed this life on the 6th of November, in the 19th year of his age; and our prelate had the melancholy offices of attending that accompliſhed prince in his dying moments, and of preaching his funeral ſermon (o).] On the fourteenth of February following, the marriage of the Elector with the Princeſs Elizabeth was ſolemnized with great ſplendor, the Archbiſhop performing the ceremony on a ſtage erected in the middle of the royal chapel; and on the tenth of April, his Electoral Highneſs returned to Germany (p); but before his departure, he made a preſent of plate to the Archbiſhop, of the value of a thouſand pounds, as a mark of the juſt ſenſe he had of the pains his Grace had taken in accompliſhing his marriage; and as an additional mark of his confidence, he wrote to him from Canterbury, in relation to the cauſes of that diſcontent with which he left England (q) [K]. The concern his majeſty had ſhewn for removing Arminius firſt, and then Vorſtius, had given their favourers in Holland ſo much uneaſineſs, that the famous Hugo Grotius, the great champion of their cauſe, was ſent over to England, to endeavour to mitigate the King's diſpleaſure, and, if poſſible, to give him a better opinion of the Remonſtrants, as they began then to be called; and we have a very ſingular account of the man, and of his negotiation, from the pen of the Archbiſhop (r) [L]. In the ſpring of the year 1613, the affair of the Charterhouſe was ſettled, and at the cloſe of the month of June, his Grace, and the reſt of the truſtees [K] To the cauſes of that diſcontent, with which he left England.] The Prince Elector Palatine, a little before he left England, addreſſed himſelf to the King, in hopes of obtaining the enlargement of the Lord Gray, who had been a long time a priſoner in the Tower. But this application ſo little pleaſed the King, that he told him roundly in anſwer, he marvelled, how he ſhould become ſuitor for a man whom he neither knew, or ever ſaw; to which the Prince Elector anſwered, that this was true, but that he was recommended to him by his uncles, the Duke de Boüillon, Prince Maurice of Naſſau, and Count Henry, who were well acquainted with him. In all probability, this, inſtead of giving the King ſatisfaction, filled him with new apprehenſions; for his reply was in a very quick ſtile: Son, ſaid he, when I come into Germany, I promiſe you not to importune you for any of your priſoners. This was ſo far from operating favourably in behalf of Lord Gray, that he was ſoon after more cloſely reſtrained, upon pretence of ſome private converſation he had with one of Lady Arabella's women, which proved after all to be no more than an amorous intrigue. Theſe particulars we learn from a letter written by Mr. Chamberlaine to Sir Ralph Winwood, dated May 6, 1613, and he adds, 'It is thought the Prince Palatine went not away ſo well ſatisfied, being refuſed in diverſe ſuits and requeſts; and I hear that from Canterbury he wrote to the Archbiſhop, complaining, That the King did not uſe him like a ſon, but rather like a youngling, or childiſh youth, not to be regarded (45).

(45) Winwood's Memorials, Vol. iii. p. 454.

[L] Of the man, and of his negociation, from the pen of the Archbiſhop.] This is contained in a letter from his Grace to Sir Ralph Winwood, dated June 1, 1613, from Lambeth: it contains a great variety of curious particulars, ſome of which follow (46). 'You muſt take heed, how you truſt Dr. Grotius too far, for I perceive him to be ſo addicted to ſome partialities in thoſe parts, that he feareth not to laſh, ſo it may ſerve a turn. At his firſt coming to the King, by reaſon of his good Latin tongue, he was ſo tedious, and full of tittle-tattle, that the King's judgment was of him, that he was ſome pedant, full of words, and of no great judgment. And I myſelf, diſcovering that to be his habit, as if he did imagine that every man was bound to hear him, ſo long as he would talk, (which is a great burthen to men replete with buſineſs) did privately give him notice thereof, that he ſhould plainly, and directly, deliver his mind, or elſe he would make the King weary of him. This did not ſo take place, but that afterwards he fell to it again, as was eſpecially obſerved one night at ſupper at the Lord Biſhop of Ely's, whither being brought by Mr. Caſaubon (as I think), my Lord intreated him to ſtay ſupper, which he did. There was preſent Dr. Steward, and another Civilian, unto whom he flings out ſome queſtion of that profeſſion, and was ſo full of words, that Dr. Steward afterwards told my Lord, that he did perceive by him, that, like a ſmatterer, he had ſtudied ſome two or three queſtions, whereof when he came in company he muſt be talking to vindicate his ſkill; but if he were put from thoſe, he would ſhew himſelf but a ſimple fellow. There was preſent alſo, Dr. Richardſon, the King's profeſſor of divinity in Cambridge, and another Doctor in that faculty, with whom he falleth in alſo about ſome of thoſe queſtions, which are now controverted among the miniſters in Holland. And being matters wherein he was ſtudied, he uttered all his ſkill concerning them: my Lord of Ely ſitting ſtill at the ſupper all the while, and wondering what a man he had there, who never being in the place or company before, could overwhelm them ſo with talk for ſo long a time. I write this unto you ſo largely, that you may know the diſpoſition of the man, and how kindly he uſed my Lord of Ely, for his good entertainment.——You will aſk me what is this to you? I muſt tell you therefore, that you ſhall not be without your part. At the ſame time that Sir Noel Caron was together with Grotius, being now to take his leave of the King, it was deſired of his majeſty, that he would not haſtily give his judgment concerning points of religion, now in difference in Holland, for that his majeſty had information but of one ſide, and that his Ambaſſador did deal partially, making all reports in favour of the one ſide, and ſaying nothing at all for the other. For he might have let his majeſty know, how factious a generation theſe contradicters are; how they are like to our puritans in England; how refractory they are to the authority of the civil magiſtrate, and other things of like nature, as I wrote you in my former letter. I doubt not but Grotius had his part in this information, whereout I conceive you will make ſome uſe, keeping theſe things privately to yourſelf, as becometh a man of your employment. When his majeſty told me this, I gave ſuch an anſwer as was fit; and now upon the receipt of your letters, ſhall upon the firſt occaſion give further ſatisfaction. All things reſt there as they did, and I, as ready to do you all the good offices, remain, &c.

'GEORGE, Cant.'

(46) Winwood's Memorials, Vol. iii. p. 459.

[This letter concerning Grotius, which certainly ſhews how much the Archbiſhop was miſtaken with regard to that great man, hath been thought to reflect ſome diſcredit on our prelate. But the writer of the Confeſſional obſerves in his behalf, that 'his diſaffection to Grotius was owing to the endeavours and propoſals of the latter, towards a coalition of the proteſtants and papiſts, which every wiſe and conſiſtent proteſtant, in every period ſince the reformation, as well as Abbot, has conſidered as a Suare, and treated accordingly.' This author farther remarks, that 'the worſt truſtees, took poſſeſſion of that place, purſuant to the will of Mr. Sutton (s); and if this gave the Archbiſhop, as no doubt it did, great ſatisfaction, an affair that happened about the ſame time diſturbed him not a little. This was the famous caſe of divorce between the Lady Frances Howard, daughter to the Earl of Suffolk, and Robert, Earl of Eſſex, her huſband; which has been always conſidered as one of the greateſt blemiſhes of King James's reign, though the part acted therein by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury added much to the reputation he had already acquired, for unſhaken and incorruptible integrity [M]. The circumſtances that attended this affair might poſſibly leſſen the King's favour to him in ſome reſpects, but he ſtill retained a great ſhare of it, as appears by the raiſing of his brother to the ſee of Saliſbury, in the year 1615 (t); but with Queen Anne, he ſtood always on the beſt terms poſſible (u). He made uſe of his intereſt with her majeſty, when all other applications had failed, to engage her to recommend Mr. George Villiers, ſo well known afterwards in the world, to his majeſty's favour, for which at that time the young man was ſo grateful as to call him father (w), and to deſire

'worſt part of Grotius's character, in the preceding 'letter, is taken from the report of others; and 'might make the worſe impreſſion upon the Arch-'biſhop's mind, as his Grace was aware of the 'pernicious tendency of Grotius's negociations with 'James and his Arminianizing prelates, particularly 'by his joining with the latter in advancing max-'ims in favour of arbitrary power (47).' Theſe obſervations are important; but it may ſtill be doubted, whether they will entirely exculpate the good prelate from the charge of prejudice againſt thoſe who had embraced the tenets of Arminius; which tenets in themſelves may be as little connected with any peculiar principles of government, as the oppoſite theological opinions.

(47) Confeſſional, p. 285. Note.

It has been imagined, upon the foundation of a letter written by Caſaubon to Grotius, that the Archbiſhop expreſſed his approbation of an edict, publiſhed by the States of Holland in 1614, relating to the Gomariſts and Arminians; which was intended to reſtore peace between the contending parties; and was conſidered by many as too favourable to the remonſtrants. If he did approve of it, he ſcarcely acted in perfect conſiſtency with his known principles. But the fact appears to be queſtionable, even from Caſaubon's own account; and the Confeſſionaliſt hath produced good reaſons to evince, that no approbation of the formula contained in the edict was ever ſhewn it by our worthy prelate (48).]

[M] Unſhaken and incorruptible integrity.] This affair of the divorce was by the King referred to a court of delegates, conſiſting of his Grace the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Coventry and Litchfield, and Rocheſter, Sir Julius Cæſar, Sir Thomas Parrey, Sir Daniel Dunn, Dr. John Bennet, Dr. Francis James, and Dr. Thomas Edwards. This affair was drawn out into a great length, and many accidents happened in the courſe of it, which gave the Archbiſhop infinite diſquiet. He ſaw plainly, that the King was very deſirous the Lady ſhould be divorced, and, on the other hand, he was in his judgment directly againſt the divorce. He laboured all he could to extricate himſelf from theſe difficulties, by having an end put to the cauſe ſome other way than by ſentence, but it was to no purpoſe; for thoſe who drove on this affair, had got too great power to be reſtrained from bringing it to the concluſion they deſired. The Archbiſhop was told, that a predeceſſor of his, which was Archbiſhop Grindall, had ſuffered about Dr. Julio's divorce, and ſo might he; but this, however, did not at all move him. On the contrary, he prepared a ſpeech againſt the nullity of the marriage, which he intended to have ſpoken in the court at Lambeth, September 25, 1613; but he did not make uſe of that ſpeech, becauſe the King ordered them to deliver their opinions in few words. He continued, however, inflexible with regard to his opinion; and therefore, when ſentence was pronounced, the court was divided in the following manner (49).

To juſtify his conduct in this matter, the Archbiſhop drew up the reaſons which induced him to be againſt the ſentence, which King James thought fit to anſwer himſelf, and wrote alſo a letter to him upon that ſubject, in which there are ſome things that are very ſingular, and therefore worthy the reader's notice. 'After that I had fully peruſed 'and rightly conſidered of all your papers, I found 'your principles ſo ſtrange, and your doubts ſo far 'ſought, that I thought it neceſſary, as I have 'already ſaid, to ſet down unto you my obſerva-'tions upon them. But to conclude my letter with 'that plainneſs that becometh one of my quality; 'I muſt freely confeſs, that I find the grounds of 'your oppoſition ſo weak, as I have reaſon to ap-'prehend, that the prejudice you have of the per-'ſons, is the greateſt motive of breeding theſe 'doubts into you; which prejudice is the moſt 'dangerous thing that can fall in a judge, for 'miſleading of his mind. And the reaſon moving 'me to this apprehenſion, is partly grounded upon 'your laſt words to me at your parting from Wind-'ſor, and partly upon a line ſcraped out in your 'paper of doubts, for I am ſure you think me not 'ſo blunt a ſecretary, but that I can read a line 'ſo ſcraped out. In your laſt ſpeeches with me, 'you remember you told me, what aſſurance you 'had of the Earl's ability out of his own mouth, 'which you ſaid you could not but truſt, becauſe 'he was ſo religious a nobleman. But when I told 'you of the other party's contrary affirmation, 'you remember how you uſed the word iniquity; 'and how far your interlined line ſeems to have a 'harmony with this word, yourſelf can beſt judge. 'Now then if I would aſk you, what proof you have 'of the one's religion more than the other's; you 'muſt anſwer me by judging upon the exterior; 'and how deceivable that gueſs is, daily experience 'teaches us: but with a holy proteſtation, that I 'never knew any thing but good of the young 'Earl. Was not this the ground of maſter Robert 'Bruſe's incredulity, becauſe he knew the Earl of 'Gowry to be truly religious, &c. (50)' This letter might and probably did trouble the Archbiſhop: however he perſiſted in the ſame conduct, and never could be brought to do any thing, that might appear ſo much as a tacit approbation of that ſentence; as is moſt evident in the account given of this matter, and all the circumſtances attending it (at leaſt in relation to the Archbiſhop), written by himſelf, and publiſhed within theſe few years (51).

his advice as to his behaviour, which the Archbiſhop very freely gave him; and it had been very happy for him if he had always followed thoſe councils [N]. Towards the cloſe of the next year, the famous Antonio de Dominis, Archbiſhop of Spalato (x), took ſhelter here, from the perſecution with which he was threatened by the Pope, for diſcovering his diſlike both of the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church of Rome, and was very kindly received by his majeſty, who was pleaſed to order the Archbiſhop to entertain him (y), which he did with generous hoſpitality, till he was otherways provided for by the King. In the ſpring of the year 1618, viz. on the ſecond of March, our good Archbiſhop loſt his brother the biſhop of Saliſbury (z); and before his grief was well over for ſo near a relation, he met with freſh diſturbance from the King's declaration for permitting ſports and paſtimes on the Lord's day, which was dated at Greenwich, May 4, 1618 (a). This declaration was ordered to be read in churches, and the Archbiſhop being accidentally at Croydon in Surry when it came thither, had the courage to forbid its being read, which however the king winked at, notwithſtanding there were ſome about him who let no opportunity ſlip of irritating him againſt this prelate (b). [His Grace did a great ſervice this year to the Proteſtant religion, by procuring the manuſcript of Father Paul's excellent hiſtory of the Council of Trent. The perſon employed to negociate the affair was Mr. Nathaniel Brent, who, with no ſmall hazard to himſelf, and to the entire ſatisfaction of the Archbiſhop, found means to convey the whole copy ſafe to England (c).] The council of Dort ſat this year, to which were ſent from hence in the beginning of the month of October four commiſſioners, and amongſt them Dr. Hall, Dean of Wincheſter, with whoſe health the climate of Holland diſagreeing, he returned, and Dr. Goad, the Archbiſhop's chaplain, was ſent in his place (d). The end of this year proved as diſagreeable to the Biſhop as its beginning; in Autumn, the Queen, his gracious miſtreſs, falling ill of that diſtemper, which, after a tedious ſickneſs, brought her to her end on the firſt of March following (e). The Archbiſhop himſelf began alſo to grow infirm; and finding himſelf leſs fit for the affairs of the world than he had been, reſolved, while he had ſtill ſtrength, to enter upon a great and good deſign, which he had long meditated as a teſtimony of affection to his native town of Guilford, where, on the fifth of April 1619, he was preſent when Sir Nicholas Kempe laid the firſt ſtone of his hoſpital, which the Archbiſhop afterwards nobly endowed (f) [O]. It was towards the end of this year, that the Elector Palatine accepted of the crown of Bohemia (g), which occaſioned

[N] If he had always followed thoſe councils.] We have this very remarkable paſſage from the Archbiſhop's own pen, in the diſcourſe he wrote upon his diſgrace, under the reign of King Charles. In that diſcourſe he obſerves, that it was one of King James's maxims, to take no favourite but what was recommended to him by his Queen; that if ſhe afterwards complained of this Dear One, he might anſwer, it is long of yourſelf, for you were the party that commended him unto me. Our old maſter, ſays the Archbiſhop, took delight ſtrangely in things of this nature. He ſays, that Queen Anne was graciouſly pleaſed to give him more credit than ordinary, and therefore when others had ſolicited her in vain, he was applied to; but for ſome time her majeſty would not liſten to his perſuaſions, or think of recommending Villiers, for which ſhe often gave him theſe reaſons. My Lord, you and the reſt of your friends know not what you do. I know your maſter better than you all; for if this young man be once brought in, the firſt perſons that he will plague muſt be you that labour for him, yea, I ſhall have my part alſo; the King will teach him to deſpiſe and hardly intreat us all, that he may ſeem to be beholden to none but himſelf. Noble Queen (cries out the Archbiſhop after reporting this fact) how like a propheteſs did you ſpeak! The reſt of the ſtory being but ſhort, will appear beſt in the Archbiſhop's own words. 'In 'the end, ſays he, upon importunity, Queen Anne 'condeſcended, and ſo preſſed it with the King, 'that he aſſented thereunto; which was ſo ſtricken 'while the iron was hot, that in the Queen's bed-'chamber, the King knighted him with the rapier 'which the Prince did wear. And when the King 'gave order to ſwear him of the bed-chamber, So-'merſet, who was near, importuned the King with 'a meſſage, that he might only be ſworn a Groom; '—— but myſelf and others that were at the door, 'ſent to her majeſty that ſhe would perfect her 'work, and cauſe him to be ſworn a Gentleman 'of the chamber. There is a lord or two living 'that had a hand in this atchievement: I diminiſh 'nothing of their praiſe for ſo happy a work, but 'I know my own part beſt; and on the word of 'an honeſt man, I have reported nothing but truth. 'George went in with the King, but no ſooner he 'got looſe, but he came forth unto me in the privy-'gallery, and there embraced me: he profeſſed that 'he was ſo infinitely bound unto me, that all his 'life long he muſt honour me as his father. And 'now he did beſeech me that I would give ſome 'leſſons how he ſhould carry himſelf. When he 'earneſtly followed this chace, I told him I would 'give him three ſhort leſſons, if he would learn 'them. The firſt was, that daily upon his knees 'he ſhould pray to God to bleſs the King his maſter, 'and to give him (George) grace ſtudiouſly to ſerve 'and pleaſe him. The ſecond was, that he ſhould 'do all good offices between the King and the 'Queen, and between the King and the Prince. 'The third was, that he ſhould fill his maſter's ears 'with nothing but truth. I made him repeat theſe 'three things unto me, and then I would have 'him to acquaint the King with them, and to tell 'me when I met him again, what the King ſaid 'unto him. He promiſed me he would; and the 'morrow after, Mr. Thomas Murrey, the Prince's 'tutor, and I ſtanding together in the gallery at 'Whitehall, Sir George Villiers coming forth and 'drawing to us, he told Mr. Murrey how much he 'was beholden unto me, and that I had given him 'certain inſtructions, which I prayed him to rehearſe, 'as indifferently well he did before us; yea, and 'that he had acquainted the King with them, who 'ſaid, they were inſtructions worthy of an Arch-'biſhop to give to a young man. His countenance 'of thankfulneſs for a few days continued, but 'not long, either to me or any other of his well-'wiſhers. The Roman hiſtorian Tacitus hath ſome-'where a note, That benefits while they may be 'requited ſeem courteſies, but when they are ſo 'high that they cannot be repaid, they prove mat-'ters of hatred (52).'

[O] His hoſpital which he afterwards nobly endowed.] This hoſpital ſtands almoſt over-againſt Trinity Church, built of brick in a quadrangular form, with a noble tower at its entrance, and four

ed great diſputes in King James's councils, ſome deſiring that his majeſty ſhould not interfere in this matter at all, from a foreſight that it would produce a war in Germany; others again, believing that both natural affection to his ſon and daughter, and a juſt concern for the Proteſtant intereſt, ought to have engaged his majeſty warmly to ſupport the new election (b). The Archbiſhop agreed in ſentiment with the laſt-mentioned party, and not being able at that time to attend the privy council, he wrote his mind with great plainneſs and freedom to the Secretary of State [P]. The next year was in a great meaſure ſpent in debates and negociations upon this ſubject, in which the King took a great deal of pains with little effect (i). The Archbiſhop's declining ſtate of health making exerciſe a thing not only convenient but neceſſary for him, he was wont in the ſummer to make a tour into Hampſhire for the ſake of recreation, and being invited by the Lord Zouch to hunt in his park at Bramzil upon the edge of Berkſhire, and not far from Hartford Bridge, his Grace met there with the greateſt misfortune that befel him in the whole courſe of his life; for hunting in this park on the twenty-fourth of July, he let fly a barbed arrow from a croſs-bow at one of the deer, which unfortunately ſtruck one Peter Hawkins, my Lord Zouch's keeper, who was quite out of the Biſhop's ſight, and had been warned more than once to keep out of ſmall turrets over the gate. His Grace endowed it with lands to the value of three hundred pounds per annum, one hundred pound of which was to be employed towards ſetting the poor to work, and the other two hundred pounds, for the maintenance of a maſter, twelve brethren, and eight ſiſters, who have blue cloaths, and gowns of the ſame colour, and two ſhillings and ſix pence a week, each. In the chapel, which is ſpacious and high roofed, there are two windows of painted glaſs, very well ſtained, repreſenting the ſtory of the patriarch Jacob and his family, and amongſt the figures there are three angels holding ſcrolls, in which are theſe words:

Do pauperibus. Reddo Deo. Quid retribuam Domino? hic vota reſolvam.

I give to the poor. I reſtore to God. What ſhall I return unto the Lord? here will I pay my vows.

On ſcrolls in ſeveral places of the windows are theſe words:

Clamamus Abba Pater (53).

This I take to be a kind of alluſion to the Archbiſhop's name, which was ſometimes written Abbat, as appears by the picture before his brother's life, in Dr. Fuller's collection (54); but, however, the alluſion will hold in the Latin without this ſuppoſition. The twenty-ninth of October, being the anniverſary of the Biſhop's birth, is commemorated here, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the time being, is the viſitor of this hoſpital (55).

To Secretary NAUNTON.

'Good Mr. Secretary,

'I HAVE never more deſired to be preſent at any conſultation, than that which is this day to be handled, for my heart and all my heart goeth with it; but my foot is worſe than it was on Friday, ſo that by advice of my phyſician I have ſweat this whole night paſt, and am directed to keep my bed this day.

'But for the matter; my humble advice is, that there is no going back, but a countenancing of it againſt all the world; yea ſo far as with ringing of bells and making of bonfires in London, ſo ſoon as it ſhall be certainly underſtood, that the coronation is paſt. I am ſatisfied in my conſcience that the cauſe is juſt, wherefore they have rejected that proud and bloody man; and ſo much the rather, becauſe he hath taken a courſe to make that kingdom not elective, but to take it from the donation of another man. And when God hath ſet up the Prince that is choſen to be a mark of honour through all Chriſtendom, to propagate his goſpel, and to protect the oppreſſed, I dare not for my part give advice, but to follow where God leads.

'It is a great honour to the King our maſter, that he hath ſuch a ſon, whoſe virtues have made him thought fit to be made a King. And methinks I do in this and that of Hungary, foreſee the work of God, that by piece and piece the kings of the earth that gave their power unto the beaſt (all the word of God muſt be fulfilled) ſhall now tear the whore and make her deſolate, as St. John in his Revelation has foretold. I pray you therefore, with all the ſpirits you have, to put life into this buſineſs; and let a return be made into Germany with ſpeed, and with comfort, and let it be really proſecuted, that it may appear to the world, that we are awake when God in this ſort calleth us.

'If I had time to expreſs it, I could be very angry at the ſhuffling which was uſed towards my Lord Doncaſter, and the ſlighting of his embaſſage ſo, which cannot but touch upon our great maſter who did ſend him; and therefore I would never have a noble ſon forſaken for reſpect of them, who truly aim at nothing but their own purpoſes.

'Our ſtriking in will comfort the Bohemians, will honour the Palſegrave, will ſtrengthen the union, will bring on the States of the Low-Countries, will ſtir up the King of Denmark, and move his own uncles, the Prince of Orange and the Duke de Bouvillon, together with Tremoville (a rich Prince in France), to caſt in their ſhares; and Hungary, as I hope, (being in that ſame cauſe) will run the ſame fortune. For the means to ſupport the war I hope providebit Deus: the parliament is the old and honourable way, but how aſſured at this time I know not; yet I will hope the beſt: certainly if countenance be given to the action, many brave ſpirits will voluntarily go. Our great maſter, in ſufficient want of money, gave ſome aid to the Duke of Savoy, and furniſhed out a pretty army in the cauſe of Cleve. We muſt try once again what can be done in this buſineſs of a higher nature, and all the money that may be ſpared is to be turned that way. And perhaps God provided the jewels that were laid up in the Tower, to be gathered by the mother for the preſervation of her daughter; who, like a noble princeſs, hath profeſſed to her huſband, not to leave herſelf one jewel, rather than not to maintain ſo religious and righteous a cauſe. You ſee that lying on my bed I have gone too far; but if I were with you this ſhould be my language, which I pray you humbly and heartily to repreſent to the King, my maſter, telling him, that when I can ſtand, I hope to do his majeſty ſome ſervice herein. So commending me unto you, I remain the way, in the left arm, by which wound a large blood veſſel being pierced, he bled to death in an hour's time (k). This unforeſeen accident threw the Archbiſhop into a deep melancholy, though he was not conſcious to himſelf of the leaſt inadvertency or indiſcretion, neither did this wear off in time, but throughout his whole life he obſerved a monthly faſt on a Tueſday, the day on which this fatal miſchance fell out, and ſettled an annuity of twenty pounds on the widow, which ſoon procured her another huſband (l). This affair made a very great noiſe, and there wanted not ſome to repreſent it in a ſiniſter light to King James; but his Majeſty gave his judgment of the matter in a ſhort and clear ſentence: An angel, ſaid he, might have miſcarried in this ſort (m). When he was afterwards informed of the legal penalties which his Grace had incurred by this accident, he wrote him a conſolatory letter with his own hand, in which amongſt other things he told him, that he would not add affliction to his ſorrow, or take one farthing from his chattels or moveables which were forfeited by law (n). The Archbiſhop immediately on this misfortune retired to his own hoſpital at Guilford, there to wait the deciſion of the great point as to the irregularity which ſome imagined he had incurred, for it happened very unluckily that at this juncture there were four Biſhops elected but not conſecrated, viz. Dr. John Williams, lord keeper of the great ſeal, to the ſee of Lincoln; Dr. John Davenant, to that of Saliſbury; Dr. Valentine Cary, to that of Exeter; and his old antagoniſt Dr. William Laud, whoſe preferment, on this occaſion, he had warmly oppoſed, to that of St. David's; and all, except Dr. Davenant, ſcrupled the Archbiſhop's capacity to lay hands on them till he was cleared from all imputation as to this fact (o). The King being informed of this, directed, in the beginning of October following, a commiſſion to the ten following perſons, viz. the Lord Keeper; the Biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Rocheſter; the Elects of Exeter and St. David's; Sir Henry Hobart, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas; Sir John Dodderidge, one of the juſtices of the King's bench; Sir Henry Martin, Dean of the Arches; and Dr. Steward; to conſider and reſolve the three following queſtions (p). 1. Whether the Archbiſhop was irregular by the fact of involuntary homicide? The Biſhop of Wincheſter, the two Judges, and the two Civilians, were very clear that he was not irregular; but the other five thought he was (q). 2. Whether that act might tend to ſcandal in a churchman? The Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Lord Chief Juſtice Hobart, and Dr. Steward, doubted; all the reſt agreed, that a ſcandal might be taken though not given (r). 3. How his Grace ſhould be reſtored, in caſe the King ſhould follow the deciſion of thoſe commiſſioners, who had found him irregular? All agreed that it could not be otherwiſe done than by reſtitution from the King, but they varied in the manner. The Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Lord Chief Juſtice, and Dr. Steward, thought it ſhould be done by the King, and by him alone, in the ſame patent with the pardon. The Lord Keeper, and the Biſhops of London, Rocheſter, Exeter, and St. David's, were for a commiſſion from the King directed to ſome Biſhops. Judge Dodderidge and Sir Henry Martin were deſirous it ſhould be done both ways, for abundant caution (s). This return was made to his majeſty on the tenth of November 1621 (t), and accordingly a pardon and a diſpenſation, both bearing date at Weſtminſter the twenty-ſecond of November, paſſed the great ſeal, by which his majeſty aſſoiled the Archbiſhop from all irregularity, ſcandal, or infamation (if any was incurred), and declared him capable of all metropolitical authority, as if this accident had never happened (u). Such was the cloſe of this buſineſs, after a great variety of proceedings, and many arguments publiſhed on both ſides [Q.] Yet all this could not ſatisfy the minds of thoſe who had ſcrupled his power of laying on hands, and therefore they petitioned the King, that they might not be compelled to wound their conſciences by ſubmitting to ſuch a conſecration; and in compliance with their deſire, the Biſhop of Lincoln was conſecrated in King Henry VIIth's chapel, on the eleventh of November, by the Biſhops of London, Worceſter, Ely, Oxford, and Landaff; and the Biſhops of Sarum, Exeter, and St. David's, in the chapel of the Biſhop of London's palace, on the eighteenth of November, by the ſame reverend Prelates (w). It does not appear, that his Grace was at all leſſened, by the ſuggeſtions of his enemies, in the King's favour, or his courage in any degree abated, by the troubles he had met with (x). On the contrary, (x) Bp. Hacket, in the place before cited, ſays, the Archbiſhop was wont to diſſent from the King as often as any at the council-board, and that his Majeſty loved him the better for his courage and ſincerity.

[Q.] And many arguments publiſhed on both ſides.] As the caſe was abſolutely new, and ſuch a one as naturally afforded room for talkative and buſy men to diſplay their abilities; there was nothing ſurprizing in the noiſe this accident made, or the various conſtructions put upon it by different people, according as their notions or their prejudices led them. The Archbiſhop being ſenſible of all this, either wrote himſelf, which is moſt probable, or cauſed to be written, a very ſhort piece, under the title of an apology (57), which, on the eighth of October 1621, was ſent to Sir Henry Spelman, who, on the nineteenth of the ſame month, returned an anſwer to it, which diſcovers full as much ſeverity as learning. It is not very clear to whom this apology was addreſſed, or for whoſe ſatisfaction the anſwer to it was written: but it is very probable that both were intended for the uſe of the Commiſſioners, appointed by the King, to inquire into the ſuppoſed irregularity of the Archbiſhop, of which his Grace had notice on the fifth of October, and the Commiſſioners applied themſelves very cloſely to their buſineſs, from that time. Both theſe pieces are extant, in the poſthumous works of Sir Henry Spelman, but theſe do not ſeem to have been the only pieces that were penned on this occaſion; for we are told by a reverend Prelate, that the fact was much diſcourſed of in foreign univerſities, eſpecially amongſt our neighbours the Sorbonniſts, who diſputed it three ſeveral times in the ſchools, and concluded the accident to have amounted to a full irregularity, which is an incapacity to exerciſe any eccleſiaſtical act of order or juriſdiction (58).

contrary, we find him, in the year 1622, oppoſing the Spaniſh match, which was a thing the King had ſet his heart upon, with the greateſt firmneſs and ſpirit, and even venturing, under his hand, to give his ſentiments on that ſubject in terms ſo vigorous and pathetic, that no pen can properly repreſent them but his own (y) [R]. The King however remained fixed in his reſolution, and the articles agreed on for the ſaid marriage, were ſworn to, in the preſence of the Archbiſhop, and other great officers of ſtate, notwithſtanding which they never took effect (z). [In the Parliament that met on the 19th of February 1623-4, our Prelate took an active part in the meaſures which were then purſued for perſuading the King to diſſolve his treaties with Spain, relating to the marriage and the Palatinate. He delivered both the addreſs and the remonſtrance which were preſented to his majeſty, from the two Houſes, on this occaſion; and he introduced the remonſtrance with a preamble, expreſſing the joy of the Parliament, that the King had ſhewn himſelf ſenſible of the inſincerity of the Spaniards, and of the indignities offered by them to his ſon the Prince, and to his royal daughter. This part of the preamble appears to have given ſome offence to James the Firſt (a). Indeed, Dr. Abbot was remarkably zealous in every thing in which the Proteſtant Religion was underſtood to be concerned.] The Archbiſhop thenceforward aſſiſted but ſeldom at council, being hindered chiefly by his infirmities (b); but in the King's laſt ſickneſs he was called for, and attended with great conſtancy, and received the higheſt marks of the King's confidence, to the very laſt moment of his life, and was near him when he expired, on the twenty-ſeventh of March 1625 (c). At the coronation of King Charles I. the Archbiſhop, as his office required, ſet the crown upon his majeſty's head, though he was extremely weak, and much troubled with the gout (d); but thenceforward he viſibly declined in the King's favour, and the Duke of Buckingham, who was his declared enemy, watched for an opportunity to make the Archbiſhop feel the weight of his diſpleaſure. This was at laſt taken, for his refuſing to licence a ſermon, preached by one Dr. Sibthorpe, Vicar of Brackley in Northamptonſhire, to juſtify and promote a loan, which the King had demanded. This ſermon was preached at Northampton, in the Lent aſſizes 1627, before the Judges at Northampton (e), and it was tranſmitted

[R] No pen can properly repreſent them but his own.] This letter from the Archbiſhop to King James is without date, but the ſubject points out plainly enough the time when it was written; and it is inſerted here, to ſhew the Archbiſhop's principles in religion, in regard to which there cannot be a fuller teſtimony.

'May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

'I HAVE been too long ſilent, and am afraid, by my ſilence, I have neglected the duty of the 'place it hath pleaſed God to call me unto, and 'your majeſty to place me in: but now I humbly 'crave leave, I may diſcharge my conſcience towards God, and my duty to your Majeſty; and 'therefore I beſeech you freely to give me leave to 'deliver myſelf, and then let your Majeſty do with 'me what you pleaſe. Your Majeſty hath propounded a Toleration of Religion, I beſeech you 'to take into your conſideration what your act is, 'what the conſequence may be; by your act, you 'labour to ſet up the moſt damnable and heretical 'doctrine of the Church of Rome, the Whore of 'Babylon. How hateful it will be to God, and 'grievous to your good ſubjects, the profeſſors of 'the Goſpel, that your Majeſty who hath often 'diſputed, and learnedly written againſt thoſe 'hereſies, ſhould now ſhew yourſelf a Patron of 'thoſe wicked doctrines, which your pen hath told 'the world, and your conſcience tells yourſelf, are 'ſuperſtitious, idolatrous, and deteſtable. And 'hereunto I add what you have done, in ſending the 'Prince into Spain, without conſent of your council, the privity and approbation of your people; 'and although you have a charge and intereſt in the 'Prince, as ſon of your fleſh, yet have the people a 'greater, as ſon of this kingdom, upon whom (next after your Majeſty) are their eyes fixed, and 'welfare depends; and ſo tenderly is his going apprehended, as (believe it) however his return may 'be ſafe, yet the drawers of him into this action, ſo 'dangerous to himſelf, ſo deſperate to the kingdom, 'will not paſs away unqueſtioned, unpuniſhed. 'Beſides, this Toleration which you endeavour to 'ſet up by your proclamation, cannot be done 'without a parliament; unleſs your Majeſty will let 'your ſubjects ſee, that you will take unto yourſelf ability to throw down the laws of your land at 'your pleaſure. What dreadful conſequences theſe 'things may draw afterward, I beſeech your Majeſty to conſider, and above all, leſt by this Toleration, and diſcountenancing of the true profeſſion of the Goſpel, wherewith God hath bleſſed 'us, and this kingdom hath ſo long flouriſhed 'under it, your Majeſty do not draw upon this 'kingdom in general, and yourſelf in particular, 'God's heavy wrath and indignation.

'Thus in diſcharge of my duty towards God, to 'your Majeſty, and the place of my calling, I have 'taken humble leave to deliver my conſcience. 'Now, Sir, do what you pleaſe with me (59).'

This Letter is likewiſe printed by Arthur Willſon in his hiſtory, with this reflection, both on the King and the Archbiſhop. 'Thus did our Solomon in 'his latter time (though he had fought with beaſts 'at Epheſus, as one ſaith of him) incline a little too much to the Beaſt: yet he made his tale 'ſo good to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (what 'reſervation ſoever he had), that he wrought 'upon the good old man (afterwards), in the concluſion of the work, to ſet his hand as a witneſs to 'the articles (60).' Upon this, another hiſtorian of the ſame reign takes upon him to inſinuate, that this long letter to the King was penned to pleaſe his diſciples, and copies given to publiſh in print after his deceaſe; for, ſays he, we never heard tidings of it till now, in our laſt days; 'for Abbot, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, was 'the firſt man that ſigned to the poſtſcript, which 'atteſted thoſe articles of the marriage, and ſo did 'all the privy council.' Then ſpeaking of the excuſe made by Mr. Willſon, for the Archbiſhop, this writer adds, I can tell him there were two other Biſhops, John, Biſhop of Lincoln, and Lancelot, Biſhop of Wincheſter, men of far greater merit, and high eſteem, and evener conſcience, that ſubſigned with him (61). But in this fact he is miſtaken, for Lancelot, Biſhop of Wincheſter, did not ſign more willingly than the Archbiſhop. The apology of the other hiſtorian alſo was unneceſſary, for the articles which the Archbiſhop apprehended, and wrote againſt, were private articles, as appears plainly from the whole tranſaction printed in Ruſhworth (62). But another great writer gives quite another turn to this whole affair, for he owns that the letter came abroad, not in theſe laſt times, as Sanderſon calls them, but at the very time when it was ſuppoſed to be written, yet he denies that the Archbiſhop was the author of it, and ſuggeſts, that it was only fathered upon him, that it might make the greater impreſſion upon the people (63).

to the Biſhop, with the King's direction to licenſe it, which he refuſed to do, and gave his reaſons for it; notwithſtanding which, the ſermon was licenſed by the Biſhop of London (Dr. Mountaigne), after many things had been corrected therein, from the lights given by the Archbiſhop's objections, for which however it was reſolved that he ſhould ſuffer (f). Diſcourſes of this nature were ſo loud at court, that ſome of his Grace's friends overheard and reported them to him, upon which he thought fit to retire to his palace at Croydon, a month before his uſual time. On the fifth of July, Lord Conway, who was then Secretary of State, made him a viſit, and intimated to him, that the King expected he ſhould withdraw to Canterbury, which the Archbiſhop declined, becauſe he had a law-ſuit at that time with that city, and deſired he might rather have leave to go to his houſe at Ford, five miles beyond Canterbury, which was yielded to (g); and on the ninth of October following, the King granted a commiſſion to the Biſhops of London, Durham, Rocheſter, Oxford, and Bath and Wells, to execute archiepiſcopal authority, the cauſe aſſigned being no more than this, That the Archbiſhop could not at that time, in his own perſon, attend thoſe ſervices, which were otherwiſe proper for his cognizance and juriſdiction (h). Some writers have pretended, that his ſuppoſed irregularity, occaſioned by the death of Peter Hawkins, was revived; but the commiſſion which is extant on record ſhews the contrary, nor indeed was that affair ever thought of afterwards (i). But the Archbiſhop did not remain long in this ſituation; for the neceſſities of the times rendering a parliament neceſſary, his Grace was ſent for about Chriſtmas, and not only reſtored to his authority and juriſdiction, but, on his coming to court from his palace at Lambeth, was received when he quitted his barge, by the Archbiſhop of York and the Earl of Dorſet, who conducted him to his majeſty, where, having kiſſed the King's hand, he was deſired not to fail the council table twice a week (k). His Grace ſat in that parliament which began on the ſeventeenth of March following, and continued in the full exerciſe of his office ever after, of which it may not be amiſs to take notice in this ſingular inſtance. On the twenty-fourth of Auguſt 1628, he conſecrated Richard Montagu, to the ſee of Chicheſter, a man who had been remarkably buſy in ſupporting the pretence of his irregularity, and at this conſecration Dr. Laud, then Biſhop of London, aſſiſted, which is the cleareſt proof that can be, that no doubts ſtuck longer as to his irregularity, even with thoſe who loved him leaſt (l). In parliament, the Archbiſhop maintained his credit in as high a degree as any of his predeceſſors, and it is more than probable, that the knowledge of this procured him ſuch marks of reſpect, as were at this time afforded him by the court. When the Petition of Right, that great pillar of the Engliſh liberty, was under conſideration, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury delivered the ſenſe of the houſe of Lords thereupon, at a conference with the houſe of Commons, and at the ſame time laid before them ſuch propoſitions as their Lordſhips had agreed upon, for which, thanks were returned, in a ſet ſpeech, by Sir Dudley Diggs (m). [When Dr. Manwaring was brought before the Bar of the houſe of Lords, by impeachment of the Commons, for having maintained, in two ſermons preached before his Majeſty, and afterwards publiſhed, "That the "King's royal will and command, in impoſing loans, taxes, and other aids, upon "his people, without common conſent in parliament, did ſo far bind the conſciences "of the ſubjects of this kingdom, that they could not refuſe the ſame without peril "of eternal damnation;" and "that the authority of parliament is not neceſſary for "the raiſing of aids and ſubſidies;" the Archbiſhop, by leave of the Peers, gave the Doctor a ſevere, but juſt admonition; and declared that he both miſliked and abhorred his two ſermons (n).] The intereſt of Biſhop Laud was now ſo great at court, that he drew up a ſcheme of inſtructions, which having the King's name at the head of them, were, in the month of December 1629, tranſmitted to his Grace, under the pompous title, His Majeſty's inſtructions to the moſt reverend father in God, George, Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, containing certain orders to be obſerved and put in execution, by the ſeveral Biſhops in his province (o). Theſe inſtructions his Grace communicated to his ſuffragan Biſhops, in which, as Heylyn obſerves, he acted miniſterially; but to ſhew that he ſtill meant to exerciſe his own authority in his own dioceſe, he reſtored Mr. Palmer and Mr. Udnay to their lectureſhips, after the Dean and Archdeacon of Canterbury had ſuſpended them, and, in other reſpects, ſoftened the rigour of thoſe inſtructions, which were contrived to enforce the particular notions of a prevailing party in the Church, which the Archbiſhop thought a burden too hard to be borne by the tender conſciences of thoſe who made the fundamentals of religion their ſtudy, and were not ſo zealous for forms (p). His conduct in this and other reſpects is ſaid to have made his preſence unwelcome at court, and ſo indeed it ſeems to have been; for upon the birth of Charles, Prince of Wales, (afterwards King Charles II.) which happened on the twenty-ninth of May 1630, Laud, then biſhop of London, had the honour to baptize him as dean of the chapel, notwithſtanding that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury is the Ordinary of the court, and the King's houſhold, wherever it is, are regarded as his pariſhioners; ſo that this was viſibly as much a ſlight upon the Archbiſhop, as an act of favour towards his antagoniſt (q). The Archbiſhop however was proof againſt all ſuch accidents as theſe, and went on doing his duty without fear or favour, and yet one of the laſt acts of his life plainly ſhews, that he was very far from being ſo indifferent towards the diſcipline and ceremonies of the

the Church of England, as ſome have repreſented him. This act of his was an order, dated the third of July 1633, requiring the pariſhioners of Crayford in Kent, to receive the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper, on their knees, at the ſteps aſcending to the communion table (r). We may well ſtyle this one of his laſt acts, ſince a month afterwards, viz. on the fourth of Auguſt in the ſame year, he died at his palace of Croydon, worn out with cares and infirmities, at the age of ſeventy-one. He was buried according to his own expreſs direction, in the chapel of our Lady, within the church dedicated to the holy Trinity, in his native town of Guilford in Surrey (s). Soon after his deceaſe, a noble monument was erected over his grave, with the effigies of the Archbiſhop in his robes, ſupported by ſix black marble pillars of the Dorick Order, raiſed on pedeſtals of books piled up (t). On his tomb there is a large Latin inſcription in honour of the Archbiſhop, which having been already more than once in print, need only be referred to here (u). The facts related in this article, clearly evince that he was a man of great natural parts, and thoſe ſufficiently improved, for the worthy performance of whatever his high ſtation in the Church required. He ſhewed himſelf in many circumſtances of his life, a man of great moderation towards all parties, a ſteady friend to the Proteſtant religion, an honeſt though perhaps not an humble courtier, and one who was deſirous that the clergy ſhould have attracted the reverence and eſteem of the laity, by the ſanctity of their manners, and the uprightneſs of their behaviour, rather than have claimed them as neceſſarily annexed to their function. Theſe notions of his, ſquaring little with the humour of ſome writers, have drawn upon him many reflections that he did not deſerve [S]. The general hiſtorians of thoſe times ran much into writing of characters, and that which Hammond l'Eſtrange beſtowed upon the Archbiſhop, has been copied into various works. Dr. Heylyn makes uſe of it to expreſs what he did not care ſhould fall from his own pen (w), though upon other occaſions he has treated that writer in his hiſtory very freely: Lloyd has copied that character without naming his author (x); and to ſay the truth, it is from thence, that moſt of the ſtrokes of ſatire beſtowed upon the memory of this great man have been ſtolen (y); and yet how little ſuitable that character is to the perſon for whom it was drawn, the reader will eaſily perceive from the piece itſelf [T]. He has not met with much better quarter from the noble hiſtorian, though there is more of decency preſerved in his animadverſions, as the reader will perceive from the picture of our Archbiſhop drawn

[S] Reflections that he did not deſerve.] Our old church hiſtorian tells us, 'That he forſook the birds 'of his own feather to fly with others, generally 'favouring the laity, more than the clergy, in 'cauſes that were brought before him (64).' One would imagine from hence, that this Archbiſhop had been a man of great ſeverity in his government; whereas another writer cenſures his Grace for his remiſſneſs in viſitations (65): and as it is impoſſible that a man ſhould be guilty of oppoſite offences at the ſame time, it may fairly be preſumed, that he was guilty of neither; but that the bearing hard upon immoral clergymen in the high commiſſion court, and his tenderneſs for good men, who were ſcrupulous about ceremonies, expoſed the Archbiſhop to ſuch cenſures from thoſe who loved the former too well, and had too little pity for the latter. Mr. Sanderſon ſtrikes much deeper at the Archbiſhop's character, for in his hiſtory he tells us, 'That his Grace grew ſo much out of humour with 'the court, on the queſtioning his regularity, upon 'the accident of Peter Hawkins's death, that he re'fuſed, becauſe he was not permitted to go to the 'altar, to attend the ſervice of the council-table; 'ſaying to our author, Since they will have it ſo, 'that I am incapable of the one, I ſhall ſpare myſelf 'the trouble of the other (66).' He adds to this charge a much higher. He ſays, 'That the Arch'biſhop fell upon downright Puritan principles, and 'had ſo many church and ſtate mal-contents viſited 'him, that it produced a new ſect, who were ſtyled 'Nicodemites, and his diſciples; for which he gives 'this wiſe reaſon: That the Archbiſhop had conſtant'ly candle-light in his chamber and ſtudy, making it 'midnight at noon-day (67).' The concluſion of his charge is the bittereſt of all, and therefore I ſhall tranſcribe his own words. 'Here he began to be 'the firſt man of eminency in our Church, a ring'leader of that faction, for I can name thoſe then 'his private diſciples, which lately appeared deſ'perate proſelytes (68).' Theſe paſſages were firſt printed in another book, word for word (69), from whence it evidently appears, that Sanderſon wrote them both. Yet with reſpect to the charge, Fuller aſſures us, that Dr. Barnard, the Archbiſhop's houſehold chaplain, and near relation, knew nothing of this burning candle in his chamber and ſtudy (70); and as to the mal-contents that reſorted to him, the Archbiſhop has fully purged himſelf of that accuſation, in the narrative of his troubles (71). This humour of inveighing againſt the Archbiſhop, was not confined to his own times, but has prevailed even amongſt later writers. Mr. John Aubrey having tranſcribed what is ſaid of this prelate on his monument, adds immediately; 'Not'withſtanding this moſt noble character, tranſmitted 'to poſterity on this Archbiſhop's monument, he 'was, though a benefactor to this place, no friend 'to the Church of England, whereof he was head, 'but ſcandalouſly permitted that poiſonous ſpirit of 'Puritaniſm to ſpread all over the whole nation, by 'his indolence at leaſt, if not connivance and en'couragement; which ſome years after broke out, 'and laid a flouriſhing Church and State in the 'moſt miſerable ruins; and which gave birth to 'thoſe principles, which, unleſs rooted out, will 'ever make this nation unhappy (72).' I might eaſily add more inſtances of the ſame ſort, but that I am perſuaded the reader will think theſe ſufficient, and therefore I ſhall conclude this note, with an obſervation of Fuller's. 'The truth is, ſays he, the 'Archbiſhop's own ſtiffneſs and averſeneſs to com'ply with court deſigns, gave advantage to his ad'verſaries againſt him, and made him more obnoxi'ous to the King's diſpleaſure. But the blame did 'moſt light upon Biſhop Laud, men accounting this 'a kind of filius ante diem, &c. As if not content 'to ſucceed, he endeavoured to ſupplant him, who 'might well have ſuffered his decayed old age to 'have died in honour: What needs the felling of a 'tree a falling (73)?'

[T] From the piece itſelf.] This hiſtorian writes thus: 'Not long after his return from Scotland, 'aged and ſelf-fear, George Abbot the titular Arch'biſhop of Canterbury, went to his everlaſting home, 'Auguſt 4. A very learned man he was, his eru'dition all of the old ſtamp, ſtiffly principled in the 'doctrine of St. Auguſtine; which they who under'ſtand it not, call Calviniſm, therefore diſreliſhed 'by thoſe who inclined to the Maſſilian and Armi'nian tenets. Pious, grave, and exemplary in his 'converſation. But ſome think a better Man than 'Arch-drawn by his pen [U]. A later writer juſtly eſteemed for his extenſive knowledge of the Engliſh hiſtory, and not ſo much addicted to party, has done much more juſtice to the virtues and abilities of this great Prelate, and therefore we think it reaſonable to annex his teſtimony to theſe memoirs [X]. His charity and public ſpirit ought certainly to have been ſet in a clearer light, than hitherto they have been, by the friends to the Church; the rather, becauſe a writer, remarkable for his keenneſs, has been pleaſed to aſſert (z), that marks of his benefaction we find none, in places of his breeding and preferment;

'Archbiſhop, and that he was better qualified with merit for the dignity, than with a ſpirit anſwering the function, in the exerciſe whereof he was conceived too facile and yielding; his extraordinary remiſſneſs in not exacting ſtrict conformity to the preſcribed orders of the Church in point of ceremony, ſeemed to reſolve thoſe legal determinations to their firſt principle of indifferency, and led in ſuch an habit of inconformity, as the future reduction of thoſe tender conſcienced men to long diſcontinued obedience, was interpreted an innovation. This was the height of what I dare report his failings reached to: that he was a ringleader of that ſect which lately appeared deſperate proſelytes, both I am with a late author to affirm (74), warrant I have none, to leave ſo ill a ſavour upon his fame, nor can it be infallibly inferred from theſe men, their being then in favour with him. Their principles perhaps were entertained ſince his death, or if before, not then declared, and until ſuch ſecrets be diſcovered, men may be miſtaken in thoſe they favour; the greateſt ſufferer of theſe times was ſo (75).' As injurious as this character is in ſome points, yet it is plain, that the author did not credit what Mr. Sanderſon had aſſerted, and indeed, it is happy for this Archbiſhop's memory, that almoſt all his cenſurers have contradicted each other, and thereby afforded juſt room to poſterity, to queſtion the truth of what they have all advanced, eſpecially when it is conſidered, that in all their cenſures, they entered into the ſecrets of this Prelate's heart, and take upon them to publiſh to the world, what, if true, could be known only to God and himſelf.

[U] Drawn by his pen.] The Earl of Clarendon ſpeaks of him thus: 'It was about the end of Auguſt in the year 1633, when the King (Charles I.) returned from Scotland to Greenwich, where the Queen kept her court; and the firſt accident of moment that happened after his coming thither, was the death of Abbot, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had ſat too many years in that ſee, and had too great a juriſdiction over the Church, though he was without any credit in the court from the death of King James, and had not much in many years before. He had been maſter of one of the pooreſt colleges (Baliol) in Oxford, and had learning ſufficient for that province. He was a man of very moroſe manners, and a very ſour aſpect, which in that time was called gravity; and under the opinion of that virtue, and by the recommendation of the Earl of Dunbar, the King's firſt Scotch favourite, he was preferred by King James to the biſhoprick of Coventry and Litchfield, and preſently after to London, before he had been Parſon, Vicar, or Curate of any pariſh church in England, or Dean or Prebendary of any cathedral church; and was in truth totally ignorant of the true conſtitution of the Church of England, and the ſtate and intereſt of the clergy; as ſufficiently appeared throughout the whole courſe of his life afterward.

'He had ſcarce performed any part of the office of Biſhop in the dioceſe of London, when he was ſnatched from thence, and promoted to Canterbury, upon the never-enough to be lamented death of Dr. Bancroft, that Metropolitan, who underſtood the Church excellently, and had almoſt reſcued it out of the Calviniſtic Party, and very much ſubdued the unruly ſpirit of the Nonconformiſts, by and after the conference at Hampton Court, countenanced men of the greateſt parts in learning, and diſpoſed the clergy to a more ſolid courſe of ſtudy than they had been accuſtomed to; and if he had lived, would quickly have extinguiſhed all that fire in England which had been kindled at Geneva; or if he had been ſucceeded by Biſhop Andrews, Biſhop Overal, or any man who underſtood and loved the Church, that infection would eaſily have been kept out, which could not afterwards be ſo eaſily expelled.

'But Abbot brought none of this antidote with him, and conſidered the Chriſtian religion no otherwiſe than as it abhorred and reviled Popery, and valued thoſe men moſt who did that moſt furiouſly. For the ſtrict obſervation of the diſcipline of the Church, or the conformity of the articles or canons eſtabliſhed, he made little inquiry, and took leſs care; and having himſelf made a very little progreſs in the ancient and ſolid ſtudy of divinity, he adhered only to the doctrine of Calvin, and for his ſake did not think ſo ill of the diſcipline as he ought to have done. But if men prudently forbore a public reviling and railing at the hierarchy and eccleſiaſtical government, let their opinions and private judgment be what it would, they were not only ſecure from any inquiſition of his, but acceptable to him, and at leaſt equally preferred by him: and though many other Biſhops plainly diſcerned the miſchiefs which daily broke in to the prejudice of religion, by his defects and remiſſneſs, and prevented it in their own dioceſes as much as they could, and gave all their countenance to men of other parts and other principles; and though the Biſhop of London, (Dr. Laud) from the time of his authority and credit with the King, had applied all the remedies he could to thoſe defections, and from the time of his being Chancellor of Oxford, had much diſcountenanced and almoſt ſuppreſſed that ſpirit, by encouraging another kind of learning and practice in that univerſity, which was indeed according to the doctrine of the Church of England; yet that temper in the Archbiſhop, whoſe houſe was a ſanctuary to the moſt eminent of that factious party, and who licenſed their moſt pernicious writings, left his ſucceſſor a very difficult work to do, to reform and reduce a Church into order, that had been ſo long neglected, and that was ſo ill filled, by many weak, and more wilful churchmen (76).'

(76) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, Oxon. 1707. 8vo. p. 88, 89.

[X] Teſtimony to theſe memoirs.] 'Archbiſhop Abbot, ſays he, was a perſon of wonderful temper and moderation; and in all his conduct, ſhewed an unwillingneſs to ſtretch the act of uniformity beyond what was abſolutely neceſſary for the peace of the Church; or the prerogative of the Crown, any farther than conduced to the good of the ſtate. Being not well turned for a court, though otherwiſe of conſiderable learning and genteel education, he either could not, or would not, ſtoop to the humour of the times; and now and then, by an unſeaſonable ſtiffneſs, gave occaſion to his enemies to repreſent him, as not well inclined to the prerogative, or too much addicted to a popular intereſt; and therefore not fit to be employed in matters of government (77).'

(77) Memoirs of the moſt material tranſactions in England, for the laſt 100 years, by Dr. Wellwood, 8vo. 1700. p. 38.

[To this character we ſhall add that which is given of the Archbiſhop by the author of the Confeſſional: 'There never was a Prelate freer from the fiery zeal of an eccleſiaſtic, perhaps hardly ever a private clergyman, than George Abbot. It was reckoned his diſgrace in the next reign, that he did not tread in the ſteps of the fiery Bancroft.' "Had Laud ſucceeded Bancroft, ſaid they, and the project of conformity been followed without interruption, the enſuing ſchiſm might have been prevented (78). He was ſlack and negligent, ſays the firebrand Heylyn, in the courſe of his government, and too indulgent to that party which Bancroft had kept under ſuch juſt ſeverity (79)." If to this we add the noble ſtand he made againſt the Spaniſh match; his unwearied endeavours and vigilance againſt Popery; his ſpirited letter to James I. on that ſubject; and his not only refuſing to licenſe, but confuting the poſitions in Sibthorp's ſermon; theſe particulars, and his uniform

ment; which is at once an unjuſt and unchriſtian aſperſion [Y]. In regard to his learning, ſucceeding ages may judge thereof, from his writings upon various ſubjects, of the moſt remarkable of which, we have, for the reader's ſatisfaction, added a ſuccinct account [Z]. It may not be amiſs to obſerve here, that there was another writer of both his names, who flouriſhed ſomewhat later. This George Abbot wrote a paraphraſe on Job, a vindication of the Sabbath, and a paraphraſe on the Pſalms. This laſt was printed in 1650, and it appears from thence, that the author was lately dead, and had been, while living, a member of the parliament then ſitting (a). Another George Abbot, fellow of Merton college in Oxford, in 1622, and who took the degree of Bachelor of Law, in 1630 (b), was our Prelate's nephew, and the ſon of Sir Maurice Abbot, but it does not appear that he was a writer (c).

'adherence to the ſame principles during his whole 'life, oblige me to think, that Mr. La Roche, or 'rather, perhaps, Brandt, was miſinformed with 'reſpect to Abbot's exciting King James to declare 'againſt Vorſtius; and that, taking the whole of 'the Archbiſhop's character together, no eccleſiaſtic 'of that time, and very few of any other time, 'have leſs abounded with a fiery unjuſtifiable zeal 'than Archbiſhop Abbot (80).]

(80) Conſeſſional, p. 285, 286. Note.

[Y] An unjuſt and unchriſtian aſperſion.] The Archbiſhop loved hoſpitality, and living as became a man of his rank, he tells us himſelf, that this was recommended to him by King James, and that he never forgot his majeſty's injunctions upon that head (81), neither is it the Archbiſhop alone that mentions this, but even ſome who did not wiſh him very well, and who plainly intimate, that amongſt the reſt of his faults, he was thought to live too high, to have too much company, and to become thereby too popular (82). This hoſpitality of his, together with the troubles he met with, muſt have hindered him from growing rich, and conſequently put it in ſome meaſure out of his power to ſhew his public ſpirit in other reſpects, how much ſoever it might be his inclination. Yet ſome inſtances we find of his generoſity in this way, at leaſt enough to falſify Heylyn's reflection; for beſides his noble and well-contrived charity at Guilford, he gave to the ſchools of arts in Oxford, one hundred pounds at one time, and fifty pounds at another (83). In 1619, he beſtowed a large ſum of money on the library of Baliol college, for augmenting the number of books, and repairing the building (84). He built a fair conduit in the city of Canterbury, for the convenience of the inhabitants (85). He likewiſe intended to have left a yearly revenue for the ſupport of that conduit, if he had not been deterred by the ungrateful uſage he met with from the mayor and corporation (86). In 1624, he contributed to the founding of Pembroke college in Oxford (87). He diſcharged a debt of three hundred pounds owing from Baliol to Pembroke college (88). About the year 1632, he gave one hundred pounds to the library of Univerſity college (89). To the town of Guilford he left one hundred pounds, to be lent without intereſt to four poor tradeſmen of that town, for two or three years. To the poor of that town, twenty pounds; to the poor of Lambeth, thirty pounds; to forty of his inferior ſervants, ten pounds each; beſides forty pounds, to ſupply any forgetfulneſs towards ſuch as had ſerved him. All the books in his great ſtudy, marked with his name, to his ſucceſſors for ever; beſides ſome from his ſtudy at Croydon, to the Dean and Chapter at Wincheſter, and others to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury (90).

ABBOT (Robert) brother to the former; was alſo born in the ſame town of Guilford, anno 1560 (a), and bred up under the ſame ſchool-maſter there; till being ſufficiently qualified for the univerſity he was ſent to Baliol College in Oxford, anno 1575. He took his Maſter of Arts degree in 1582; became a noted preacher there, alſo a conſtant lecturer at St. Martin's Church, in the Quadrivium, and ſometimes at Abingdon in Berkſhire (b). His preferment was remarkably owing to his merit, particularly in preaching; notwithſtanding the diſtinction which ſome have affected to make, between the talents and tempers of theſe two brothers; 'That George was the more 'plauſible preacher, Robert the greater ſcholar; George the abler ſtateſman, Robert 'the deeper divine: gravity did frown in George, and ſmile in Robert (c).' Such were the qualities of this Robert, that upon the firſt ſermon he preached at Worceſter, he was made lecturer in that city, and ſoon after Rector of All-Saints there; and upon a ſermon he preached at Paul's Croſs, he was preſented to the rich benefice of Bingham in Nottinghamſhire, by one of his auditors, John Stanhope, Eſq; as Dr. Featley has obſerved in his life (d). In 1594 he became no leſs eminent for ſome of his writings; particularly, againſt a certain Papiſt on the ſacrament. He then took his degrees in Divinity; that of Doctor being completed in 1597 (e). In the beginning of the reign of King James I. he was made chaplain in ordinary to him; and this King ſo well eſteemed of his writings, that, with the ſecond edition of Dr. Abbot's book de Antichriſto, in 1608, his majeſty ordered his own commentary upon part of the Apocalypſe to be printed: an honour which that King did to no other of the great clerks in this kingdom. And, in truth, the Doctor's pen had now brought him alſo into general eſteem, for what he had hitherto publiſhed in defence of William Perkin's Reformed Catholic, againſt Dr. William Biſhop, now a ſecular prieſt, but afterwards, in the Pope's ſtyle, a titular Biſhop, of the aërial Dioceſe of Chalcedon. It is my author's aſſertion, that Dr. Abbot has herein given that William Biſhop as great an overthrow, as Jewell to Harding, Bilſon to Allen, or Reynolds to Hart (f). At the end of this excellent work is added a particular treatiſe, he ſoon after wrote, intitled, The true ancient Roman Catholic; which he dedicated to Prince Henry; to whom it was ſo acceptable, that he returned him many thanks in a letter written with his own hand (g), and promiſed his aſſiſtance, upon the next vacancy, to advance him higher in the Church. And though by that Prince's untimely death the Doctor loſt ſome hopes, yet, in courſe of time, his deſerts found other friends to do him that juſtice. In 1609, he was unanimouſly elected Maſter of Baliol College (b). Here it is obſerved of him, that he was careful and ſkilful, to ſet in this nurſery the beſt plants; and then took ſuch care to water and prune them, that in no plat, or knot, throughout the Univerſity of Oxford, there appeared more beautiful flowers, or grew ſweeter fruit, than in Baliol College, while he was maſter (i). His diligent reading to his ſcholars, and his continual preſence at public exerciſes, both countenanced the readers, and encouraged the hearers. Theſe regulations and improvements he rendered effectual, by eſtabliſhing piety, which had been much neglected; reſtoring peace, which had been long wanted; and making temperance more familiar among them, which had been too great a ſtranger in that ſociety (k). In May 1610, we find him nominated by the King, among the firſt fellows of his majeſty's Royal College at Chelſea, then newly founded, and deſigned as a kind of fortreſs for controverſial divinity; being thus, as it were, engarriſoned, with the moſt able and ſelect champions for the Proteſtant cauſe, againſt all aſſaults of Popery (l). In November the ſame year, he was made Prebendary of Normanton, in the church of Southwell (m). Upon his preaching a ſermon before the King, during his month of waiting at court, in 1612, when the news of Dr. Thomas Holland's death was brought from Oxford, his majeſty named him ſucceſſor in the Theological Chair, uſually called the King's Profeſſor of Divinity; but he modeſtly refuſed the ſame, till his brother procured a mandate from the King for him to hold it. Some remarkable circumſtances we meet with of him in this ſtation [A]; and herein he has had the character given him of a profound divine; moſt admirably well read in the fathers, councils, and ſchoolmen;

[A] Some remarkable circumſtances, &c. in this ſtation.] Among the reſt, while he was Profeſſor in the chair at Oxford, was, his preaching a ſermon before the univerſity; in which, he ſo ſignificantly laid open the oblique methods then uſed by thoſe who ſecretly favoured Popery, to undermine the Reformation; and Dr. Laud, then preſent, was ſo notoriouſly ſuſpected to be one who uſed thoſe methods, as to have the ſaid reflections applied by the whole auditory to him; that in great vexation he wrote to his patron, Dr. Neal, then Biſhop of Lincoln (therefore about the year 1614), to know whether he ſhould not make a direct reply to it. The paſſage Laud objected to, was, that Abbot ſhould ſay, 'There were men, who, under pretence 'of truth, and preaching againſt the Puritans, 'ſtruck at the heart and root of that faith and religion now eſtabliſhed among us; which was the 'very practice of Parſons and Campian's counſel, 'when they came hither to ſeduce young ſtudents; 'who, afraid to be expelled, if they ſhould openly 'profeſs their converſion, were directed to ſpeak freely againſt the Puritans, as that would ſuffice: ſo 'theſe do not expect to be accounted Papiſts; becauſe 'they ſpeak only againſt Puritans; but becauſe 'they are indeed Papiſts, they ſpeak nothing againſt 'them: or if they do, they beat about the buſh, 'and that ſoftly too, for fear of diſquieting the 'birds that are in it.' Hereupon Laud, in his letter to the ſaid Biſhop of Lincoln complains, 'That he was fain to ſit patiently at the rehearſal 'of this ſermon, though abuſed almoſt an hour together, being pointed at as he ſat; yet would 'have taken no notice of it, but that the whole 'univerſity applied it to him; and his friends told 'him, he ſhould ſink in his credit, if he anſwered 'not Dr. Abbot in his own: nevertheleſs, he would 'be patient, and deſired his Lordſhip to vouchſafe 'him ſome direction (1).' But, as we hear not that Laud did anſwer it, the Biſhop might perhaps vouchſafe him rather directions to be quiet.

and a more moderate Calviniſt than either of his two predeceſſors in the divinity chair, Holland and Humphrey, were; which he expreſſed by countenancing the Sublapſarian way of predeſtination (n). Laſtly, upon the King's peruſal of his Antilogia, againſt the Apology for Garnet, and the fame of his incomparable lectures in the univerſity, upon the King's ſupreme power, againſt Bellarmine and Suarez (printed after his death), his majeſty, when the ſee of Saliſbury fell void, ſent his Congé d'Elire for him to the Dean and Chapter. Thus, as he ſet forward, one foot in the temple of virtue, his other ſtill advanced in the temple of honour (o), though indeed, but leiſurely; which is imputed to his own humility, the obſtruction of his foes, who traduced him for a Puritan (though cordial to the doctrine of the Church of England), and the unwillingneſs of ſome friends to adorn the Church with the ſpoil of the Univerſity, and mar a Profeſſor to make a Biſhop (p). He was conſecrated by his own brother the Archbiſhop, on December 3, 1615, in his chapel at Lambeth (q): herein equalizing the felicity of Seffridus, ſome time Biſhop of Chicheſter, who being a Biſhop himſelf, alſo ſaw his brother, at the ſame time, Archbiſhop of Canterbury (r). Other biſhopricks were talked of for him; but the buſineſs of the nullity (before mentioned in his brother's life) made a nullity for a time, ſays my author, in his Grace's good intentions; inſomuch that King James, when the Doctor, newly conſecrated Biſhop of Sarum, came to do his homage, ſaid pleaſantly to him, Abbot, I have had very much to do to make thee a Biſhop; but I know no reaſon for it, unleſs it were becauſe thou haſt written againſt one; alluding to the name of the Popiſh prieſt before-mentioned (s). In his way to Sarum, he made a farewel oration at the univerſity, with great applauſe. We have ſome fragments of it preſerved, in the original Latin, by two authors (t); and a tranſlation thereof, or epitome in Engliſh, by a third (u). His brethren, the heads of houſes, and other Oxford friends, parted with him on the edge of his dioceſe with tears for grief; and the gentry of Sarum received him with thoſe of joy. He ſoon obſerved the beautiful old cathedral to be much decayed, through negligence, and the covetouſneſs of thoſe who filled their purſes with that money which ſhould have been applied to its repairs (x). Therefore he uſed ſuch means with the Prebendaries, as drew from them five hundred pounds, which he applied to the reparation of this church (y); and then laboured to amend the congregation, both by doctrine and diſcipline; viſiting his whole dioceſe in perſon, and preaching every Sabbath-day, whilſt his health would permit, which was not long; for that ſedentary courſe, to which he had accuſtomed himſelf, by his cloſe application to ſtudy, brought upon him the gravel and ſtone (z). But in all the bodily tortures of his laſt fit, his ſoul was at eaſe; and his heavenly hopes diſpoſed him contentedly to reſign all earthly enjoyments. He was ſo far from needing the advice of patience, to make the remainder of life ſupportable, that he gave it others. Even to the Judges, who in their circuit came to viſit him on his death-bed, he ſpared not his Chriſtian admonitions; and beſides his precepts, gave them his example, of the comforts that flowed from a clear conſcience. And for the inhabitants; he mourned leſs to leave the world, than they to part with him; who had ſo much endeared himſelf to them, by diligence in his paſtoral charge, by his hoſpitality, and bounty to the poor; and humble carriage to all (a). Having ſummoned his domeſtics, with deſire to declare his faith, he was perſuaded to refrain, it being manifeſt in his writings. Thus, being quite worn out with exhortations, benedictions, and the pains of his diſeaſe, he lay a while in a ſlumbering ſtate; and at length, with eyes and hands uplifted for ſome ſpace, departed this life, on March 2, 1617 (and not, as ſome have miſtaken, the year after), in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and before he had completely filled this ſee two years and three months; being one of the five Biſhops which Saliſbury ſaw in ſix years (b). He was buried over-againſt the Biſhop's ſeat in the cathedral: having been twice married; the laſt time, with ſome diſpleaſure to the Archbiſhop, about half a year after his promotion to the ſaid ſee. He left one ſon, or more, and alſo one daughter, named Martha (c), who was married to Sir Nathaniel Brent, Warden of Merton College in Oxford; and their daughter Margaret, married Dr. Edward Corbet, Rector of Haſeley in Oxfordſhire; who gave ſome of the Biſhop's MSS. to the Bodleian Library, as may appear in the article ſet apart for the enumeration of his writings [B]. There was another Robert Abbot, a Miniſter, and author alſo of ſeveral devout pieces; who though he

ABBOT (MAURICE) or rather MORRIS, the youngeſt of ſix ſons, born to Mr. Maurice Abbot, of Guilford, by his wife Alice March, and brother to Robert and George before mentioned. He was bred up to trade, and became an eminent merchant in the city of London, but was more remarkably diſtinguiſhed, by his applying himſelf to the direction of the affairs of the Eaſt-India Company, and his earneſt attention to whatever might promote the extenſive commerce of this nation, or ſtrengthen her foreign colonies. In this quality, we find him one of the commiſſioners employed in the negociation and concluſion of a treaty with the Dutch Eaſt-India Company, by which the Molucca Iſlands, and the commerce to them, is declared to be two-thirds belonging to the Dutch Eaſt-India Company, and one to the Engliſh. This treaty was concluded at London, on the ſeventh of July, 1619, and ratified by the King the ſixteenth of the ſame month, and is as remarkable a (a) tranſaction as any in that reign [A.] It was in conſequence of this treaty, and in order to recover the goods of ſome Engliſh merchants, that Sir Dudley Diggs, and Maurice Abbot, were ſent over into (b) Holland, in the ſucceeding year, 1620, but with what ſucceſs does not appear. He was afterwards one of the farmers of the cuſtoms, as appears from a commiſſion granted in 1623, to him and to many other perſons, for adminiſtering the oaths to ſuch perſons, as ſhould either deſire to paſs the ſeas from this kingdom, or to enter it from foreign countries (c). In the ſucceeding year, 1624, he was appointed one of the council, for ſettling and eſtabliſhing the colony of Virginia, with very full powers for [A] As any in that reign.] The preamble of this treaty recites, That whereas there had been long and great diſputes between the Engliſh and Dutch Eaſt India Companies, and that commiſſioners had met at London in the year 1613, and at the Hague in 1615, for the accommodating theſe diſputes, without effect, his Majeſty and the States General had been pleaſed to grant full powers to certain commiſſioners on the part of his Majeſty and the States; as alſo the like full powers to ſeveral perſons on the behalf of each of the companies, by whom a treaty was framed and concluded, in which the right of both parties to the trade of the Indies is freely acknowledged, free acceſs is allowed to the ſervants of one company in all the forts and factories of the other; it is farther agreed that each company ſhould furniſh ten men of war, for the joint defence of their commerce, each from ſix to eight hundred tons, carrying 150 men, and thirty pieces of cannon. The fortreſſes on the iſlands of Banda and Amboyna, are therein ſettled, for the mutual benefit of both nations; and it is agreed, that their garriſons ſhall be maintained out of the cuſtoms and duties levied both on the Engliſh and Dutch: in a word, this appears to have been a kind of treaty of coalition, which one would have imagined muſt have prevented for the future, any diſputes in that part of the world, and ſecured the trade thereof to the Maritime Powers. In the ratification, his Majeſty promiſes, that during the time for which this treaty was concluded, which was twenty years, he would not erect any other company, for carrying on the trade to the Eaſt Indies, than that with which this agreement was made (1).

the government of that colony, as by that commiſſion (d) appears [B]. On the acceſſion of King Charles I. to the throne, Mr. Abbot was the firſt perſon upon whom he conferred the honour of knighthood (e), and ſo great was his intereſt at that time in the city, that we find him choſen to the firſt parliament called in that King's reign, viz. in 1625, in conjunction with Sir Thomas Middleton, Sir Heneage Finch, and Mr. Robert Bateman (f). In 1627, he was one of the ſheriffs of London, with Henry Garway; Sir Cuthbert Hacket, being then Mayor (g). About the year 1635, he erected a noble monument to the memory of his brother, George, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in his native town of Guilford (h). In 1638 he was Lord Mayor of the city of London (i), and deceaſed on the tenth of January, 1640 (k), but as to any farther particulars we have not been able to diſcover them, except that he was a great lover and encourager of trade, as well as very fortunate therein [C]. He had a ſon whoſe name was George, fellow of Merton college in Oxford, and who took the degree of Bachelor of Law, in 1630 (l).

C.

[ABERNETHY (John) an eminent Preſbyterian Divine, who flouriſhed in the kingdom of Ireland during the preſent century, was born at Colraine, in the county of Londonderry in the province of Ulſter, on the 19th of October 1680 (a). His father was a diſſenting miniſter in that town, and his mother the daughter of Walkinſhaw of Walkinſhaw, in Renfrewſhire, in Scotland. He continued nine years under the care of his parents, when he was ſeparated from them, in conſequence of his father's having been ſent, in 1689, by the Preſbyterian clergy to London, to ſolicit ſome affairs; during which interval his mother, to avoid the troubles occaſioned by the inſurrection of the Iriſh, withdrew from her own houſe in Colraine to Derry (b). Young Abernethy was at this time with a relation in Ballymenagh, who determined, in the general confuſion, to remove to Scotland, and carried the child with him; having no opportunity of conveying him to his mother (c) [A]. By this happy event he eſcaped the hardſhips of the ſiege of Derry, in which Mrs. Abernethy loſt all her other children (d). He continued three years at the grammar-ſchool in Scotland, and then returned to his father's family, which was again fixed in Colraine. Here, however, he only remained at ſchool till he arrived at the age of thirteen, at which time he was ſent to the college at Glaſgow. This he often and juſtly regretted, as an error in the management of his education, ariſing from the flattering ideas his parents had entertained of his genius; ſince it could not reaſonably be thought, that he had attained a ſufficient knowledge of claſſical authors to fit him for academical ſtudies, or that his mind was enough ripened for that reflection which is neceſſary to render them ſucceſsful (e).

Mr. Abernethy continued at Glaſgow till he had taken the degree of Maſter of Arts. At this period his own inclination led him to the ſtudy of phyſic; but, in conformity to the advice of his friends, he determined to apply himſelf to that of divinity; with a view to which deſign, he went to the univerſity of Edinburgh, and was ſome time under the care of the celebrated Profeſſor Campbell (f). Upon his return home, he proſecuted his ſtudies with great ſucceſs, and was ſoon taken notice of by the Preſbytery of Route, of which his father was a member. Under the direction of the Preſbytery, he went through the uſual trials as a candidate for the miniſtry, and was licenſed to preach before he was one and twenty. In June 1701, he was invited to officiate in the diſſenting congregation at Antrim, which was then vacant; and the people, upon hearing him, expreſſed an inclination to call him to the paſtoral charge; but he reſolved, before he ſettled any where, to make a ſhort reſidence in Dublin, for the purpoſe of farther improvement (g). In that city, his preaching was ſo acceptable to the Preſbyterian Society of Wood-Street, that they gave him an invitation to ſtay with them ſome time; which requeſt was made, with an intention of choosing him joint pastor with the Reverend Mr. Boyse (b). However, his father's advice, in concurrence with his own inclination, determined him to return to the North. He quickly received an unanimous call from the congregation at Antrim; and was preparing to be ordained there, when his father died (i) [B]. In consequence of this event, he was invited to settle at Colraine, and there arose a competition between the two dissenting churches of Colraine and Antrim, which should have him for their pastor. But the matter being referred to the general synod [C], the synod determined in favour of Antrim; at which place Mr. Abernethy was ordained on the 8th of August 1703. Soon after, he married Mrs. Susannah Jordan, whose mother, Mrs. Heyland (k), was a woman of a very uncommon character, and particularly distinguished for the generosity of her spirit, her tender affections, and her most exemplary piety. The daughter copied the excellent pattern which had been set before her; so that Mr. Abernethy found himself entirely happy in the conjugal relation (l). His congregation at Antrim being a large one, he applied himself with great diligence to the duties of his station, and his public performances speedily became much admired. He had an ardent thirst for the acquisition of knowledge, which engaged him in a very industrious course of reading; and he was the principal support of a society of ministers and candidates, in the neighbourhood, who met from time to time to spend a day in useful conversation, and in communicating their studies. This excellent design was carried on for several years with considerable success. His abilities soon rendered him the subject of general observation to his brethren in the ministry; and the vivacity of his spirit, and his true wit, tempered with an exact purity of manners and good breeding, equally recommended him to the best company among the laity. He was taken notice of, from his first appearance in the Synod, for his uncommon genius, joined with admirable wisdom and discretion, with consummate candor and modesty; and he quickly gained a great ascendency in that assembly, so as to have a very large share in the management of public affairs. As a speaker, he was considered as their prime ornament, and he maintained his character and esteem in these respects to the last, when the principles he had embraced had raised against him many fierce antagonists (m).

(m) Ibid. p. 6, 7, 8.

When Mr. Abernethy had been settled nine years at Antrim, he received a very earnest invitation from the Dissenting congregation in Derry. But his own inclinations rendered him averse to a removal. He was happy in his situation: he loved his people, was useful among them, and had a pleasing prospect of farther success. It was, therefore, a satisfaction to him, that the General Synod, when the matter was debated before them, determined for his continuance at Antrim (n).

(n) Ibid. p. 8, 9.

Soon after this, in the year 1712, he lost his wife, by whom he had had one son and three daughters. This event made a deep and lasting impression upon his mind. He had the utmost affection for her; and though he bore up under his loss with all possible decency, yet there were the plainest indications that his grief was exceedingly intense. He chose, for a considerable time, to retire from the world, as much as was consistent with his performing the duties of his station. But his sufferings, upon this occasion were abundantly compensated by his progress in knowledge, and in all virtuous improvements (o) [D].

(o) Ibid. p. 9.

Mr. Abernethy, in the year 1716, applied himself to the execution of a project, which he had long revolved in his mind, of trying whether he could remove the prejudices

[B] When his father died.] Mr. John Abernethy senior was held in high esteem by all who knew him; and the character drawn of him by an intimate and judicious friend is, 'That he was an 'eminent Christian, a learned divine, a vigilant 'laborious pastor, a man of deep penetration, and 'solidity of judgment, of a strength of memory 'most unparalleled, of an extensive public spirit, a 'delicate taste for correct speaking and writing, and 'a man of polite behaviour and address (2).'

(2) Ibid. p. 5.

[C] But the matter being referred to the general synod.] The writer of Mr. Abernethy's life informs us, that the General Synod 'is the yearly meeting 'of the whole dissenting ministers associated in the 'North, with a ruling elder for each minister. This, 'according to their constitution, is the highest 'church judicatory to which appeals lie from lesser 'associations, usually called sub-synods; as to these 'last, appeals lie from the several presbyteries 'within their bounds.' From the above account it appears, that the dissenters in the north of Ireland had formed themselves exactly upon the model of the Church of Scotland. Nor is this to be wondered at, when we consider that great numbers of them were either born in, or descended from that country; and that their ministers were educated in its universities. The Irish presbyterians, like their brethren in Scotland, were warmly attached to the Westminster Confession of Faith. So great was their veneration for it, that in the year 1705, an act passed in the synod, requiring candidates to subscribe to it at their entrance into the ministry. This act became afterward no little cause of embarrassment to such of the Dissenting Clergy as had departed from the tenets of the Westminster Confession, or had conceived a dislike to subscription in general; and still continues, if we are not misinformed, to be a burden upon persons of the same turn of mind (3).

(3) Ibid. p. 6. 57, 58.

[D] And in all virtuous improvements.] Mr. Abernethy left behind him a diary of his life, which begins in February 1712-13, a little after his wife's death; and it might, possibly, take its rise from the situation of his mind under that affliction. It consists of six large volumes in quarto, in very small writing, and very closely written. It is, indeed, an amazing work, in which the temper of his soul is throughout expressed with much exactness; and the various events he met with are described; together with his reflections upon them, and his improvements of them. The whole bears such characters of a reverence and awe of the Divine presence upon his mind, of a simplicity and sincerity of spirit, and of the most careful discipline of the heart, that how great soever his reputation in the world was, it shews his real worth to have been superior to the esteem in which he was held (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 9 10.

The

dices of the native Iriſh in the neighbourhood of Antrim (who were almoſt univerſally of the Popiſh perſuaſion), and engage them to embrace the Proteſtant religion. His heart was much ſet upon the accompliſhment of this deſign; and, for a conſiderable time, he managed it alone. He went frequently to the place where the greateſt numbers of them lived, invited them to attend his lectures, converſed freely with them from houſe to houſe, and laboured to convince them of their errors. The encouragement he derived from their attendance upon public worſhip, and from the good impreſſions which were made upon ſome of them, was ſo great, that he requeſted the aſſiſtance of the neighbouring miniſters; and they zealouſly united with him in carrying on the ſcheme. Nor were his labours among the Iriſh entirely without effect. Several of them, who had been prevailed upon to renounce Popery, continued firm to the Proteſtant principles, and gave ſatisfactory evidence of their ſincere piety. Others, however, reverted back to their former perſuaſion; and the ſucceſs of the deſign doth not appear, upon the whole, to have been equal to Mr. Abernethy's expectations and hopes (p). While he was thus employed in the North, and had acquired a high reputation, he was invited, in the year 1717, by the congregation of Proteſtant Diſſenters, at Uſher's Quay in Dublin, to be their paſtor, in conjunction with the Reverend Mr. Arbuckle. About the ſame time he received an invitation to the congregation at Belfaſt, uſually called the Old Congregation. The General Synod, after a long debate among the parties, one for his going to Dublin, another for Belfaſt, and a third for his remaining at Antrim, came to a determination in favour of the firſt. This matter brought Mr. Abernethy into no ſmall degree of perplexity. He had contracted a great affection for his people in Antrim, and his labours among them had been ſucceſsful. He highly valued the ſociety of his brethren in that neighbourhood, and was held by them in the utmoſt eſteem and regard. It was his opinion that he could ſerve the purpoſes of Chriſtianity, and of the diſſenting intereſt, as effectually in Antrim as in any other ſituation; and, therefore, he thought it extremely hard that any miniſter ſhould be removed by the mere authority of the Synod, contrary to the judgment of his own mind. At the ſame time, that authority had generally been deemed indiſputable; and any thing that was likely to weaken it, or to bring it into contempt, was looked upon with great jealouſy. In this ſituation Mr. Abernethy's friends gave him different advices. Many of them urged him to comply with the Synod, and had terrifying apprehenſions of what might be the conſequences of his diſobedience; while others were convinced that the Synod had been guilty of an unjuſt ſtretch of power, and that he ought to follow his own judgment in the diſpoſal of himſelf. The reſult of his counſels was, that he determined to ſhew ſo much reſpect to the ſynodical deciſion, as to pay a viſit to the congregation at Uſher's Quay, that he might take a full view of the ſtate of things, and come to a concluſion upon the beſt and moſt impartial inquiry he could make. Accordingly, after three months ſtay in Dublin, he returned to Antrim, with a fixed reſolution of continuing there (q). This act of reſiſtance to the authority of the Synod was, at that time, ſo remarkable and uncommon a caſe, that it is particularly proper to relate, how it came to paſs that Mr. Abernethy was induced to venture upon a conduct which was very unpopular among the generality of the Iriſh Diſſenters, provoking to many, and, in the account of ſome, directly criminal (r). He had early in life been ſenſible of the pernicious tendencies of a party-ſpirit in matters of religion, and of the evils which ariſe from the tyrannical exerciſe of eccleſiaſtical power, in what form or conſtitution ſoever it hath ſubſiſted. The violent exerciſes of ſuch a power he had always oppoſed; and he was very zealous in embracing every occaſion, whether public or private, of recommending Chriſtian Charity.

(r) Ibid. p. 42.

The author of his life hath given a large account of this Diary, and made a number of extracts from it, which prove, beyond contradiction, that the preceding repreſentation of him is ſtrictly juſt (5). Among other inſtances of Mr. Abernethy's devotion, we find that he frequently ſhut himſelf up the whole day, which he ſpent in prayer, in reading the ſcriptures, and in religious meditation. As this may be aſcribed by ſome, to an enthuſiaſtic or ſuperſtitious turn of mind, we ſhall tranſcribe his reaſons for ſpending ſo much time in the ſecret duties of piety; from which it will be evident, that his notions of the end and deſign of religion were rational and manly. 'I have reſolved to ſet apart 'this day for the ſolemn exerciſes of devotion. 'Not that I place religion in ſuch things; for cer-'tainly it conſiſts in a conformity of the habitual 'diſpoſition to the will of God, and an uniform 'tenor of converſation. When I was a child in 'religion, that is, beginning to be ſerious, many 'a danger I was expoſed to, particularly that of 'being impoſed upon by a warm imagination, lay-'ing too great ſtreſs upon what I counted divine 'impreſſions, upon fervours and raptures in religion. 'This, I believe, ſome young and unexperienced 'Chriſtians are apt to fall into. But true Chriſtia-'nity conſiſts in love to God and charity to man, 'which is the bond of perfectneſs. It conſiſts in 'doing juſtly, and loving mercy; in meekneſs, 'patience, and contentment. O my ſoul, endeavour 'to grow in theſe virtues! That is the ſure 'way of pleaſing God; and it is eſſentially neceſ-'ſary to real religion, that a deſign of pleaſing 'God be conſtantly and uniformly purſued: where-'ever that is neglected, ſincerity is loſt. But I 'apply myſelf to theſe exerciſes, firſt, becauſe they 'are a noble employment of the mind, moſt worthy 'of its rational powers, tending to their higheſt 'perfection, and affording moſt ſolid joy. Secondly, 'In ſolemn tranſactions with God, I may hope for 'ſuch a confirmation in virtuous ſentiments and 'diſpoſitions, and ſuch advantages over worldly 'luſts, as may be of great uſe to me in future life; 'and this hope is juſtified by experience. Thirdly, 'I would lay ſtricter obligations upon myſelf to 'greater watchfulneſs, and cautions againſt the 'ſprings of error, and perplexity, and guilt, into 'which I have been formerly miſled, and my life 'rendered uncomfortable (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 18, 19, 20.

But,

But, ſome time before the attempt was made to remove him to Dublin, he had acquired much lower opinions of the deference to be paid to the authority of ſpiritual aſſemblies, than he had heretofore entertained. This revolution in his mind was owing to Biſhop Hoadly's celebrated ſermon on the kingdom of Chriſt; to ſeveral of the papers written in the controverſy occaſioned by that ſermon; and, eſpecially, to the Biſhop's defence againſt the repreſentation of the Committee. Mr. Abernethy became, from henceforward, a ſtrenuous advocate for religious freedom, and endeavoured to promote it to the utmoſt of his abilities. Nor was he the only diſſenting clergyman in the North of Ireland, whoſe ſentiments were much enlightened by the writings of Doctor Hoadly and his aſſociates. A ſpirit of Chriſtian liberty and charity remarkably diffuſed itſelf in that country; and, in conſequence of it, a conſiderable number of miniſters, and others, formed themſelves into a ſociety of a ſimilar nature with that mentioned in the preceding part of this article, and conſiſting chiefly of the ſame perſons. Their deſign was the improvement of uſeful knowledge; for the attainment of which end, they made it their endeavour to bring things to the teſt of reaſon and ſcripture. Mr. Abernethy promoted this deſign with the greateſt zeal. He conſtantly attended the meetings of the ſociety; and no man contributed more than he did to promote the true purpoſes for which it was inſtituted. As the gentlemen who compoſed it frequently met at Belfaſt, which was the moſt centrical place, the name was given them of the Belfaſt Society (s). But afterwards, when ſeveral of the members had withdrawn themſelves from it, on account of the debates which aroſe in that part of the kingdom concerning eccleſiaſtical power and Chriſtian liberty; thoſe who continued to purſue the deſign of it, came to be diſtinguiſhed by the title of Non ſubſcribers (t) [E]. Mr. Abernethy was juſtly conſidered as the head of the Non-ſubſcribers. As ſuch, he had the greateſt ſhare, both in conducting their counſels, and managing their public debates; and his behaviour in theſe reſpects procured him an extraordinary reputation for ſound wiſdom and eloquence. He was particularly diſtinguiſhed by an evenneſs and conſtancy of temper, which nothing could ruffle or diſcompoſe. The vivacity and quickneſs of his apprehenſion, the perfect preſence of his mind, and the penetration of his judgment, in conjunction with an eaſy and ready utterance, and a clear, ſtrong, and agreeable voice, enabled him to ſpeak extempore for a long time together, with ſuch pertinency of ſentiment, and fluency of expreſſion, as commanded the reſpect and attention of the hearers. Theſe talents excited admiration and applauſe, even when the cauſe he pleaded for was diſliked (u). In truth, Mr. Abernethy had full occaſion for the exertion of his abilities. He, and his Non-ſubſcribing brethren were ſurrounded with difficulties and troubles. They were regarded with jealouſy, treated with obloquy and reproach, oppoſed with vehemence; and prejudices, invincible by reaſon, were formed againſt whatever they alleged in their own defence and favour. The populace, in moſt places, conceived a great averſion both to their perſons, and their public performances; and to this the authority of the Synod very much contributed (w). The majority of the Synod conſiſted of narrow-minded and bigoted men; who, in ſeveral caſes, were influenced by a ſpirit of animoſity and contention, and exerciſed their juriſdiction with no little hardſhip and injuſtice (F).

The exertions of Mr. Abernethy's zeal againſt ſubſcription, were not confined to the debates of thoſe eccleſiaſtical aſſemblies of which he was a member. He appeared, likewiſe,

(7) Mr. Mears was the Author of a Catechiſm for Children, a Collection of Family Prayers, and a Treatiſe on the Lord's Supper, which are in good reputation. Beſides theſe, he publiſhed one or two occaſional ſermons. He was born at Longford, Jan. 24, 1694-5, educated at Glaſgow or Edinburgh, and licenſed to preach by the preſbytery of Down, May 28, 1718. On the 10th of Feb. 1719-20, he was ordained, by the ſame preſbytery, paſtor of the diſſenting congregation at Newtown Claneboy, in the county of Down; from which place he removed to Clonmell in 1736. He ſettled at Dublin in 1740, where he continued till his death, which was on the 11th of October, 1767. Mr. Mears was a man of good abilities, of great integrity, and the intimate friend and aſſociate of Abernethy, Duchal, Mr. William Bruce, &c. He was, likewiſe, the gentleman, as well as the Chriſtian, and was held in general eſteem *.

(8) Ubi ſupra, p. 47. 57. 62.

[E] The title of Non-ſubſcribers.] Beſides Mr. Abernethy, the principal members of this ſociety were, Dr. James Kirkpatrick and Mr. Samuel Halyday, both of Belfaſt; Mr. Michael Bruce of Hallywood, Mr. Thomas Nevin of Down-patrick, Mr. John Mears of Newtown (7), Mr. Harper of Moyra, Mr. John Henderſon of Dunane, Mr. Thomas Shaw of Ahgill, Mr. William Taylor of Carncaſtle, Mr. Joſias Clugſton of Larne, and Mr. Thomas Wilſon of Ballyclare. Theſe gentlemen appear to have been men of conſiderable abilities and of unblameable lives. Indeed, had they not been eminent for the purity of their manners, nothing could have ſupported them againſt the torrent of prejudice which they had at firſt to contend with: for their ſide of the queſtion was very unpopular, and the clamour raiſed againſt them almoſt univerſal. The characters of Meſſrs. Kirkpatrick, Halyday, Bruce, Taylor, Shaw, Harper, and Nevin, are drawn at ſome length, and to great advantage, by the author of Mr. Abernethy's life. Thoſe of Meſſrs. Wilſon, Clugſton, Henderſon, and Mears, are omitted, becauſe they were ſtill living (8). The avowed principles of theſe Non-ſubſcribers were as follows: 'Firſt, That our Lord Jeſus Chriſt hath in 'the New Teſtament determined and fixed the 'terms of communion in his church: that all 'Chriſtians who comply with theſe have a right to 'communion; and that no man, or ſet of men, 'have power to add any other terms to thoſe ſettled 'in the goſpel. Secondly, That it is not neceſſary 'as an evidence of ſoundneſs in the faith, that candidates for the miniſtry ſhould ſubſcribe the Weſtminſter Confeſſion, or any uninſpired form of articles, or Confeſſion of Faith, as the term upon 'which they ſhall be admitted; and that no church 'has any right to impoſe ſuch a ſubſcription upon 'them. Thirdly, That to call upon men to make 'declarations concerning their faith, upon the penalty of cutting them off from communion, if 'they ſhould refuſe it; and this merely upon ſuſpicion and jealouſies, while the perſons required 'to purge themſelves by ſuch declarations, cannot be fairly convicted upon evidence, of any error 'or hereſy; is to exerciſe an exorbitant and arbitrary power, and is really an Inquiſition (9).

(9) Ibid. p. 59. 60.

[F] And exerciſed their juriſdiction with no little hardſhip and injuſtice.] Of this a remarkable inſtance was exhibited, in the caſe of the Reverend Thomas Nevin, M. A. Paſtor of the Church of the Preſbyterian Denomination in Down-patrick, who was accuſed of having aſſerted in converſation, 'That it is no blaſphemy to ſay that Chriſt is not 'God (10).' It appears, however, that this was not a general aſſertion, but ſpoken with a particular reference to the Jews. Mr. Nevin had mentioned, in likewiſe, from the preſs, in the ſame cauſe. So early in the diſputes concerning church government as 1719, he publiſhed a ſermon, from Rom. xiv. 5. Let every man be fully perſuaded in his own mind; in which he explained the rights of private judgment, and the foundations of Chriſtian liberty. This ſermon hath by many been eſteemed an excellent in company, with diſlike, that article of the Weſtminſter Confeſſion of Faith (ch. xxiii. § 3.), which declared that it was a branch of the civil magiſtrate's power, to ſuppreſs all blaſphemies; and he had urged, that if the Jews, who are uſually reckoned by Chriſtians as guilty of blaſphemy, for denying Chriſt to be God, were to be treated according to that article, they would be put to death inſtead of being converted; and by that means the predictions of the ſcriptures, concerning their converſion, would be rendered utterly impoſſible to be fulfilled. Being aſked, whether it were not a ſin or error in the Jews to deny the divinity of our Lord, he replied, that it was no doubt a ſin and error in them, but not ſuch as made them obnoxious to puniſhment from the ſecular powers. It was then urged upon him, whether it was not blaſphemy in them to deny Chriſt to be God; to which he anſwered, and repeated it again, That it was no blaſphemy in them to deny Chriſt to be God (11). This was the whole crime of which Mr. Nevin was guilty; and indeed, he was ſo far from calling in queſtion the divinity of our Saviour, that he gave the moſt ſatisfactory evidence of his belief in that doctrine. In his letter to Mr. Smith, he makes the following declaration, which many will think was too great a conceſſion: 'If any thing ſaid by me can, 'with any ſhew of juſtice, amount to prove me an 'Arian, or one that denies the divinity of my 'deareſt Lord, let not country, nor law, nor ſynod 'ſpare me (12).'

(11) Ibid. p. 4, 5.

(12) Ibid. p. 8.

The proofs of Mr. Nevin's orthodoxy were of no avail. He was brought before the General Synod which met at Dungannon, in June 1724, and the Synod's proceedings againſt him were irregular in two reſpects. He ought to have been previouſly examined by his own preſbytery, and thence the matter ſhould have been referred to the Synod. But, contrary to all cuſtom and decorum, they took it up in the firſt inſtance. When they had gone thus far, they did not proceed in the method of regular trial, but inſiſted upon Mr. Nevin's purging himſelf by making an expreſs declaration of his belief of the Supreme Deity of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. This he refuſed, not only as an irregular demand (ſince he was willing and deſirous to put himſelf upon his trial), but as exerciſing an inquiſitorial power in the Chriſtian church; and for his refuſal he was turned out of the Synod. However, a conſiderable number of miniſters proteſted againſt his expulſion, among whom was Mr. Abernethy. In peruſing the proceedings of this aſſembly of preſbyterian divines, who were not themſelves members of an eſtabliſhment, and who ſubſiſted only on a toleration which had been obtained but a few years before, we ſhall find as much bigotry and injuſtice as are to be met with in almoſt any eccleſiaſtical council (13).

(13) Ibid. paſſim.

The proteſt which was drawn up on this occaſion was very long, and remarkably good. It ſeems indeed ſuperior to the reſt of the pamphlet in which it is contained, and to Mr. Nevin's defence, although that is exceedingly ſenſible; and, conſidering the ſhort time he had to prepare it in, does him great honour. It is probable, from Mr. Abernethy's active ſpirit, from his zeal for religious liberty, and from the lead he took in all important affairs, that he had no ſmall hand in the compoſition of the proteſt; on which account we have mentioned it in this place.

Such was the attachment of the Iriſh diſſenting clergy to the doctrine of ſubſcription, that they ſeem to have been unwilling to receive the benefits of the Toleration Act, unleſs it required ſubſcription to the Weſtminſter Confeſſion. While the ſcheme for obtaining the act was in agitation, it was reſolved, at a meeting of miniſters and gentlemen, held at Antrim, on the tenth and ſeventeenth of November 1715, that the firſt thing they ſhould propoſe and inſiſt upon, as the terms on which they would accept of a toleration, ſhould be upon their ſubſcribing the Weſtminſter Confeſſion of Faith. When this reſolution came to be conſidered at the General Synod which met at Belfaſt on the 19th of June 1716, the Synod unanimouſly approved of it, and agreed to adhere to it. A difficulty however having been ſtarted, both at Antrim and Belfaſt, whether the government would accede to the terms upon which they wiſhed to obtain a toleration, it was, at length, determined, after much conſideration and debate, that it would not be a relinquiſhing of the Weſtminſter Confeſſion of Faith, as their confeſſion of faith, to accept of a toleration on the condition of their ſubſcribing the following formula: 'I profeſs faith in God the Father, and in Jeſus 'Chriſt, the eternal Son of God, and in God 'the Holy Ghoſt, and that theſe three are 'one God, the ſame in ſubſtance, equal in 'power and glory. I believe the ſcriptures of 'the Old and New Teſtament were given by 'divine inſpiration; and that they are a perfect 'rule of faith and practice; and purſuant to this 'belief I agree to all the doctrines common to all 'the Proteſtant Churches at home and abroad, 'contained in their and our public Confeſſions of 'Faith.' It was further reſolved, 'that it was law'ful to ſubſcribe the above formula, if enjoined by 'lawful authority, as the condition of a toleration.' Laſtly, it was reſolved by the Synod, 'that after 'uſing all proper endeavours for obtaining a tole'ration upon ſubſcribing the (Weſtminſter) Con'feſſion of Faith, and after its appearing that ſuch 'an attempt was hopeleſs, they would aſk a tolera'tion upon the above formula, at ſuch a ſeaſon as 'ſhould be agreed upon to be convenient.' From the unanimity with which theſe reſolutions were carried, and from Mr. Abernethy's being miniſter of Antrim, and a member of the General Synod, it is certain that he concurred in them; ſo that he muſt either at that time have entertained very different ſentiments from what he ſoon afterwards embraced; or elſe he, and the reſt of his brethren who might ſecretly be averſe to eccleſiaſtical reſtraints, had no conception of being able to procure a Toleration Act, without ſubmitting to a religious teſt. But, notwithſtanding the zeal which the Iriſh Diſſenters expreſſed for having the Weſtminſter Confeſſion bound upon them; or, at leaſt, a formula which implied an approbation of that Confeſſion, they were not gratified in their deſires. A toleration was granted them upon much more catholic and generous terms; and this, we are told, was entirely owing to the friendly interpoſition of King George the Firſt. The act took place on the 1ſt of January 1719, old ſtyle; and the conditions of it are, that the Diſſenting Miniſters ſhall take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration; renounce, upon oath, the belief of the Pope's uſurped power over temporal princes; and renounce ſeveral of the groſſer Popiſh doctrines, as Tranſubſtantiation, the Invocation of the Virgin Mary, of Saints, the Sacrifice of the Maſs, &c. It was alſo required, that the place of worſhip ſhould be regiſtered. Near the end of the act is the following clauſe: 'Provided this act ſhall 'not extend to give any eaſe to Papiſts or Popiſh 'recuſants, nor to any that, in preaching or writ'ing, ſhall deny the doctrine of the Trinity, as 'declared in the Thirty-nine articles agreed upon 'in Convocation held at London in the year 1562, 'and referred to in the act of 17 and 18 of Charles 'the Second, chap. 6.' When any miniſters conform to the act, nothing is ſaid to them concerning the above clauſe, nor is a word ever uttered relative to what they ſhould or ſhould not preach, what they do or do not believe. Having taken the oaths, they are only deſired to write under them their names, in the county liſt or regiſtry. In the warm contentions which afterwards aroſe between the Subſcribers and the Non-ſubſcribers, the latter very pertinently rebuked their antagoniſts for departing from thoſe pacific and healing meaſures, of which ſo excellent an example had been ſet them in the royal clemency and moderation.

Now we are upon this ſubject, it may not be amiſs to relate a circumſtance which inſpired a general ardour for carrying into execution a ſcheme excellent performance; but it greatly increaſed the jealouſies and diſcords which were then ſpringing up among the Iriſh Diſſenters. As it ſtruck at ſome favourite points reſpecting eccleſiaſtical power and the terms of communion, it raiſed a vehement oppoſition. Several papers were written againſt it, and the Belfaſt Society exerted themſelves in its defence (x).

Afterwards, when the diſcords were carried to a ſtill higher pitch, and a rupture was threatened, Mr. Abernethy publiſhed a ſmall piece, intitled, 'Seaſonable Advice to the contending parties in the North;' which was accompanied with a Preface, by the Reverend Meſſrs. Weld, Boyſe, and Chappin, of Dublin. The deſign of the publication was to prove, that there ought to be no breach of communion among the Proteſtant Diſſenters, on account of their different ſentiments and practices concerning ſubſcription to the Weſtminſter Confeſſion. The paper was anonymous: but a large anſwer to it having been given by one Mr. Maſterton, Mr. Abernethy thought proper to make a full reply, in a book to which he prefixed his name; and a poſtſcript to which was added, by the three gentlemen before mentioned. The endeavours of Mr. Abernethy, and ſome of his brethren, to prevent a ſeparation, were without effect. The Synod determined, in the year 1726, that the Miniſters, who were uſually called the Non-ſubſcribers, ſhould no longer be of their body; and revived, with additional force, the act of 1705, requiring the candidates for the miniſtry to ſubſcribe the Weſtminſter Confeſſion. From that time the excluded members formed themſelves into a ſeparate Preſbytery (y). Great, however, were the difficulties and diſcouragements to which theſe gentlemen were expoſed. They ſuffered much in their characters, and their ſocieties, in conſequence of the clamours and the odium which were raiſed againſt them. New congregations were erected in ſeveral places, of ſuch as ſcrupled to attend the religious ſervices of the Non-Subſcribers. Mr. Abernethy found that the reputation he had acquired, and which was eſtabliſhed by a long courſe of a moſt exemplary life, was no ſecurity to him againſt theſe evils. Some of his people forſook his miniſtry; and, at length, the number of the diſſatisfied increaſed ſo much, that they were formed by the Synod into a diſtinct ſociety, and provided with a paſtor. Nevertheleſs, the far larger part of his old friends adhered firmly to Mr. Abernethy, and retained as high an eſteem of him as ever (z).

(z) Ibid. p. 74, 75, 76.

In this ſituation of things, he became leſs averſe to the thoughts of a removal from Antrim than he had heretofore been; and, accordingly, in the year 1730, he accepted of a call from the congregation of Proteſtant Diſſenters in Wood-ſtreet, Dublin, to ſucceed the Reverend Mr. Boyle, one of their miniſters lately deceaſed. His acceptance, however, of the invitation, was only upon condition that he could ſettle his people at Antrim to their ſatisfaction; which was ſoon happily accompliſhed. From his diary it appears that he entered upon his new charge with great concern of mind, and with an earneſt ſolicitude that he might perform the ſervice of it in a reputable and ſucceſsful manner. Though he was arrived at that period of life, in which many think they may be excuſed from a laborious application to ſtudy, yet he gave himſelf to reading, meditation, and the compoſition of ſermons, with as much ardour and diligence as ever. He wrote all his diſcourſes at full length, and compoſed one almoſt every week. His turn of preaching was now conſiderably different from what it had been in early life. For ſome years he delivered his ſermons with a very great pathos, which tended to ſtrike the imaginations and the paſſions of his hearers. But he departed much from this practice in his riper age. He was deſirous of avoiding every thing which looked like enthuſiaſm, and addreſſed himſelf, therefore, more directly to the conſciences of men, and to the higher principles of action, in a ſtyle ſtrong and nervous, rather than pathetic. At Dublin, he conſtantly uſed his which had before been thought of, for obtaining an act of toleration in Ireland. As the reverend Mr. Samuel Fowke, paſtor of the joint churches of Waterford, Kilkenny and Eniſcorthy, was preaching at the latter place, in the year 1716, Francis Toplady and Clement Archer, Eſqrs; Juſtices of the peace for the county of Wexford, and one Carrol, a conſtable, entered the room; and the conſtable was ordered to take Mr. Fowke by force from the deſk; the Juſtices at the ſame time, calling him by opprobrious names. He pleaded, that he had a certificate, ſigned by the Mayor, and Mayor elect of Waterford, giving him an honourable character, and ſetting forth that he had taken the oath of allegiance to his Majeſty, to whom he was a faithful ſubject: That the King, who had confirmed liberty of conſcience in England, would give no thanks to thoſe who diſturbed Diſſenters, being proteſtants, in Ireland: That he came to the place by invitation, and had creditable perſons with him, who would be ſecurity for his good behaviour. Notwithſtanding this remonſtrance, he was taken, as a criminal, to an attorney's office, where the Juſtices ſigned a warrant to ſend him, as a vagrant, from conſtable to conſtable, to the bounds of the county, which was accordingly done. This was not the firſt time that Mr. Fowke had been ill treated. He had before been once diſturbed in the ſame county, and obliged to appear at the aſſizes. Upon occaſion of the ſecond violence, he reſolved to take public notice of it; and accordingly he preferred a complaint, by way of petition, to their Excellencies the Duke of Grafton and Lord Galway, who ordered a ſevere reproof to be ſent Meſſieurs Toplady and Archer, for the part they had acted. Though, in conſequence of this reproof, Mr. Fowke and his friends were no more diſturbed in their religious aſſemblies, the affair did not reſt there. For the caſe having been repreſented to the Diſſenting Miniſters in Dublin, and particularly to Mr. Boyſe and Mr. Chappin, they immediately entered into the moſt vigorous meaſures for obtaining a Toleration Act; and which, as we have ſeen, were crowned with a ſucceſs far ſuperiour to the expectations or wiſhes of moſt of the Iriſh Diſſenting Clergy. It is probable, however, that many of them who, before the year 1719, had changed their ſentiments with regard to ſubſcription to Confeſſions of faith, would ſincerely rejoice at the extenſive liberty with which they had legally been favoured (14).

notes in the pulpit; a method which he had not practiſed in the North. This method he did not apply to from any neceſſity, but from a conviction that it was right, on ſeveral accounts; and, eſpecially, as it had a tendency to diſcourage the negligence which ſome might otherwiſe be tempted to give way to in the compoſition of their ſermons (a) [G].

Not long after his ſettlement at Dublin, he entered again into the married ſtate, with Miſs Boid, daughter of Mr. John Boid, a gentleman of character and fortune, at Rathmore, near Antrim. With this lady Mr. Abernethy lived, in all the tenderneſs of conjugal affection, to his death (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 77.

The Diſſenters in Ireland were about this time ſolicitous to emancipate themſelves from the incapacities laid upon them by the Teſt Act. With a view to promote the deſign, Mr. Abernethy wrote a paper, to ſhew the unreaſonableneſs and injuſtice (c) of all ſuch laws, as, upon account of mere differences in religious opinions and forms of worſhip, excluded men of integrity and ability from ſerving their country, and debarred them of thoſe privileges and advantages to which they had a natural and juſt title, as free-born ſubjects. What he particularly inſiſted upon was, that, conſidering the ſtate of Ireland, it was a great error, in point of policy, to continue reſtraints which weakened the Proteſtant intereſt, and were prejudicial to the government. In the year 1733, the Iriſh Diſſenters received ſuch encouragement from ſome perſons of diſtinction in England, and ſuch ſtrong aſſurances of ſupport from many members of parliament in their own country, that they propoſed to move the Houſe of Commons for a bill to repeal the Sacramental Teſt; and Mr. Abernethy again appeared from the preſs, in favour of the ſcheme. He publiſhed, in conjunction with two friends, ſeveral papers upon the ſubject, which are generally underſtood to have been written with as much ſpirit and ſtrength of reaſon, as are to be met with in any thing which appeared on that ſide of the queſtion. His arguments, however, were found to have but little force, when ſet in oppoſition to the views and intereſts of different contending parties. The deſign miſcarried (d) [H].

(c) This was in the year 1731.

(d) Ubi ſupra, p. 78, 79, Vide Tracts and Sermons mentioned in the note [I] below.

Mr. Abernethy continued his labours in Wood-ſtreet with much reputation for ten years; during which term he was very happy in the ſociety and eſteem of his friends. Though he was well qualified to ſhine in converſation, and poſſeſſed a moſt cheerful temper, he was not fond of frequently appearing in mixed company. No man ever leſs affected to put himſelf in the way of the great; and, indeed, he regarded it as the indication of a little mind, to court them with ſuch humble application as is often done. From the ſtrength of his conſtitution, the vigour of his ſpirit, and the perfect temperance of his life, it was hoped that his uſefulneſs would long be preſerved. But this pleaſing proſpect was unexpectedly cut off. He had been ſubject, from time to time, to attacks of the gout, which had hitherto only affected the extremities. But, in December 1740, that diſorder ſuddenly attacked his head, and quickly produced the uſual melancholy ſymptoms. As ſoon as he became ſenſible what his caſe was, he was convinced that his diſſolution approached; an event for which he was fully prepared. Accordingly he met death with great compoſure and firmneſs of mind; with a chearful acquieſcence in the will, and fixed truſt in the power and goodneſs of that Being who governs the univerſe. He died in the ſixtieth year of his age. An account of his works, and ſome farther particulars concerning his character, will be given in the notes [I] and [K] (e).

[G] Compoſition of their ſermons.] Mr. Abernethy's change in the mode of his preaching was, probably, one cauſe of his declining popularity. If he had continued that warm, pathetic, and (in a certain degree) extemporaneous manner which he had formerly practiſed, he might, notwithſtanding the alteration of his opinions, have retained a greater meaſure of acceptance among the people. Many of thoſe diſſenters who, at this period, had embraced the notions of Dr. Samuel Clarke, adopted at the ſame time his method of compoſing ſermons, without being able, perhaps, to attain the clearneſs and ſtrength with which that great man delivered his ſentiments, though they had no pathos to recommend them. Mr. Abernethy's abilities were, indeed, of the firſt rate, and his diſcourſes are admirable, according to the model he propoſed in the latter part of his life. But it is certain, that a conſiderable number of thoſe non-conforming clergy, to whom the title hath been given of the rational Diſſenters, weakened their compoſitions, and injured their uſefulneſs, by imagining that they were to addreſs to the reaſon only, and not to the affections of mankind; a notion which, in every view of it, is abſurd; and peculiarly ſo in men who are engaged in keeping up a ſeparation from the eſtabliſhed church. Their tranſition, likewiſe, from a looſe, warm, and vehement, to a correct and unanimated mode of preaching, was too ſudden and violent. For the Diſſenting Miniſters had not ſufficiently availed themſelves of the excellent examples which, from the time of the reſtoration, had been ſet them by the moſt eminent divines of the church of England; ſuch, for inſtance, as Barrow, Tillotſon, Scougal, Sharp, Lucas, Biſhop Moore, and others. I ſay, the diſſenting miniſters had not, in general, availed themſelves of theſe examples; for no doubt, there were many exceptions to the truth of this obſervation.

[H] The deſign miſcarried.] I remember to have read ſome years ago, a curious manuſcript narration of the proceedings in this whole affair, which was then in the hands of Dr. Benjamin Franklin. I know not from whence the Doctor had it, nor whether he carried it with him to America, or left it behind him in England. The Diſſenters were oppoſed in their attempt by the formidable and ſucceſsful pen of Dr. Swift. The Dean wrote three tracts againſt them, which are diſtinguiſhed by all that aſperity he was capable of; and which uſually marks his compoſitions, where the Whigs, and eſpecially the Preſbyterians, are concerned (15).

In 1751 there was a volume publiſhed, printed for Griffiths in St. Paul's Church Yard, and ſold by Bradley, Bookſeller in Dublin, entitled, 'Scarce and valuable Tracts and Sermons occaſionally publiſhed by the late Reverend and learned John Abernethy, M. A. now firſt collected together: containing,

I. 'Reaſons for the Repeal of the Sacramental Teſt, in Five Numbers.' (From the Dublin Edit. 1733.)

No. 1. 'The Argument taken from the Nature and Genius of Chriſtianity.'

No. 2. 'An argument for repealing the Teſt Act, taken from its proſtituting the ſacrament, and its tendency to irreligion.'

No. 3. 'An argument for repealing the Teſt Act, taken from its inconſiſtency with the principles of civil liberty.'

No. 4. 'An anſwer to the objections againſt the repeal of the Teſt Act, taken from that law's being a ſecurity to the eccleſiaſtical eſtabliſhment.'

No. 5. 'Some political arguments for repealing the ſacramental teſt.' One of the two friends, in concert and with the aſſiſtance of whom theſe numbers were written, was Mr. William Bruce of Dublin, a very extraordinary character of whom may be found in the Monthly Review, vol. xiii. p. 253—267. and vol. xiv. p. 351—356.

II. 'The Nature and Conſequences of the Sacramental teſt conſidered; with reaſons humbly offered for the repeal of it.' Firſt printed at Dublin, 1731.

III. 'Seaſonable Advice to the Proteſtant Diſſenters in the North of Ireland; being a defence of the late General Synod's charitable declaration, with a recommendatory preface by the reverend Nath. Weld, J. Boyſe, and R. Choppin.' Firſt printed at Dublin, 1722.

IV. 'Religious Obedience founded on perſonal Perſuaſion. A ſermon preached at Belfaſt, Dec. 9, 1719, on Rom. xiv. 5.'

V. 'Perſecution contrary to Chriſtianity. A ſermon preached in Woodſtreet Dublin, on the 23d of October, 1735, being the Anniverſary of the Iriſh Rebellion; on Matth. v. 44.'

Theſe are all the ſermons and tracts contained in this collection. But he publiſhed likewiſe,

'A Sermon preached at Antrim, Nov. 13, 1723. at a faſt obſerved in the preſbyterian congregation in Ulſter, by agreement of their miniſters, on account of diviſions; on 1 Cor. iii. 3. Printed at Belfaſt, 1724.' And

'A Reply to the Rev. Mr. Maſterton, in defence of the Seaſonable Advice to the Diſſenters in the North of Ireland. With a Poſtſcript by the Rev. Meſſrs. Weld, Boyſe, and Chappin, in vindication of their recommendatory preface to the Seaſonable Advice.'

There is alſo mentioned in his life, p. 83, as the firſt thing he publiſhed, 'A Sermon on occaſion of the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, on Pſal. xx. 6.' And likewiſe, 'A Sermon before the General Synod (when he was Moderator), on Dan. xii. 4.'

All the performances here deſcribed, except one, are referred to or mentioned, but not with their full titles, in Dr. Duchal's Life of Mr. Abernethy.

[K] Farther particulars concerning his character.]

'His behaviour as the head of a family was, in all reſpects, exemplary. Beſides the daily regular worſhip of God in it (a matter in which he was very exact himſelf, and which with the greateſt zeal he recommended to others, accounting it one great cauſe of the decay of religion, ſo juſtly complained of in the preſent age, that family worſhip was ſo much neglected), he ſet apart a day, from time to time, ſeveral hours of which he ſpent with his family, inſtructing his children and ſervants, and praying with them. And he had the teſtimony of all in his houſe, and of all the neighbourhood, to the great meekneſs of his ſpirit, the evenneſs of his temper, and a generous affectionate care of all that were under his roof.

'It may be reckoned amongſt his more private labours, that every fortnight, for ſeveral years, he ſpent a day with the Members of his Seſſion, or (as it is ſometimes called) Conſiſtory, and as many of the principal perſons in the congregation as were diſpoſed to attend ſuch ſervice, in prayer and converſation upon uſeful ſubjects. Many of theſe have ſpoken frequently of it ſince, as what was of great advantage to them. Several points in Chriſtianity, which are leſs obvious to the unlearned, were freely diſcourſed upon, and every man had opportunity of propoſing his difficulties. But the converſation always turned principally upon matters relating to practice, and which might tend to edification.

'In the public ſervice he followed the rules then uſually obſerved in the north; expounding ſome portion of ſcripture, and preaching twice every Lord's-day. On Wedneſday he always preached a ſermon; after which he ſpent ſome time converſing with the Members of the Seſſion, about the ſtate of the congregation; and inquiring into any public ſcandals, which were laid before them, according to the rules of diſcipline obſerved amongſt the Diſſenters, in which he was very exact (16).

'He was very remarkable for true and ſprightly wit, which was always correct, and the moſt diſtant poſſible from levity; this rendered his converſation as agreeable and entertaining, as it was improving and uſeful; no perſon of any taſte could grow weary of his company. He had naturally a negligent air, and the appearance of inattention. As there was nothing at all affected in theſe, they were not diſagreeable to ſuch as knew him; but ſtrangers were often ſurpriſed to hear him reaſon juſtly, and ſpeak with exact-

(16) Life of Abernethy, p. 32, 33, 34.

'neſs, when he appeared to them very little to 'mind what he was engaged in.

'Of his eminent piety much has been already 'ſaid, but it deſerves a particular remark, that 'piety appeared in him in the moſt amiable manner, 'and like itſelf, manly and rational; there was 'nothing gloomy, nothing ſtiff or unnatural in his 'religion; and he was extremely happy in a free, 'eaſy, and chearful manner, in conjunction with 'the greateſt tenderneſs of ſpirit, and the warmeſt 'zeal for God. In his temper and behaviour, men 'ſaw that religion, as it was intended to be, ſo is 'in reality, the perfection of nature; no other than 'the proper exerciſe and improvement of our facul-'ties, and the beſt means of attaining to the true 'enjoyment of life.

'The whole of his conduct was guarded by the 'greateſt prudence. The moſt important ſecrets 'might, with perfect ſafety, be committed to him; 'and he had the greateſt tenderneſs for the cha-'racters of mankind. He never ſpoke to a man's 'diſadvantage, when it was not neceſſary to anſwer 'ſome good end; and was utterly abhorrent of 'ſpeaking evil to gratify a malicious or envious 'ſpirit, or from poverty of invention and want of 'what to ſay in company. Indeed, his whole be-'haviour was ordered with great diſcretion. He 'was carefully attentive to all the decencies of life. 'The purity of his manners was unblemiſhed. He 'was exactly temperate, rather, indeed, to a fault, 'abſtemious; and ſeemed to take pleaſure in the 'greateſt ſeverities of virtue.

'His paſſions were naturally ſtrong, but they 'were under ſuch correction, that his temper was 'uſually ſpoken of as quite immoveable. Incidents 'which would have been ſhocking to other men, 'were met by him without any apparent emotion. 'And in ſome circumſtances of life, which were 'extremely afflicting, he not only carried it with 'decency, but ſhewed ſuch a tranquillity of ſpirit 'and conſtancy, as amazed his friends. All who 'were acquainted with the delicacy of his temper, 'knew, that this was not in the leaſt owing to 'inſenſibility; and therefore muſt have high ideas 'of him, as having by religion and virtuous diſ-'cipline got above the common weakneſſes of 'human nature. There was, indeed, no part of 'his character more to be admired than this.

'His mind was formed for friendſhip. He en-'tered into the true ſpirit of it, and had a great 'reliſh for thoſe ſtrict intimacies in which only the 'higheſt joys of it can be taſted. But it will be 'readily concluded from his character, that it muſt 'be with very few that he could enter into ſuch in-'timacies. When he did, the generoſity of his ſpirit, 'the tenderneſs of his affection, and faithful con-'ſtancy, muſt render that relation very happy to his 'friend. His Diary ſhews, that he had ſome ſuch 'friendſhips, and he frequently mentions them with 'a ſpirit which became that ſacred relation.

'But he was a hearty friend, in the general ac-'ceptation of that term, to all men of worth, and 'ready to do good to all as he had opportunity. 'He was indeed ſparing in profeſſions, but never 'failed in important acts of kindneſs; and where 'he thought reſpect was due, he came ſhort of no 'one in paying it. But he had a juſt ſenſe how un-'worthy it was of him to put on appearances of 'reſpect to the worthleſs; and a ſhew of honour 'and regard, where diſregard only and neglect 'were to be juſtly expected. From this mean vice 'no man was ever more free. He knew what was 'due to others, and what he owed to himſelf; and 'was peculiarly happy in maintaining the dig-'nity of his own character, conſiſtently with mo-'deſty and the greateſt meekneſs of ſpirit.

'He took much pleaſure in directing and aſſiſting 'young candidates in their ſtudies; and was al-'ways ready to enter into converſation with them 'upon any points, with the difficulty of which 'their minds were preſſed and entangled. But 'made it his care, principally, to aſſiſt their reaſon-'ings, and informing their judgments of things by 'argument, and according to evidence; endea-'vouring to encourage liberty of thinking; and to 'take them off from all undue regard to authority, 'as he was himſelf the moſt diſtant poſſible from 'claiming any, or thinking the worſe even of the 'youngeſt learner for differing from him in diſput-'able points.

'His faithfulneſs to his friends ſhewed itſelf re-'markably in one thing, which is amongſt the very 'tendereſt offices, and requires the diſcreeteſt hand; 'that is, animadverting freely upon their culpable 'weakneſſes. This he never failed of doing when 'there was the leaſt proſpect of advantage from it. 'And though he could act this part with ſeverity 'enough, when that was neceſſary, yet it was 'ſo tempered with good will, and an apparent inten-'tion to ſerve the beſt purpoſes, that no one, not 'quite loſt to ingenuous ſentiments, could be diſ-'pleaſed with him. And he thoroughly underſtood 'how to addreſs himſelf to men in the moſt effec-'tual manner; and could touch the affections and 'ſprings of action with great dexterity, ſuiting his 'application to the various tempers of men, which 'no one could more readily find out (17).

'But many thought he did not excel more in 'any thing than in prayer. In this he had a fluency 'of thought and expreſſion, which ſeemed inex-'hauſtible. And the diſcerning hearer might 'eaſily perceive great fervour of ſpirit, with an ex-'act propriety of words; and very exalted ſtrains 'of devotion, without any thing of the falſe ſub-'lime, but perfectly ſuitable to the gravity of a 'ſolemn addreſs to God. It appears from his 'Diary, that he was at much pains to qualify him-'ſelf for performing this part of the public ſervice 'after a right manner. His prayers, upon ſome 'particular occaſions, were compoſed with great 'care, and committed to memory. And as he 'looked upon the ſcriptural ſtyle to be the moſt be-'coming in our addreſſes to God, ſo he made 'much uſe of ſcriptural phraſes; and was ever 'very happy in the choice of thoſe which were beſt 'adapted to the matter of his petitions, or adora-'tion and praiſe (18).'

ABLE or ABEL (Thomas) Chaplain to Queen Catherine, conſort of King Henry VIII. (a), diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal in oppoſing the proceedings of that king, and in particular the divorce of his royal miſtreſs. To this end, as Anthony Wood informs us, he wrote a piece intituled, Tractatus de non diſſolvendo Henrici & Catherinæ matrimonio, i. e. 'A Treatiſe proving that the marriage of King Henry and Queen Catherine ought not to be diſſolved.' [But the title of the work, according to Biſhop Tanner (b), was, Invicta Veritas: "An Anſwer, that by no manner of law it "may be lawful for the King to be divorced from the Queen's Grace, his lawful and "very Wife;" unleſs theſe writers ſpeak of two different productions, which may poſſibly be the caſe, as Thomas Able, in Stat. 25 Henry VIII. c. 12. is deſcribed as having "cauſed to be printed and ſet forth in this realm, diverſe books againſt the "divorce and ſeparation (c)."] He took his degree of Bachelor of Arts at Oxford, on the fourth of July 1513 (d); and that of Maſter of Arts, on the twenty-ſeventh of June 1516 (e). In the year 1534, he fell under a proſecution for being concerned in the affair of Elizabeth Barton, called The Holy Maid of Kent [A]; [and was adjudged guilty

During his impriſonment, he was ſo cloſely confined, that the keeper of Newgate was committed to the Marſhalſea priſon, for ſuffering him to go out upon bail (f). ACCA (St.) (a) Biſhop of Haguſtald, or Hexam, in Northumberland [A], ſucceeded Wilfrid in that ſee, in the year 709. He was a Monk of the order of St. Benedict, an Anglo-Saxon by birth, and had his education under the moſt holy prelate Boſa, Biſhop of York; and from thence was taken under the patronage of Wilfrid, whom he accompanied in a journey to Rome. Here he improved himſelf in ſeveral things, relating to eccleſiaſtical uſage and diſcipline; which (his hiſtorian tells us) it was impracticable for him to learn in his own country (b) [B]. This prelate, [by the help of architects, maſons, and glaſiers, hired in Italy,] ornamented his cathedral to a great degree of beauty and magnificence [C], furniſhed it with plate and holy veſtments, procured a large collection of the lives of the Saints, and erected a noble library conſiſting chiefly of eccleſiaſtical learning (c). About the year 732, Acca was driven from his ſee into baniſhment, but for what cauſe is unknown [D]. He was eſteemed a very able divine, and was remarkably ſkilled in church-muſic [E]. He wrote [A] Biſhop of Haguſtald, or Hexam, in Northberland.] As this epiſcopal ſee has been now a long time extinct, the curious reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee here a ſhort account of it, as extracted from our old Engliſh hiſtorians by Mr. Camden. 'And now 'the whole Tine, being well grown, and ſtill increaſing, preſſes forward in one channel for the 'ocean, by Hexam, which Bede calls Haguſtald. 'This was the Axelodunum of the Romans, where 'the firſt cohort of the Spaniards were in garriſon, 'as the name implies, as alſo its ſituation on a 'riſing hill; for the Britons called ſuch a mount 'Dunum. But take an account of this place from 'Richard its Prior (‡). Not far from the ſouthern 'bank of the river Tine, ſtands a town, of ſmall 'extent indeed at preſent, and but thinly inhabited; 'but (as the remaining marks of its ancient ſtate will 'teſtify) heretofore very large and magnificent. This 'place is called Hextoldeſham, from the little rivulet 'of Hextold, which runs by, and ſometimes ſuddenly 'overflows it. In the year 675, Etheldreda, wife of 'King Egfrid, aſſigned it for an epiſcopal ſee to St. 'Wilfrid; who built here a church, which, for the 'curiouſneſs and beauty of the fabric, ſurpaſſed all the 'monaſteries in England. ——— But the honour [of 'being an epiſcopal ſee] after the twelfth Biſhop, 'was wholly loſt, the Daniſh wars prevailing. 'Afterwards it was only reckoned a manour of the 'Archbiſhops of York, till they parted with their 'right in an exchange made with Henry VIII. (1).

From this aſſertion of Bede's it appears, that the Engliſh and Roman churches were not yet brought to an uniformity in all points.

[C] He ornamented his cathedral to a great degree of beauty and magnificence.] The author of a catalogue of the Biſhops of Hexam, publiſhed by Wharton (3), has the following remark upon this Prelate's benefactions, which it may not be improper to ſet down. Lubens hæc commemoro, ut priſcam gentis noſtræ devotionem, & in ſacris magnificentiam, Lectores intueantur: neve ornamenta eccleſiarum pretioſa a primævæ (inter nos) fidei ſimplicitate aliena habeantur. —— 'I willingly mention theſe benefactions, that 'the readers may ſee the ancient devotion of our 'nation, and its magnificence in ſacred matters; 'and that rich ornaments of churches may not be 'thought foreign to the ſimplicity of faith among 'us.'

[D] He was driven from his ſee into baniſhment, but for what cauſe is unknown.] We learn this particular of the life of Biſhop Acca from Richard, Prior of Haguſtald (4). That Author's words are: 'Anno vero Dominicæ incarnationis 732 & regni 'Ceolvulfi IV, & epiſcopatus ſui 24, de ſede ſua 'fugatus eſt ——— Qua autem urgente neceſſitate pulſus fit, vel quo diverterit, ſcriptum non 'reperi. Sunt tamen qui dicunt quod eo tempore 'epiſcopalem ſedem in Candida inceperit & preparaverit. ——— In the year of Chriſt 732, the 'fourth of the reign of Ceolwolf, and the twenty-'fourth of his promotion to the epiſcopacy, he was 'driven from his ſee ——— But, what urgent 'neceſſity obliged him to withdraw, or to what place 'he retired, we are no where told. Some indeed pretend, he then laid the foundation of an epiſcopal ſee 'at Candida Caſa or Withern.' The ſuppoſition (here mentioned) of Acca's founding the ſee of Candida Caſa, during the time of his exile, cannot be true, ſince that biſhopric was founded (or rather reſtored) before Bede finiſhed his Hiſtory, that is before the year 731: as appears from Bede himſelf. 'At vero Provinciæ Northan-hymbrorum, 'cui rex Ceolvulf præeſt, quatuor nunc epiſcopi 'præſulatum tenent: Wilfrid in Eboracenſi Eccleſia, Æthiwald in Lindisfaronenſi, Acca in Haguſtaldenſi, Pecthelm in ea quæ Candida Caſa vocatur; quæ nuper, multiplicatis fidelium plebibus, in ſedem pontificatûs addita, ipſum primum habet antiſtitem (5). —— In the province of North-'umberland, over which King Ceolwolf reigns, there 'are now four Biſhops governing their reſpective ſees; 'Wilfrid in the Church of York, Æthiwald in that of 'Lindisfarne, Acca in that of Haguſtald, and Pecthelm in that called Candida Caſa; of which he is 'the firſt Biſhop, it having been lately taken into the 'number of epiſcopal ſees, on account of the great increaſe of the faithful.'

[E] He was remarkably ſkilled in church-muſic.] Bede informs us, that Acca retained in his ſervice, during twelve years, an excellent ſinger named Maban; by the help of whoſe inſtructions, he revived the uſe of church-muſic, and ſinging of anthems. This wrote the following pieces: 1. Paſſiones Sanctorum, i. e. 'The Sufferings of the Saints.' 2. Officia ſuæ Eccleſiæ, i. e. 'The Offices of his own Church.' 3. Epiſtolæ ad Amicos, i. e. 'Letters to his Friends.' 4. Pro illuſtrandis ſcripturis ad Bedam, i. e. 'For explaining the Scriptures, addreſſed to Bede (d).' He died in 740 [F], having governed the church of Hexam twenty-four years, under Egbert King of the Northumbrians (e). This Maban, it ſeems, had been taught to ſing by the ſucceſſors of the diſciples of St. Gregory the Pope in Kent. Cantatorem quoque egregium, vocabulo Maban, qui à ſucceſſoribus diſcipulorum beati Papæ Gregorii in Cantia fuerat cantandi ſonos edoctus, ad ſe ſuoſque inſtituendos accerſiit, ac per annos duodecim tenuit: quatenus & quæ illi non noverant, carmina eccleſiaſtica doceret; & ea quæ quondam cognita longo uſu vel negligentia inveterare cæperunt, hujus doctrina priſcum renovaret in ſtatum (6).

[Acca not only revived and improved church-muſic by the aſſiſtance of Maban, but introduced the uſe of many Latin hymns hitherto unknown in the northern churches of England (7). 'If we may believe William of Malmeſbury, who wrote about the year 1120, they had organs in the Saxon churches before the Conqueſt. He ſays, that Archbiſhop Dunſtan, in King Edgar's reign, gave an organ to the Abbey-church of Malmeſbury; which he deſcribes to have been like thoſe in uſe at preſent. "Organa, ubi per æreas fiſtulas "muſicis menſuris elaboratas, dudum conceptas "follis vomit anxius auras." William, who was a Monk of this Abbey, adds, that this benefaction of Dunſtan was inſcribed in a Latin diſtich, which he quotes on the organ pipes (8).']

[F] He died in 740.] His body was buried with great ſolemnity in the church of Haguſtald; and two ſtone croſſes of exquiſite workmanſhip were placed, the one at his head and the other at his feet. Three hundred years after, his ſepulchre being opened, the burial-cloaths, in which his body was wrapt, were found entire, and not in the leaſt decayed; an argument (ſays an hiſtorian) of his great ſanctity, and a proof of his never-fading glory. In argumentum magnæ ſanctitatis, & teſtimonium incommutabilis gloriæ ejus (9). There was found upon his breaſt, a ſmall wooden tablet in the form of an altar, made of two pieces of wood joined together with ſilver nails; on which was this inſcription: Alme Trinitati. agie. ſophie. Sanctæ Mariæ (10).

[G] Simeon of Durham relates ſeveral miracles performed by the relics of St. Acca.] For the reader's amuſement I ſhall ſelect one or two. A certain brother in the church of Haguſtald, whoſe name was Aldred, reſolved one day to ſeparate the bones of St. Acca, which had hitherto lain mixed with his aſhes, and depoſit them in a cheſt prepared for that purpoſe. Accordingly having brought out the relics, and laid them on St. Michael's altar, he picked out the bones, and wrapping them in a linen napkin placed them in the cheſt. This done, he took up the cheſt, and went with it into the choir, where he intended it ſhould ſtand, leaving a brother of his to watch the relics. This brother, being left alone, and having a ſtrong deſire to get into his poſſeſſion a relic of ſo great a ſaint, reſolved to ſearch amidſt the aſhes, in hopes ſome little bone might inadvertently have been left behind. But firſt, that he might not proceed irreverently, he kneeled down, and repeated the ſeven penitential pſalms; then approaching the altar, he began to ſtir the aſhes; when ſuddenly a flame burſting forth, as from the mouth of an oven, drove him back, and obliged him to deſiſt from his attempt; convincing him at the ſame time, that it was not the will of God, that he ſhould take away the minuteſt particle of ſuch precious relics (11). Another miracle is as follows: One Edric, a preſbyter, coming to the church of Haguſtald, perceived a heap of earth lying near one of the altars; into which beginning to dig, he diſcovered a wooden box, and in it a leaden caſket, with an inſcription, importing that ſome of the relics of St. Acca were contained therein. The prieſt, having broke open the caſket, found in it a little parcel of duſt reſembling aſhes, and intermixed with a few bones; which he took away with him. It happened at that time he was acquainted with a pious but poor old woman of the town, who had been a long time blind; and it came into his thoughts to try the virtue of his relics in effecting her cure. Accordingly he ſteeped one of the Saint's bones in a little holy water; and having waſhed her eyes therewith, in about two hours time, through the merits and interceſſion of St. Acca, ſhe was reſtored to ſight (12).

ADAMS (Thomas) citizen and Lord-Mayor of London: a man of great eminence in his time, for his prudence and piety, his loyalty and ſufferings, and his acts of munificence both in town and country. He was born at Wem in Shropſhire, anno 1586, educated in the univerſity of Cambridge, and bred a Draper in London (a). [In the year 1639, he was choſen Sheriff of that city (b); and was of ſo public a ſpirit, that when his ſon-in law brought him the firſt news of the ſaid election, he immediately diſmiſſed his particular buſineſs, and never afterwards perſonally followed his trade, but gave himſelf up to the city concerns (c). He made himſelf ſuch a maſter of the cuſtoms and uſages, the rights and privileges of the city; and, at the ſame time, was found to be a man of ſuch wiſdom and integrity in the exertion of his knowledge, that there was no honour in the city whereof he was capable, to which he was not preferred (d). He was choſen Maſter of the Draper's Company, Alderman of a Ward, and Preſident of St. Thomas's Hoſpital, which would probably have been ruined, had it not been for his ſagacity and induſtry in diſcovering the frauds of an unjuſt ſteward (e). He was often returned a burgeſs in parliament, though the iniquity of the times would not permit him to ſit there: and in the year 1645, he was elected Lord-Mayor of London (f); in which office he was ſo far from ſeeking his own benefit, that he would not accept of thoſe advantages which are uſually made, by ſelling the vacant places (g). On account of his incorruptible loyalty to King Charles the Firſt, his houſe, while he was Lord-Mayor, was ſearched by the party then getting into power, in expectation of finding the King there. This party finding that Mr. Adams was a man who would not be moulded into their forms, or make ſhipwreck of his conſcience, to ſerve their intereſt, he was, the year after, caſt into the Tower, and detained a priſoner for ſome time: and, for ſeveral years, he was excluded from all public offices and employments (h). His conſtancy to the royal cauſe brought upon him, beſides theſe troubles, the ſcoffs and detractions of his adverſaries, which others have cleared him of [A]; and many writers, in verſe as well as proſe, have applauded his adminiſtration, when in office.] At length he became, and ſo continued for ſome years, the firſt among the twenty-ſix, the eldeſt Alderman upon the bench, that had ſerved in the office of Lord-Mayor, to whom is given that honourable title, of FATHER of the CITY (i). [His Prince, alſo, deſervedly conferred upon him the greateſt honours of which his ſtation was capable. Such was his generous loyalty and affection to Charles II. that, in the perilous times of his exile, he had remitted to him ten thouſand pounds (k). When therefore, at his Majeſty's joyful return to theſe realms, Mr. Adams was deputed by the city, to go, though in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, as their commiſſioner, to Breda in Holland with General Monk (l), to congratulate the King, and attend him home, he was, in conſideration of his ſignal ſervices, knighted at the Hague by the ſaid King, and, a few days after the Reſtoration, advanced to the dignity of a Baronet of England, on the 13th of June 1660 (m). His merit is ſtill more extenſive in the character of a benefactor to the Public. At Wem, he gave the houſe of his nativity for a free-ſchool, and liberally endowed it (n). He likewiſe founded an Arabic profeſſorſhip at Cambridge, on condition that it were frequented by a competent number of auditors (o); and it thrived ſo well, that the ſalary of forty pounds per annum (p), was ſettled upon Mr. Abraham Wheelock, Fellow of Clare-Hall, a man of great learning and induſtry, whoſe longer life would probably have much improved the Polyglott Bible. Theſe munificent endowments, both of which were perpetual, took place, the firſt of them twenty years, and the ſecond above thirty years, before Sir Thomas Adams's death (q). At the deſire of Mr. Wheelock, he was at the expence of printing the Perſian Goſpels, and of tranſmitting them into the Eaſtern parts of the world. Thus he endeavoured to promote the Chriſtian religion, by throwing, as he himſelf uſed to expreſs it, a ſtone at the forehead of Mahomet (r). He was alſo a conſpicuous example in private as well as public charities. His hands were open in his life-time, upon all occaſions, to objects of want and deſert; and, though he had ſuffered many great damages in his eſtate, he gave conſiderable legacies to the poor of ſeveral pariſhes, to hoſpitals, and miniſters widows. His fine and graceful preſence [B] was exceeded by the virtues of his mind, among which he was particularly diſtinguiſhed for his Chriſtian patience and fortitude under a variety of heavy afflictions; ſuch, as himſelf acknowledged, he could not have borne, were it not from the ſtrength he received from thoſe divine examples, wherewith he had been ſo converſant. In his latter years he was much afflicted with the ſtone in his bladder. This, by a fall as he was ſtepping out of a coach (s), haſtened his death, which happened on the (t) 24th of February 1667, when he was eighty-one years of age. That ſtone was of ſuch extraordinary magnitude, that it was found, when taken from him, to exceed twenty-five ounces in weight (u): and it is, therefore, preſerved in the laboratory at Cambridge (x). The worldly affairs in which he had been ſo much engaged, left in him no reluctance at the thoughts of his diſſolution. He was always prepared for death; and it was his frequent language, Solum mihi ſupereſt ſepulchrum. All my buſineſs now, is to fit me for the grave. His funeral ſermon was preached by Dr. Hardy, on the 10th of March following, in St. Catherine Cree Church, before a numerous audience; among whom were, not only Sir Thomas's children [C], and his many relations, but

And a little further, 'Such was his tongue! frequently tipped with ſilver, nay golden ſayings; which he brought forth out of the treaſure of his memory: ſuch were his lips! with which (as well, nay better, than with his bountiful table) he fed not only his children and ſervants, but all who converſed with him; among whom I can truly ſay, I never went to him, but I did or might come away from him bettered by his gracious and prudent diſcourſe. Nor was he only, as I doubt too many are, a man of words; his goodneſs was not only at his tongue's but his finger's ends. ADAMSON (PATRICK) Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's. He was born March 15, 1563, in the town of Perth, deſcended of mean, but very honeſt and indulgent parents (a), who willingly afforded him all the learning they were able. As a proof of this, they ſent him to the grammar-ſchool in the place where they dwelt; and thence he went to the univerſity of St. Andrew's, where he paſſed through a courſe of philoſophy, and attained the degree of Maſter of Arts (b). Their circumſtances not allowing them to maintain him any longer there, he was conſtrained to return home, and think of ſome way of getting his bread. In order to this, he removed to a little village in Fife, where he taught ſchool, and in a ſhort time gained ſuch a reputation, that many gentlemen in the neighbourhood ſent their ſons to be educated under him (c). In this condition he continued about four years, till Mr. James M'Gill, of Rankellor, one of the ſenators of the College of Juſtice, intending to ſend his eldeſt ſon into France to ſtudy the Civil Law, made choice of Mr. Adamſon, to be his tutor or preceptor (d). With this young gentleman he ſet out for Paris in the year 1566, which is the firſt date we meet with in the memoirs of his life. In the month of June, in the ſame year, Mr. Adamſon's loyalty involved him in a very unlucky difficulty [A]. Neither had he eſcaped ſo eaſily as he did, had not Queen Mary, Dowager of France, and Sovereign of Scotland, with ſome of the principal nobility in the kingdom, intereſted themſelves in his behalf (e). As ſoon as he recovered his liberty, he retired with his pupil to Bourges, where he and young Mr. M'Gill both entered ſtudents of Law. He was in that city during the maſſacre at Paris, and the ſame humour prevailing there, he narrowly eſcaped ſuffering martyrdom for the Proteſtant religion, living concealed no leſs than ſeven months in a certain public houſe, the maſter of which, for his charity to hereticks, was thrown from the top of it, and beat to pieces, though upwards of ſeventy years old (f). While Mr. Adamſon lay thus in his ſepulchre, as he juſtly called it, he wrote two excellent pieces in Latin verſe, which are ſtill extant [B]. In the year 1573, he returned into Scotland, where he married a lawyer's daughter, probably with an intent to have furthered his progreſs in that ſcience; but finding no encouragement, and ſtanding in need of a preſent proviſion, he entered into holy orders, and became miniſter of Paiſley (g). In the year 1575, he was appointed one of the commiſſioners to confer on ſettling the juriſdiction and policy of the Church, by the General Aſſembly (h). In a General Aſſembly held the ſucceeding year at Edinburgh, he, together with Mr. David Lindſay, was appointed to report their proceedings to the Earl of Morton, then Regent (i). The ſame year, that great nobleman appointed him one of his chaplains; and on the death of Biſhop Douglas, raiſed him to the Archbiſhoprick of St. Andrews (k), a dignity which brought him nothing but trouble and uneaſineſs.

[A] Mr. Adamſon's loyalty involved him in a very unlucky difficulty.] The occaſion was this, Mary Queen of Scots, being delivered on the 19th of June, 1566, of a Prince, afterwards James VI. of Scotland, and Firſt of England (1); Mr. Adamſon, to ſhew his loyalty, and it may be alſo to ſhew his genius for Latin poetry, wrote a very fine copy of verſes, which he procured to be immediately printed and publiſhed. The title of this poem ran thus: Sereniſſimi & Nobiliſſimi Scotiæ, Angliæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Principis, Henrici Stuarti Illuſtriſſimi Herois, ac Mariæ Reginæ ampliſſimæ Filii Genethliacum (2). i. e. A Poem on the Birth of the moſt ſerene and moſt noble Prince of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, Son of the moſt illuſtrious Hero Henry Stuart, and of the moſt potent Queen Mary. This poem was publiſhed on the 25th of June, but ſix days after the birth of the Prince, who was the ſubject of it; and therefore we may be ſure, that it was both written and printed in ſome hurry; however, the giving the titles of France, and England, to his own Prince, ſo much alarmed the French court, that they inſtantly cauſed him to be arreſted, and might perhaps have proceeded to greater ſeverities, if immediate applications and all poſſible excuſes had not been made to the miniſtry (3); which, however, did not hinder Mr. Adamſon's being cloſely confined for ſix months. The Engliſh court alſo were not leſs angry; but at length, with much ado, the matter was made up. Perhaps the reader will not be diſpleaſed at being put in mind, that this was a ſort of prophecy, which afterwards was verified; ſince he whom he then ſtiled Prince, was actually acknowledged as King by that very ſtile, though our author never lived to ſee it.

[B] In Latin verſe which are ſtill extant.] Dr. Mackenzie calls the French univerſity, at which Mr. Adamſon ſtudied, Bruges (4), I cannot tell why, ſince the Latin writer of the Archbiſhop's life, from whom he had his materials, tells us expreſsly that it was Bourges, which is indeed a French univerſity, and capital of the dutchy of Berry. The poems mentioned in the text, were, a Poetical Verſion of the Book of Job, and the Tragedy of Herod, who was ſmitten by an Angel. Of both theſe he immediately ſent copies to Lyons and Paris, to be printed. That which he ſent to Lyons was directed to Bouillius, and that which he ſent to Paris was addreſſed to Lambinus; but the civil wars which quickly enſued hindered their being committed to the preſs; and it was not till long after, that the author recovered one of the copies, and that by the greateſt accident that could be. For on the death of Lambinus, his papers falling into the hands of Dr. Henry Blackwood, he diſcovered amongſt them both theſe pieces, and immediately tranſmitted them to our author, who committed them to the preſs in 1572, and they were received with univerſal applauſe (5).

[C]

On October 24, 1576, the General Assembly sat at Edinburgh, and, in their seventh session, required Mr. Adamson to submit himself to the trial and examination of the Assembly, and to receive the office of a Bishop with such limitations as they thought fit, which he refused to do, whereupon they forbad the Chapter of St. Andrews to proceed to any election. However, after the Assembly rose, the Chapter met, and elected Mr. Patrick Adamson Archbishop. The next year, the General Assembly appointed commissioners to summon the Archbishop before them, to examine into the validity of his election, and to take cognizance of various charges brought against him (l). The clamour of the Presbyterian party ran very high against him, and now they first began to vent those stories, which afterwards their authors inserted in their histories; and which are, not only contrary to truth and justice, but even to probability, and inconsistent with each other [C]. The unfortunate prelate vainly imagining, that by displaying his zeal for Religion, his great skill in the Scriptures, and his excellent vein in Latin Poesy, he should be able to sooth the passions of these angry men; composed a Catechism in Latin verse (m). This they saw and approved, but went on persecuting him for all that [D]. In 1578, he submitted himself to the General Assembly, which procured him a little quiet, and but a little; for in 1579, a new commission was issued out to enquire into fresh charges against him, whereupon the Archbishop retired to St. Andrews, and for some years they continued disputing, the Archbishop being constantly treated as an enemy to the Church, and preserved from destruction only by the power of the court (n). In 1582, the Archbishop was seized with a grievous disease, and kept himself in the castle of St. Andrews, which the author of the true History of the Church of Scotland calls decently, living like a fox in a hole (o). The physicians were at a loss what to call his distemper, and could afford him little or no relief. In his distress he took some simple medicine from an old woman, whose name was Alison Pearsone, which did him good (p). One would have thought such a circumstance as this, could scarcely have been rendered worthy the ears of posterity; yet such was the malice of the Archbishop's enemies, that they charged the old woman with witchcraft, and the poor Prelate with seeking to the devil to save his life. On this strange charge, the woman was committed to prison, but by the Archbishop's means, as they gave out, made her escape. However, four years afterwards, she was met with again at Edinburgh, and, at the instance of the Presbyterian ministers, was fairly burnt for saving

[C] Inconsistent with each other.] We have a good deal on this subject in Dr. Mackenzie's account of our author; but the Doctor does not take any great pains to show, that the scandalous things said of the Archbishop are inconsistent, and therefore cannot be true, neither is he at all particular in citing authorities. To readers well acquainted with Scottish history, this might not be necessary, but to other persons it makes his account very obscure. The gross of what was alledged against him, when he became Archbishop was what follows: 'That his 'father's name was Constance, a baker in Perth, and 'under the name of Constance he assisted as a minister 'in the first General Assembly of the Kirk of Scot-'land, in the year 1560. After this, having de-'serted his ministry, he went over to France to 'study the laws; but upon his return, he betook 'himself again to the ministry, and being baulked 'of the Archbishoprick of St. Andrew's, in the 'month of February, 1572, he preached at St. 'Andrew's; and in his sermon told the people, 'that there were Three sorts of Bishops, my Lord 'Bishop, my Lord's Bishop, and the Lord's Bishop. 'My Lord Bishop was in the time of Popery. My 'Lord's Bishop is now, when my Lord getteth the fat 'of the benefice, and the Bishop seweth for a portion 'out of the benefice, to make my Lord's right sure; 'and the Lord's Bishop is the true minister of the 'gospel (6).' For these particulars we are referred to Petrie and Calderwood, but very probably Dr. Mackenzie never consulted those authors, since Petrie expressly cites (7) another writer, for what he says of the Archbishop, who ought therefore to be reputed the author of the first part of the story at least (8). That the Archbishop's name was really Constance, is not a suggestion of late date, for we find in the continuation of Hollinshed's Chronicle (9), that he is stiled Patrick Adamson, alias Constance, in his life-time, for that book was printed in 1587. But that he became a minister before he went to France, is expressly contrary to the Archbishop's own testimony in his prefaces, and it can scarcely be believed, that he would dare to affirm a falsehood in the face of the whole church. The story of his preaching is likewise inconsistent with his own account of his return into Scotland, which he places in 1573, nay, which is worse, it is not to be reconciled to their own account of the matter; for if what one of their writers says be true, that out of mere pity to his necessity, Mr. Andrew Haye procured him the church of Paisley; it is impossible that he should immediately after pretend to the highest ecclesiastical preferment in the kingdom, and this too, against such a person as Mr. John Douglas, Rector of the university, and a man of extraordinary interest. But to put this matter out of dispute, it must be observed, that Mr. Douglas was nominated to the Archbishoprick in 1571 (10), when, without all question, Mr. Adamson was out of the kingdom, so that he could not be piqued at missing the Archbishoprick. How such stories came to be broached, is no hard matter to discover, since we find Calderwood telling us expressly, and with triumph, that when he opposed the Kirk, certain writers set him forth in his colours, which is neither better nor worse, than countenancing men of great spleen to write any thing that came into their heads, provided always the enemies of the Kirk were the objects of their invectives. The English histories at the same time, discover this to have been too much practised here, as the reader may find by consulting the article of AILMER, or of ARTHINGTON.

[D] Went on persecuting him for all that.] The title of this work was, Catechismus Latino Carmine redditus, & in Libros quatuor digestus 1577 (11), i. e. The Catechism rendered into Latin Verse, and digested into four Books. This was written for the use of the young King, and was received with such universal applause, that Mr. Robert Pont, who was both a minister and a judge, and Mr. James Lawson, both warm in the prosecution of our author, could not forbear publishing two very fine Latin poems in praise of that performance (12). It was also much admired in England, in France, and in the Low-Countries, where the author was already well known by his Latin translation of the Confession of Faith, which he procured to be printed, while he resided in France, at the hazard of his life.

the Archbiſhop's life (q) [E]. In 1583, King James VI. coming to St. Andrews, our Prelate, who was now pretty well recovered, preached before him, and maintained the dignity of his order with great ſpirit and eloquence, and alſo diſputed with Mr. Andrew Melvin before the King, with great reputation (r). This drew upon him new calumnies, and freſh perſecutions [F]. The King, however, was ſo well ſatisfied of the Archbiſhop's wiſdom and loyalty, that he ſent him his Ambaſſador to Queen Elizabeth, in which quality he reſided for ſome years at London. As to his conduct there, nothing can be more different, than the reports thereof by ſeveral authors. Thus much however is certain, that by his eloquent preaching, he drew after him ſuch a concourſe of people, and raiſed in their minds ſuch a high idea of the young King his maſter, that Queen Elizabeth forbad him to enter the pulpit, during his ſtay in her dominions (s). But ſtill the Biſhops, and ſuch Noblemen as were zealous for the intereſt of the Church, received our Biſhop kindly, and treated him very reſpectfully, doing all that lay in their power to make the difficulties he laboured under, which were not a few, ſome way tolerable to him (t). There ſeems to be no reaſon to doubt, that the two things he principally laboured, were the recommending the King his maſter to the nobility and gentry of England, and the procuring ſome ſupport for himſelf, and the Epiſcopal party in Scotland, which was then in a very low ſtate. In each of theſe deſigns, he had as much ſucceſs as the ſituation of things at that time, and his own unlucky circumſtances, would allow: for his revenues were far from being large, and his ſkill in managing them was very indifferent. His enemies took occaſion from thence, to repreſent him as an extravagant man, and a great dilapidator; his friends, with more humanity and truth, ſaid, that he had ſpent too much time about other ſciences, to be well ſkilled in œconomy. As to his intriguing with the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, or having any concern in that which was called Throgmorton's conſpiracy, though they are charged upon him with great confidence (u) by ſome writers, yet it ſeems to be without any foundation; ſince it can ſcarcely be imagined that the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, Mendoſa, who was himſelf a zealot, or any of the violent Papiſts, who were dipped in thoſe dark deſigns, ſhould have any confidence in a Proteſtant Prelate, who had written with great force and freedom againſt their religion, and who was withal a perſon needy in circumſtances, and of a timorous diſpoſition [G]. Soon after the execution of the firſt Earl of Gowrie, viz. in the year 1584, the Archbiſhop was recalled, and ſat in the Parliament, which [E] Fairly burnt for ſaving the Archbiſhop's life.] Petrie mentions this ſtory of the witch twice (13), once from the books of the General Aſſembly, and a ſecond time, from a piece called the Hiſtorical Narration; but Calderwood tells us the ſtory more plainly (14). 'Mr. Patrick Adamſon, called commonly Biſhop of St. Andrews, had keeped his caſtle like a fox in a hole, a long time diſeaſed of a great Feditie, as he himſelf called his diſeaſe. He ſought cure of women ſuſpected of witchcraft, namely of one who was apprehended, tried by the Preſbytery, and committed to the caſtle to be kept to farther trial, but ſuffered by him to eſcape: yet was ſhe apprehended within three or four years after, and was executed in Edinburgh. He keeped his caſtle ſince the Aſſembly holden in April 1582.' This is but one, out of many paſſages, wherein this heavy charge of applying to a witch, is over and over repeated, though the reader may pleaſe to obſerve, that it was then very cuſtomary, nor is it yet uncommon for women in that part of the world, to pretend to great ſkill in curing chronic diſtempers, ſuch as this of the Archbiſhop's ſeems to have been, ſince he was afterwards adviſed to go to the Spaw for cure.

[F] New calumnies and freſh perſecutions.] Let the reader take it in Mr. Calderwood's own words. 'When the King cometh to St. Andrews, he becometh a whole man, occupied the pulpit incontinent, declaimed before the King againſt the miniſtry and the lords, and their proceeding. He profeſſed before, that he had not the gift of application, now he applieth, but inſpired with another ſpirit than faithful miniſters uſe to be. In his ſermon he affirmed for certain, that the Duke of Lennox died a Proteſtant, having in his hand a ſcroll, which he called the Duke's Teſtament. A merchant woman ſitting before the pulpit, and ſpying narrowly, affirmed that the ſcroll was account of four or five years old debt, which a few days before ſhe had ſent to him. It is true, the Duke refuſed to take the ſacrament out of a prieſt's hand, when he was dying, but had received it before, as was reported, out of the Biſhop of Glaſgow's hand (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 141.

[G] Of a timorous diſpoſition.] Calderwood having reported the order made by Queen Elizabeth, for the Spaniſh Ambaſſador's quitting her kingdom, proceeds thus: 'Let the Reader then judge what could move Mr. Patrick Adamſon to quake and tremble, when Francis Throgmorton was apprehended. What Buſineſs could he have with the Spaniſh Ambaſſador? And upon what ground did he maintain, that liberty of conſcience was expedient? Was it not becauſe he was in working, and he was privy to it? And ſeeing the Duke of Guiſe was to be chief ring-leader of the invaſion above mentioned, Who will believe that the Duke of Lennox was not privy to it? If he had ſtayed, by all appearance, this plot had been very far advanced (16).' Father Parſons, in one of his books, gives us ſome light into this embaſſy. For having firſt introduced a diſcourſe concerning the exceſſive pride of the Preſbyterian miniſters in Scotland, he then makes the perſon into whoſe mouth he put it, proceed thus: 'And ſo, ſaid I of late, to their moſt reverend and worthy Prelate and Primate, the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, with whom it was my luck to come acquainted in London, whither he was come by his King's appointment (as he ſaid) to treat certain affairs with our Queen and council. And talking with him of this diſorder of his miniſtry, he confeſſed the ſame with much grief of mind, and told me, that he had preached thereof before the King himſelf, deteſting and accuſing diverſe heads thereof, for which cauſe he was become very odious to them, and other of their faction, both in Scotland and England. But he ſaid, that as he had given the reaſons of his doings unto our Queen, ſo meaneth he ſhortly to do the ſame unto Mr. Beza, and to the whole Church of Geneva, by ſending thither the articles of his and their doings; proteſting unto me, that the proceedings and attempts of thoſe factious and corrupt men, was moſt ſcandalous, ſeditious, and perilous, both to the King's perſon and to the Realm; being ſufficient indeed to alienate wholly the young Prince from all affection to our religion, when he ſhall ſee the chief profeſſors thereof, to behave themſelves ſo undutifully towards him (17).

was held about the end of Auguſt at Edinburgh. In that Parliament, ſeveral acts were made for ſettling the peace of the kingdom, and for eſtabliſhing the King's authority in Eccleſiaſtical affairs (w). Yet this produced little effect; the miniſters refuſed abſolutely to pay obedience, and becauſe the Archbiſhop preached often before the King, perſons were encouraged to beat at the Church doors in order to diſturb him; and moſt outrageous libels were every where ſcattered againſt him, in order to ruin his reputation, and make him odious to the people. To abate, if poſſible, this temper in the people, and to ſet things in a true light, the King cauſed a declaration to be made by the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, of the reaſons which induced thoſe laws, and obliged his majeſty and his council to ſee them put in execution. This declaration was publiſhed in the month of January 1585, and was ſo well received by all wiſe and diſcreet men, that in the month of February, it was reprinted at London with great applauſe, contributing highly to the Archbiſhop's reputation, who ſeemed now to be in a fair way of overcoming all his difficulties, as he certainly would have done, if the court had been more ſteady; this declaration having procured King James many friends in England (x) [H]. But things did not remain in this ſituation, for the Kirk faction being obſtinate, and indefatigable, ſoon gained ground again, drawing in ſeveral great men to countenance them, and at laſt making uſe of open force, which ſo intimidated the King, that by a new declaration he diſavowed that formerly mentioned (y). In the month of April 1586, a provincial Synod was held at St. Andrews, wherein the Archbiſhop was preſent; but he was ſoon accuſed, and, notwithſtanding his defence, excommunicated; whereupon, a day or two after, he excommunicated Mr. James Melvin, who was moderator at the Synod; and, in reſpect to his own excommunication, appealed to the King, and the States of the kingdom: however, this did him little good, for the mob being let looſe upon him, he durſt ſcarcely appear in public, in the city of St. Andrews (z). At the next General Aſſembly held at Edinburgh in the ſame year, a paper containing the Archbiſhop's ſubmiſſion, dated May 20, 1586, was produced, whereupon the Aſſembly abſolved him from the excommunication, and the King and Council directed that he ſhould read a divinity lecture in St. Servator's College at St. Andrews (a). In 1587, complaint was made to the General Aſſembly, that the Biſhop had ſuffered himſelf to be denounced rebel, and put to the Horn, that is, in plain Engliſh, outlawed, becauſe he could not pay his debts; but upon the motion of the King's commiſſioners, all proceedings were ſtayed (b). In 1588, the Archbiſhop was again cited before the General Aſſembly, for marrying the Earl of Huntley to his Counteſs, without obliging the Earl to ſubſcribe a confeſſion of his faith, and he not appearing, a commiſſion was granted to try him for that and other crimes objected to him (c) [I]. In the beginning of 1590, our Prelate publiſhed the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremiah, in Latin verſe, which he dedicated to the King, complaining of the hard uſage he had met with. In the latter end of the ſame year, he publiſhed a tranſlation of the Apocalypſe, in Latin verſe, which he alſo dedicated to the King (d), yet neither theſe, nor a moving copy of Latin verſes, written to his Majeſty in

[H] This declaration procured King James many friends in England.] This declaration is ſtill preſerved at length, in Thinn's continuation of Hollinſhed's hiſtory of Scotland (18); wherein the reader may peruſe it, and therein find the true ground of that inveterate hatred, which was borne to our prelate by the Preſbyterian clergy; ſince, to ſay the truth, it is by far the boldeſt and ſtrongeſt picture that was ever drawn, of their haughty behaviour towards their Prince, and towards his people. We need not therefore wonder, at the following account of the matter by Calderwood, which ſhews the ſpirit both of the man and his party. 'The 'acts of parliament holden the laſt May, were ſo 'toſſed among the ſubjects, and miſliked by good 'men, that the court was forced to ſet Mr. Patrick 'Adamſon, that chief deviſor, on work, to make a 'declaration of the meaning, and that in the King's 'name. This declaration came to light in January, 'and was after ſo greedily embraced by the Engliſh 'Biſhops, that after the printing of it here, it was 'reprinted with an odious preface of alledged treaſons 'prefixed unto it, and to preſerve the memory of it, 'inſerted in the Chronicle of England, compiled 'by Hollinſhed, and continued by Francis Thinne. 'Our Kirk was ever careful, and eſpecially at the 'ſame time, to entertain the amity between the two 'nations, and deſerved no ſuch indignity at their 'hands. But let ſuch a lying libel lie there, as a 'blur to blot their chronicles (19).

[I] A commiſſion was granted to try him for that and other crimes objected to him.] [The not permitting a man to marry, without his having firſt ſubſcribed a confeſſion of faith, is one of the completeſt inſtances of eccleſiaſtical folly and bigotry recorded in hiſtory; and ſhews to what abſurdities the human mind may be carried, by a falſe zeal for religion. Eſtabliſhed churches have, in general, thought it neceſſary to ſecure the purity of the faith, by inſiſting on a ſubſcription to ſome formula. But the ſubſcription has uſually been confined to thoſe who engage in the miniſtry, to ſtudents in univerſities, and to perſons who take certain degrees. This would not ſatisfy the General Aſſembly of the church of Scotland. A man was not thought fit to diſcharge the civil offices of life, to become a huſband and a father, unleſs he exhibited proper proofs of his othodoxy. It muſt be acknowledged, that the aſſembly by this method provided, as much as lay in their power, that no one ſhould be born, who was not likely to be educated in the genuine doctrines of the Scottiſh eſtabliſhment. The populouſneſs of the nation might indeed be injured, if none were allowed to produce children, except thoſe who were found in their belief of the articles of religion. But the temporal welfare of ſociety was, we may ſuppoſe, too trifling an object to be taken into any conſideration.

If, however, it was neceſſary that no man ſhould be permitted to marry till he had ſigned the confeſſion of faith, it might have been expected, that the confeſſion itſelf would contain nothing but the plaineſt and moſt indubitable points of doctrine. But this was not the caſe. Whoever reads it (as given in Calderwood, p. 14—24.), will find it very long and tedious; and that it advances a great number of propoſitions, the right ſolution of which might puzzle a more acute and learned theologian than the Earl of Huntley could probably have been.

Theſe obſervations are only intended to expoſe the particular tranſaction referred to, and to mark the character of the times. The author is fully apprized of the more liberal and manly ſpirit which now prevails in the ſame country.]

his deep distress, procured him any favour (e). On the contrary, the King finding the Archbishop no longer of use to him, granted the revenue of his see to the Duke of Lenox, whereby the unfortunate Prelate, with his family, came, in a literal sense, to want bread (f). At this very time the Assembly intercepted Letters from Dr. Bancroft, chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to our Archbishop Adamson, certifying him of the great respect the English clergy had for him, and blaming him for not taking sanctuary amongst his friends in that country (g). These letters never came to his hands; but the brethren taking advantage of the poor Prelate's miserable circumstances, and great weakness both in body and mind, procured his subscription to a most abject form of submission, and that, by giving him a poor collection for the immediate relief of his family's necessities (b). Thus he lingered out, till the latter end of the year 1591, his uncomfortable life, dying with very different characters from his countrymen, as the reader will see in the notes [K]. But as to what his enemies charitably asserted, of his being senseless in his last moments, it is so flagrant a falsehood, that we have preserved an instance of his having almost in the article of death, the noblest and most pious sentiments [L]. This, joined with the consideration of the many admirable works he pub-

[K] As the reader will see in the notes.] In order to support what we have said in the text, we shall here set down three characters of him; the first by Calderwood, who tells us, that in the month of April 1591, he subscribed a long recantation, which he inserts in his history, and desired assistance for the support of his family. Afterwards he tells us, he sent to the Presbytery at St. Andrews, and desired to be absolved from the sentence of excommunication. 'The brethren doubting whether his desire 'proceeded from trouble of mind, or if it was a 'shift only to get some support, directed Mr. James 'Melvill, and Mr. Andrew Moncrief, to try him. 'As soon as he saw Mr. James, he pulled off his 'cap, and cried, Forgive me! forgive me! for 'God's sake Mr. James, for I have many ways of-'fended you! Mr. James forgave him, and ex-'horted him to unfeigned repentance. When he 'was asked, if he acknowledged the validity of the 'sentence of excommunication pronounced against 'him; he interrupted Mr. James, and cried piti-'fully and often, Loose me for Christ's sake! At 'their report, the brethren with prayer and thanks-'giving absolved him (20).' Archbishop Spotswood gives somewhat a different account of this transaction, and a better character of our author. His words are these (21). 'In this Assembly cer-'tain articles were presented, subscribed by the 'Archbishop of St. Andrews, allowing the Presby-'terial discipline, and condemning the govern-'ment episcopal; which were afterwards imprinted, 'under the title of Mr. Patrick Adamson's recan-'tation. The Bishop lay bedfast at the time, and 'was fallen into great necessity by his own misgo-'vernment; whereof his adversaries taking ad-'vantage, it was devised, that he should be visited 'by some of the brethren, and desired to leave a 'testimony under his hand, of his opinion of matters 'of discipline. This being moved unto him, he 'said, that he did not trouble himself with such 'thoughts at that time, and had never allowed of 'any other Bishop in the church, but St. Paul's 'Bishop, which he would willingly set his hand to. 'Upon this his answer, were these articles drawn 'up, and subscribed by him; whether he knew 'what was contained in them, or that he was in-'duced thereto, by a poor collection that they gave 'him in the time (for so the report went), or 'otherwise, it is uncertain: but when it was told 'him that such a recantation was published in his 'name, he complained heavily of the wrong that 'was done him; and committing his cause to God, 'ended his days in the year 1591. A man he was 'of great learning, and a most perswasive preacher, 'but an ill administrator of the church patrimony, 'which brought him to the misery that is pitiful to 'think of. Diverse works he left; of which some 'are extant, which shew his learning: but his Pre-'lections upon the Epistle to Timothy, which were 'most desired, falling into the hands of his ad-'versaries, were suppressed.' Mr. Wilson, who published our Prelate's works, talks of him in much stronger terms (22): 'He was, says he, a Prelate 'endowed with such excellent qualifications, both 'as to mind and body, that he was a miracle of 'nature; and rather seemed to be the immediate 'production of God Almighty, than born of a 'woman; being a profound Theologue, an incom-'parable Poet, an eloquent Orator, well seen in 'the Greek and Latin languages: a Prelate of 'great prudence, experience, and wisdom, in the 'management of affairs; skilful in the civil and 'canon law; and of so happy a memory, that he 'did not know what it was to forget any thing, 'that he had either heard or read: so that the 'death of such a person, who was the glory of his 'country, and of the republic of letters, can never 'be too much lamented.'

[L] The noblest and most pious sentiments.] We are told by the charitable Mr. Calderwood, that Mr. David Black, a man mighty in doctrine, and of singular fidelity and diligence in the calling of the ministry, came to Mr. Patrick (so he calls the Archbishop) in February, the year following (1591), when he was drawing near his end, and found him, as he lived, senseless (23). The following Latin verses, written a very little while before he breathed his last, will shew what frame of mind he was in, and what reasons Mr. David Black had for departing, as Mr. Calderwood says he did, with a heavy heart.

O Anima! assiduis vitæ jactata procellis,
Exilii pertæsa gravis; nunc lubrica, tempus
Regna tibi, & mundi invisas contemnere sordes.
Quippe parens rerum, cæco te corpore clemens
Evocat, & verbi crucifixi gratia, cæli
Pandit iter, patrioque beatam limine sistet:
Progenies Jovæ, quo te cælestis origo
Invitat, fælix perge, æternumque quiesce.
Exuviæ carnis, cognato in pulvere vocem
Angelicam expectent, sonitu quo putre cadaver
Exiliet redivivum, & totum me tibi reddet.
Ecce beata dies! nos agni dextera ligno
Fulgentes crucis, & radiantes sanguine vivo
Excipiet. Quam firma illic quam certa capesses
Gaudia, felices inter novus incola cives?
Alme Deus, Deus alme, & non effabile numen,
Ad te unum & trinum, moribundo pectore anhelo (24).

O Soul! long toss'd in waves of endless strife,
Worn with thy exile in this painful life,
Prepare to quit thy plagues, contemn the cares
Of this low world, and speed thee from its snares.
Lo! the great God, who every good bestows,
Bids thee forsake thy body, and thy woes:
While the kind author of our happier state,
His suffering Son, expands the heavenly gate.
O haste thee! haste thee! to thy native sky,
Leave here thy pains, to endless quiet fly.
This breathless trunk, this putrid fleshly case
Tho' worms invade, and kindred clay embrace,
Shall hear th' angelic trump; again arise,
And thou resuming, bear it to the skies.
See the bless'd day, see how the Lamb appears!
Hard by his cross! O how his bleeding chears!
On these depending, speed thee in thy flight,
In thy new friends how much wilt thou delight?
Dear God, in thee, in thee, O God most dear,
Whose name be mention'd still with holy fear,
My faith firm fix'd for ever shall abide,
Living I trust, and dying I confide.

ADDISON (Lancelot), the ſon of another Lancelot Addiſon, a Clergyman, was born at Mauldiſmeaburne, in the pariſh of Croſby Ravenſworth, in Weſtmorland (a), in the year 1632 (b), but the day is not certain. He received the firſt tincture of letters in the grammar-ſchool of Appleby, in the ſame county. Thence, in the year 1650, he was ſent by his relations to Queen's College in Oxford, where he became firſt a poor child on the foundation (c); but quickly diſtinguiſhing himſelf by his lively parts, and ſtrict application to learning, he, on the twenty-fifth of January 1654, was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d). Continuing ſtill in the univerſity, on the fourth of July 1657, he became Maſter of Arts, and being then much taken notice of for his ſprightly wit, was made choice of to be one of the Terræ Filii, for the Act which was celebrated in 1658. But his loyalty getting the better of his prudence, he bore ſo hard in his oration, on the pride, hypocriſy, ignorance, and avarice, of thoſe then in power, that he was compelled to make a recantation, and to aſk pardon for the offence given, on his knees. Shortly after he retired from the univerſity, out of diſguſt, in all probability, for the uſage he had received (e). He choſe for his retreat a village in the neighbourhood of Petworth, and ſpent his time in viſiting ſuch loyal gentlemen, as had ſeats in the county of Suſſex, where with great zeal and ſteadineſs he promoted amongſt their youth (when it was moſt dangerous) principles of loyalty, and the tenets of the church of England. On the Reſtoration of King Charles II. the gentlemen of that county recommended him to Dr. King, Biſhop of Chicheſter, as a man of a ſound head and honeſt heart, one who had ſuffered much, and run the hazard of ſuffering much more, for his attachment to the conſtitution in Church and State. The Biſhop received him kindly, and, in all probability, would have provided for him, if Mr. Addiſon had not accepted the poſt of chaplain to the garriſon of Dunkirk, contrary to his Lordſhip's inclination (f). In 1662, when that place was delivered up to the French, Mr. Addiſon returned to England, where he did not remain long, an offer being made him, of going chaplain to the garriſon ſettled at Tangier, with which he cloſed, and went thither the next year. He continued there about ſeven years, during which ſpace he improved, with the utmoſt care and diligence, the great abilities he received from nature, and that large ſtock of acquired knowledge, which he carried from the univerſity. He was in great favour with the famous Earl of Tiviot, who was Governor, and Colonel Norwood, Deputy Governor, of that garriſon, and employed by them in matters of great importance (g). In the beginning of the year 1670, having ſettled all things relating to his office in a regular and eaſy ſtate, and taken all imaginable precaution for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion in that garriſon, he thought he might without offence make a voyage into England, in order to look after his private affairs, which he accordingly did, and was well received here by perſons of the firſt diſtinction. He was made chaplain in ordinary to his Majeſty Charles II. ſoon after his coming over (h); yet his office of chaplain at Tangier, though he had no intention of quitting it, was conferred upon another, whereby Mr. Addiſon was not a little ſtreightened for a ſubſiſtence. In this ſituation of affairs, Mr. Wood tells us, that a worthy Knight in the county of Wilts, took him under his protection, and beſtowed on him the rectory of Milſton near Ameſbury in Wilts (i), which is ſaid to have been worth about one hundred and twenty pounds per annum. He alſo obtained the prebend of minor pars Altaris, in the cathedral church of Sarum, and on the ſixth of July 1675 took the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (k). His ſpiritual preferments, though they were not very conſiderable, enabled him to live decently and hoſpitably in the country. He diſcharged his duty in his pariſh with a conſcientious diligence, and employed his ſpare time in ſtudying and in writing for the ſupport of true religion, and of the Church of England, of which he was a moſt dutiful ſon. He lived likewiſe in terms of the ſtricteſt friendſhip with the moſt eminent perſons of his neighbourhood, who were equally edified by the innocence of his life, and charmed with his pleaſing and inſtructive converſation. In 1683, the commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical affairs, on account of his ſervices at Tangier, and to make good his great loſſes by fire at Milſton, beſtowed upon him the deanery of Litchfield (l), in which he was inſtalled the third of July in the ſame year (m). Mr. Wood ſuppoſes that he was then Archdeacon of Coventry (n); but in that he was miſtaken, for Dr. Addiſon was collated to that archdeaconry on the eighth of December 1684 (o), and held it with his deanery in commendam. In the Convocation which met on the fourth of December 1689, Dean Addiſon was preſent, and was one of the committee appointed by the lower houſe, to acquaint the lords, that they had conſented to a conference on the ſubject of an addreſs to the King (p). It is ſaid that he might have have been made a biſhop after the Revolution, if he had not in this Convocation, and elſewhere, manifeſted ſuch a zeal for the Church, as gave a handle for miſrepreſenting him to thoſe in power. He enjoyed however a juſt and general reputation, grounded on the uprightneſs of his life, and on the many learned and uſeful treatiſes he had publiſhed, a diſtinct account of which the reader will find in a note [A]. He departed this life on the twentieth of April 1703, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age. This book is dedicated To the moſt worthy and truly honourable Joſeph Williamſon, Eſq; who, from this and other dedications, appears to have been the author's great patron. The hiſtory is written with great plainneſs and perſpicuity, but in a ſtyle viſibly leſs pure than his ſubſequent productions; which, in all probability, might be owing to his long abſence from his native country. Beſides a curious detail of the revolutions in Barbary, and a very accurate account both of the country and of the inhabitants, there is in this little piece, a multitude of curious particulars, related by the author on his own knowledge, which fully ſupports what he ſays in the preface, that his book was not compoſed from the accounts given him by others, but was the fruit of diligent obſervations, and many years enquiries (1).

(1) In this treatiſe, wherever our author relates a fact of his own knowledge, he adds ſuch circumſtances of time and place, as ſhew he truſted nothing to memory, which renders his obſervations much more valuable, than thoſe of other travellers in thoſe parts, who write avowedly from hearſay, or at beſt from recollection.

II. The preſent ſtate of the Jews (more particularly relating to thoſe in Barbary), wherein is contained an exact account of their cuſtoms, ſecular and religious; to which is annexed, a ſummary diſcourſe of the Miſna, Talmud, and Gemara, by L. Addiſon, one of his Majeſty's Chaplains in ordinary, and the author of the late revolutions and preſent cuſtoms of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco. London, printed by J. C. for William Crooke at the Green Dragon, without Temple-Bar; and to be ſold by John Courtney, bookſeller in Sarum, 1675, in octavo, containing 249 pages. This book is alſo dedicated to his former patron, under the title of, the Right Honourable Sir Joſeph Williamſon, Principal Secretary of State, &c. It is dated from Milſton near Ambros-Bury, in Wilts, January 28, 1674-5. This treatiſe contains twenty-ſix chapters, excluſive of ſome conſiderations on the obſtructions which at preſent hinder the converſion of the Jews, and the ſummary diſcourſe mentioned in the title. The author himſelf acknowledges, that he compoſed this as well as the former piece, while he was abroad; but without queſtion he reviſed it in England; ſince the diſpoſition of it is perfectly regular, the ſtile natural and eaſy; and the whole interſperſed with many learned remarks and moral reflections. It is really ſtrange, that this judicious and excellent treatiſe is ſo little known, for it is certainly one of the beſt that was ever compoſed on this ſubject; and though many have been written ſince, yet the merit of this is far from being effaced. For according to our author's motto, Alius alio plura invenire poteſt, nemo omnia.

IV. A modeſt Plea for the Clergy; wherein is briefly conſidered, the original, antiquity, and neceſſity of that calling; together with the ſpurious and genuine occaſions of their preſent contempt. London, 1677, octavo. In another edition the title ſuffered ſome little alteration, for we find it run thus; A modeſt Plea for the Clergy; wherein is conſidered, the reaſons why the Clergy are ſo contemned and neglected, by L. A. D. D. and Dean of Litchfield. The celebrated Dr. Hickes, having met with the firſt edition of this book, reprinted it, together with Dr. Heylyn's diſcourſe on tythes; and a ſermon on the Sacerdotal benediction, by one Samuel Gibſon, as proper antidotes to the Rights of the Chriſtian Church, by Tindal. This piece came out in octavo, in the year 1709; and Dr. Hickes, in his preface, declares, that he did not know whether the author of the firſt diſcourſe, was a clergyman or a layman, but was inclined to think him a layman; which ſhews, how eaſily the moſt learned men may be deceived.

V. The firſt State of Mahometiſm, or an account of the author and doctrine of that impoſture. London, 1678, octavo. This book was printed the next year, under the title of The Life and Death of Mahomet, the author of the Turkiſh religion, &c. containing a hundred and thirty-ſix pages. The book is divided into twenty-four chapters; and the author's deſign therein, as he himſelf acquaints us, was to give a faithful account of the life and doctrine of Mahomet, ſtript of fable and prejudice. In 1687, the bookſeller, William Crooke, ſent it forth with a new and much more copious title; but as to the work itſelf, it was without alteration or addition.

VI. An Introduction to the Sacrament; or a ſhort, ſafe, and plain way to the communion table; collected for, and rendered familiar to every particular communicant, by L. Addiſon, D. D. 1681.

There was a ſecond edition of the beforementioned book, in 1686, to which there was then added, The Communicant's Aſſiſtant; being a collection of devotions to that purpoſe, in 12*mo*, containing 153 pages.

Recommended to the preſs by two eminent divines of the Church of England.* London, William Crooke, 1690, 12*mo*; containing one hundred pages. One of theſe eminent divines appears to have been Dean Addiſon himſelf, and the other was Dr. Scot; and therefore it hath been preſumed, that this book was not his, though it is aſcribed to him in ſeveral catalogues (3).

This is a moſt excellent book, comprehending in a very narrow compaſs, the hiſtory of various hereſies, clearly and fairly ſtated from original authors, for the uſe probably of ſuch as were unable to read thoſe authors in Greek or Latin.

ADDISON (Joseph) the ſon of Dean Addiſon, ſpoken of in the laſt article. He was born at Milſton near Ambros-Bury, in the county of Wilts, of which place his father was then Rector, on the firſt of May 1672; and being not thought likely to live, was baptiſed on the ſame day, as appears from the church regiſter [A]. When he grew up to an age fit for going to ſchool, he was firſt put under the care of the Reverend Mr. Naiſh, at Ambros-Bury. He was afterwards removed to a ſchool at Saliſbury, taught by the Reverend Mr. Taylor, and thence to the Charter-Houſe, where he was under the tuition of the learned Dr. Ellis, and where he contracted an intimacy with Mr. Steele, afterwards Sir Richard, which laſted as long as Mr. Addiſon lived (a). He was not above fifteen when he went to the univerſity of Oxford, where he was entered of Queen's College, in which his father had ſtudied (b). He addicted himſelf at this time with ſuch diligence to claſſical learning, that he acquired an elegant Latin ſtyle, before he arrived at that age in which lads uſually begin to write good Engliſh. A paper of his verſes in that tongue, fell by accident, in the year 1687, into the hands of Dr. Lancaſter, then Fellow, and afterwards Provoſt of Queen's College, who was ſo far pleaſed with them, as to procure their author's being elected a Demy of Magdalen College, probably in July 1689 (c); where he took the degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts. His Latin poetry, in the courſe of a few years, was exceedingly admired in both the univerſities, and juſtly gained him the reputation of a great poet [B], before his name was ſo much as known in town (d). He was twenty-two years of age before he publiſhed any thing in our language, and then came abroad a ſhort copy

[A] From the church regiſter.] One may juſtly wonder, that in the account given of Mr. Addiſon in Wood's hiſtory of the Oxford writers, his true age ſhould be ſet down (1), and yet that it ſhould eſcape Mr. Tickell (2). This is of ſome importance, becauſe it changes the whole chronology of the life, and that too in favour of the author. He became a Demy of Magdalen College in Oxford by merit, at the age of ſeventeen (3). Is not the bare relation of this the higheſt panegyric on Mr. Addiſon? It was here he became acquainted with Mr. Sacheverell, who was exactly of his own age, and of a very promiſing genius too, ſince we find a tranſlation of part of the firſt Georgick of Virgil, inſerted in the Examen Poeticum, for the year 1693 (4), the ſame volume in which Mr. Addiſon's firſt Engliſh verſes appeared; and as Mr. Addiſon's verſes were addreſſed to Mr. Dryden, ſo Mr. Sacheverell's tranſlation was dedicated to him. Thoſe who remember Mr. Addiſon at college, affirm, that his temper was the ſame it appeared ever afterwards, that is to ſay, his abilities were exceeded by nothing but his modeſty.

[B] The reputation of a great poet.] It is not very certain at what age our author wrote ſome of the Latin poems which have been publiſhed; however, they were certainly written very early, and they ſtill retain that high eſteem which was firſt conceived of them. They were publiſhed in the ſecond volume of Muſarum Anglicanarum Analecta, ſeu Poemata quædam melioris notæ, ſeu hactenus inedita, ſeu ſparſim edita (5). They were eight in all, but very probably they are not placed in the order of time in which they were written. 1. Pax Gulielmi Auſpiciis Europæ reddita, 1697. i. e. of verſes addreſſed to Mr. Dryden, which procured him immediately, and that very deſervedly, from the beſt judges in that nice age, a great reputation, being as correct and perfect as any thing which even himſelf afterwards produced (e). Some little ſpace intervening, he ſent into the world a tranſlation of the fourth Georgick of Virgil, (omitting the ſtory of Ariſtæus) exceedingly commended by Mr. Dryden (f). He wrote alſo that diſcourſe on the Georgicks, which is prefixed to them by way of preface in Mr. Dryden's tranſlation, and is allowed to be one of the juſteſt pieces of criticiſm [C] in our own or in any other language (g). The next year he wrote ſeveral poems of different kinds; amongſt the reſt, one dated the third of April 1694, directed to Mr. H. S. [D], that is, Henry Sacheverell, who was afterwards ſo famous (h). The following year he began to have higher views, which diſcovered themſelves in a poem to King William, on one of his campaigns, addreſſed to the Lord Keeper (Sir John Somers). That judicious ſtateſman received this mark of a young author's attachment with great humanity, took Mr. Addiſon thenceforward into the number of his friends, and gave him, upon all occaſions, ſignal proofs of a ſincere eſteem (i). He had been very preſſingly ſolicited, while at the univerſity, to enter into Holy Orders [E], which he ſeemed once reſolved on, probably in reſpect to his father; but his great modeſty inclining him to doubt of his own abilities, he receded from this

[C] One of the juſteſt pieces of criticiſm.] It would be equally tedious and impertinent, to dwell in theſe notes on every little piece publiſhed by our author. It is a kind of charity to illuſtrate the beauties of an obſcure author; but to us it appears a ſort of detraction, to ſuppoſe that the worth of any of Mr. Addiſon's poems ſhould be unknown to our readers. We will therefore confine ourſelves to ſuch parts of his works as have any circumſtances relating to them which ought to be preſerved, as a kind of hiſtorical commentary, for the uſe rather of poſterity than of the preſent times. Mr. Tickell, in his preface to the works of Mr. Addiſon, expreſſes a kind of ſurprize, that Mr. Dryden, who ſo readily owned the verſion of the fourth Georgick ſent him by Mr. Addiſon, ſhould not take notice of his having communicated the Eſſay on the Georgicks, ſince it came from the ſame hand. Sir Richard Steele took occaſion to vindicate Mr. Dryden (8), by ſhewing, firſt, that the Eſſay upon the Georgicks, is the ſame with the preface prefixed to thoſe poems, in Mr. Dryden's tranſlation of Virgil's works; which, (9) ſecondly, is owned to have come from a friend, whoſe name is not mentioned becauſe he deſired to have it concealed (10). If any one ſhould inquire, why Mr. Addiſon was content the world ſhould know he tranſlated one of Virgil's Georgicks, and at the ſame time deſired to conceal his writing, what Mr. Dryden placed as a preface to his tranſlation of the Georgicks, it will be no difficult thing to ſatisfy him. The verſion was what many people had done, and any body might do; but the eſſay was an untried ſtrain of criticiſm, which bore a little hard on the old profeſſors of that art, and therefore was not ſo fit for a young man to take upon himſelf. In this light Mr. Dryden's juſtice, and Mr. Addiſon's prudence, are alike conſpicuous. The former was above aſſuming unjuſtly the praiſe of other people's writings, and the latter was remarkable for keeping ſo ſtrict a rein upon his wit, that it never got the ſtart of his wiſdom.

[D] Directed to Mr. H. S.] Among all our author's poems, there is not one which is more properly an original, than this account of the greateſt Engliſh poets, to Mr. Henry Sacheverell, nor will a judicious reader find more pleaſure in reading any of his works than in peruſing this. The judgment of a great poet on the writings of his predeceſſors, written in the dawn of his days, when, without doubt, he ſpoke more freely than he would have afterwards done, muſt always be conſidered as a curioſity. I ſhould not however have ſtopt at this poem, had it not been to quote ſome lines from it, which, if carefully conſidered, ſeem to carry in them ſome memoirs of our author's life. Towards the concluſion of the poem he ſays (11), (11) Addiſon's Works, Vol. i. p. 36.

Congreve, whoſe fancy's unexhauſted ſtore
Has given already much, and promis'd more,
Congreve ſhall ſtill preſerve thy fame alive,
And Dryden's muſe ſhall in his friend ſurvive.

I'm tir'd with rhyming, and would fain give o'er,
But juſtice ſtill demands one labour more:
The noble Montague remains unnam'd,
For wit, for humour, and for judgment fam'd.
To Dorſet he directs his artful muſe
In numbers, ſuch, as Dorſet's ſelf might uſe.
How negligently graceful he unreins
His verſe, and writes in looſe familiar ſtrains.
How Naſſau's godlike acts adorn his lines,
And all the hero in full glory ſhines.
We ſee his armies ſet in juſt array,
And Boyne's dy'd waves run purple to the ſea.
Nor Simois choak'd with men, and arms, and blood,
Nor rapid Xanthus' celebrated flood,
Shall longer be the poet's higheſt themes,
Tho' gods and heroes fought promiſcuous in their ſtreams.
But now to Naſſau's ſecret councils rais'd,
He aids the hero whom before he prais'd.

Two remarks may be made on theſe lines: the firſt, that Mr. Congreve, about this time, had introduced Mr. Addiſon to the acquaintance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as Sir Richard Steele informs us (12); the other, that Mr. Sacheverell had not as yet any qualms about the Revolution; otherwiſe his friend would not have written to him in theſe terms. This is very honourable for our author, ſince it makes it clear, that when he differed afterwards with this gentleman (13), he did not differ from himſelf, but adhered to thoſe principles which Sacheverell had deſerted.

[E] To enter into Holy Orders.] This conduct of Mr. Addiſon with reſpect to the prieſthood, hath occaſioned ſome diſpute. Let us firſt ſupport what is advanced in the text, viz. that he had once made a kind of reſolution to go into orders. His own words will beſt prove this. He concludes the poem to Mr. Sacheverell thus:

I've done at length, and now, dear friend, receive
The laſt poor preſent, that my Muſe can give.
I leave the arts of poetry and verſe
To them that practice them with more ſucceſs.
Of greater truths I'll now prepare to tell,
And ſo at once, dear Friend, and Muſe, farewel (14).

(14) Ibid. Vol. i. p. 41.

Mr. Tickell, ſpeaking of theſe lines, adds, after telling us that he founded this reſolution on the importunities of his father, the following account of his abandoning that deſign. 'His remarkable ſeriouſneſs and modeſty, which might have been 'urged as powerful reaſons for his chuſing that life, 'proved the chief obſtacles to it. Theſe qualities 'by which the prieſthood is ſo much adorned, repreſented the duties of it as too weighty for him, 'and rendered him ſtill more worthy of that honour, 'which they made him decline (15).' Sir Richard Steele, ſpeaking to Mr. Congreve of this paſſage, ſays, 'Theſe, you know very well, were not the 'reaſons which made Mr. Addiſon turn his thoughts 'to the civil world; and as you were the inducement of his becoming acquainted with my Lord 'Halifax, I doubt not but you remember the warm 'inſtances that noble lord made to the head of the 'college, not to inſiſt upon Mr. Addiſon's going 'into orders. His arguments were founded upon this choice (k); and having ſhewn an inclination to travel, his before-mentioned patron, out of zeal for his country, as well as reſpect to Mr. Addiſon, procured him, from the Crown, an annual penſion of three hundred pounds, which enabled him to make a tour to Italy, the latter end of 1699 (l). His Latin poems dedicated to Mr. Montagu, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, were printed before his departure in the Muſæ Anglicanæ, and were as much admired abroad, as they could poſſibly be at home, particularly by the great Boileau [F], who ſpoke of them in very obliging terms, and who was known to be both an able judge, and one incapable of partiality (m). In 1701, Mr. Addiſon wrote from Italy an epiſtolary poem (n) to (Montagu) Lord Halifax, which was very juſtly admired as a moſt finiſhed piece in its kind; and, indeed, ſome have pronounced it the very beſt of Mr. Addiſon's performances (o) [G]. On his return he publiſhed an account of his travels, which he dedicated to his firſt patron, the Lord Somers [H]. He would have returned earlier than he did into England, had he not been thought of as a proper perſon to attend Prince Eugene, who then commanded for the Emperor in Italy, which employment he would have been well pleaſed with; but the death of King William intervening,

'the general pravity and corruption of men of buſineſs, who wanted liberal education; and I remember, as if I had read the letter yeſterday, that my lord ended with a compliment, that however he might be repreſented as no friend to the Church, he would never do it any other injury than keeping Mr. Addiſon out of it. The contention for this man in his early years, among the people of the greateſt power, Mr. Secretary Tickell, the executor for his fame, is pleaſed to aſcribe to a ſerious viſage, and modeſty of behaviour (16).' This laſt remark is equally ill-natured and ill-founded. Sir Richard introduces Mr. Addiſon's viſage; but the ſeriouſneſs Mr. Tickell ſpoke of, was the quality of his mind. The gentleman accounts for Mr. Addiſon's quitting his reſolution; the knight talks of the pains other people took to prevent his following it (17). Both the accounts might be true, but there was no neceſſity for inſerting either in the text of the life, though it would have been wrong, not to have acquainted the reader with ſo remarkable a paſſage.

Lord Halifax had that year been impeached by the Commons in Parliament, for procuring exorbitant grants from the crown to his own uſe; and farther charged, with cutting down and waſting the timber in his majeſty's foreſts, and with holding ſeveral offices in the Exchequer, that were inconſiſtent, and deſigned as checks upon each other. The Commons had likewiſe addreſſed the King, to remove him from his counſels and preſence for ever (21). Theſe were the cauſes of his retiring; and Mr. Addiſon's addreſs at this time is a noble proof of his gratitude, as the manner of it will be a laſting monument of his good ſenſe. In four lines he has handled a topic, the niceſt that could be, and in four more makes a tranſition to his ſubject naturally, and without precipitation.

[H] His firſt patron, Lord Somers.] In our author's dedication of his travels, to the Right Honourable John, Lord Somers, he takes an opportunity of paying his Lordſhip one of the fineſt and beſt turned compliments that ever entered a dedication, inaſmuch as, in a ſingle paragraph, the patron, the ſubject, and the client, are all connected with the greateſt propriety in point of thought, and the greateſt beauty in regard to ſtile. 'I had, ſays he, 'a very early ambition to recommend myſelf to 'your Lordſhip's patronage, which yet increaſed 'in me, as I travelled through the countries, of 'which I here give your Lordſhip ſome account: 'for whatever great impreſſions an Engliſhman 'muſt have of your Lordſhip, they who have been 'converſant abroad, will find them ſtill improved. 'It cannot but be obvious to them, that though 'they ſee your Lordſhip's admirers every where, 'they meet with very few of your well-wiſhers at 'Paris or at Rome. And I could not but obſerve, 'when I paſſed through moſt of the Proteſtant governments in Europe, that their hopes, or fears, 'for the common cauſe, roſe or fell with your 'Lordſhip's intereſt and authority in England '(22).' In his preface, Mr. Addiſon gave his reader plainly to underſtand what he was to meet with in the following pages. For having obſerved, that Burnet had, in his travels, maſterly and uncommon obſervations on the religion and governments of Italy; that Laſſells might be uſeful in giving the names of ſuch writers as had treated of the ſeveral ſtates through which he paſſed; that Mr. Ray had publiſhed many valuable remarks in reſpect to Natural Hiſtory; and that Mr. Miſſon particularly excelled in the plan of the country, he goes on thus: 'For my own part, as I have taken notice of ſeveral 'places and antiquities, that nobody elſe has ſpoken 'of, ſo I think I have mentioned but few things in 'common with others, that are not either ſet in a 'new light, or accompanied with different reflections. I have taken care particularly, to conſider 'the ſeveral paſſages of the ancient poets, which 'have any relation to the places and curioſities that 'I met with; for before I entered upon my voyage, 'I took care to refreſh my memory among the Claſſic 'authors, and to make ſuch collections out of them 'as I might afterwards have occaſion for. I muſt 'confeſs, it was not one of the leaſt entertainments 'that I met with in travelling, to examine theſe 'ſeveral

[G] The very beſt of Mr. Addiſon's performances.] This poem was tranſlated by the Abbot Antonio Maria Salvini, Greek profeſſor at Florence, into Italian verſe; which tranſlation is printed with the original, in Mr. Tickell's quarto edition of Mr. Addiſon's works (19). It is not to be wondered at, that this poem is in the higheſt eſteem in Italy, ſince there are in it the beſt turned compliments on that country, that are perhaps to be found in any language. Add to this, that the Italians muſt naturally apprehend their force, as well or better than ourſelves, on account of their familiarity with the objects therein deſcribed. It may likewiſe be obſerved, that the opening of this poem is peculiarly graceful and alike honourable for the writer and the patron.

While you, my Lord, the rural ſhades admire,
And from Britannia's public poſts retire;

For their advantage, ſacrifice your eaſe;
Me into foreign realms my fate conveys,
Through nations fruitful of immortal lays;

tervening, cauſed a ceſſation of his penſion, and his hopes (p). He remained at home a very conſiderable ſpace of time (his friends being then out of the miniſtry) before any occaſion offered, either of his farther diſplaying his great abilities, or of his meeting with any ſuitable reward, for the honour his works had already done his country. He was indebted to an accident for both. In the year 1704, the Lord Treaſurer Godolphin, happened to complain to the Lord Halifax, that the Duke of Marlborough's victory at Blenheim had not been celebrated in verſe in the manner it deſerved; intimating that he would take it kindly, if his Lordſhip, who was the known patron of the poets, would name a gentleman capable of writing upon ſo elevated a ſubject. Lord Halifax replied with ſome quickneſs, that he was well acquainted with ſuch a perſon, but that he would not name him; adding, that he had long ſeen with indignation, men of no merit maintained in pomp and luxury, at the expence of the Public, while perſons of too much modeſty, with great abilities, languiſhed in obſcurity. The Treaſurer ſaid very coolly, that he was ſorry his Lordſhip had occaſion to make ſuch an obſervation, and that for the future he would take care to render it leſs juſt than it might be at preſent; but that in the mean time he would pawn his honour, whoever his Lordſhip ſhould name, might venture upon this theme without fear of loſing his time. Lord Halifax thereupon named Mr. Addiſon, but inſiſted that the Treaſurer himſelf ſhould ſend to him, which he promiſed. Accordingly, he prevailed upon Mr. Boyle (afterwards Lord Carlton) then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to go in his name, to Mr. Addiſon, and communicate to him the buſineſs, which he accordingly did in ſo obliging a manner, that he readily entered upon the taſk (q). The Lord Treaſurer Godolphin ſaw the poem before it was finiſhed, when the author had written no farther than the famous ſimile of the Angel, and was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he immediately made him a Commiſſioner of Appeals (r). His poem intitled The Campaign (s), was received with loud and general applauſe: however, it may be doubted, what real benefit the Duke of Marlborough reaped from it, ſince, if, on the one hand, it ſet his conduct in the faireſt light, it introduced, on the other, a rival in fame; for, in all probability, the poem will be admired [I], as long as the victory is remembered. In 1705, our author attended the Lord Halifax to Hanover (t); and in the ſucceeding year, he was made choice of for Under-Secretary to Sir Charles Hedges, then appointed Secretary of State. In the month of December in the ſame year, the Earl of Sunderland ſucceeding Sir Charles in that office, continued Mr. Addiſon in the poſt of Under Secretary (u). Operas being at this time much in vogue, many people of diſtinction and true taſte importuned Mr. Addiſon to make a trial, whether ſenſe and ſound were really ſo incompatible as ſome admirers of the Italian pieces would repreſent them. He was at laſt prevailed upon to comply with their requeſts, and compoſed his inimitable Roſamond (w). This piece was inſcribed to the Dutcheſs of Marlborough, and though it did not ſucceed on the ſtage, it has been, and everlaſtingly will be, applauded in the cloſet. The many looked upon it as not properly an Opera, and the few joined with them in their opinion; for having conſidered what a number of miſerable things had borne that title, they were ſcarcely ſatisfied that ſo excellent a piece ſhould appear by the ſame. About the ſame time our author aſſiſted the ingenious Sir Richard Steele, in his play called The Tender Huſband (x), to which our author wrote a humorous Prologue (y). Sir Richard, whoſe gratitude was full as warm as his wit, ſurprized him with a dedication, which may be conſidered as one of the few monuments of praiſe, not unworthy of him to whoſe honour it was erected. In 1709, the Marquis of Wharton being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, carried over Mr. Addiſon into that kingdom, in the quality of his ſecretary. Her Majeſty alſo was pleaſed, as a mark of her peculiar favour, to augment the ſalary annexed to the place of Keeper of the Records in that kingdom, and to beſtow it upon him (2). While he was in Ireland, his friend Mr. Steele publiſhed the

'ſeveral deſcriptions as it were upon the ſpot, and 'to compare the natural face of the country with 'the landſkips the poets had given us of it (23).' Notwithſtanding this introduction, this piece was not at firſt underſtood, and conſequently could not ſucceed: but by degrees, as the curious entered deeper and deeper into the book, their judgment of it changed, and the demand for it became ſo great, that the price roſe at laſt to five times its original value, before there was a ſecond edition printed (24). It has ever ſince maintained its reputation, moſt of the virtuoſi who have travelled through Italy ſince, having given it high commendations (25); and which is perhaps a ſincere proof of their approbation, have choſen to tread in the ſame track. It hath been tranſlated into French, and makes uſually the fourth volume of Miſſon's travels in that language. The two great points laboured in theſe travels, are the recommending the Claſſic writers, and promoting the doctrine of liberty. Theſe points had been before purſued in the Epiſtle to Lord Halifax; and therefore Mr. Tickell has very juſtly and judiciouſly obſerved, that this poem may be conſidered as the text upon which the book of travels is a large comment (26).

[I] The poem will be admired.] The Campaign is addreſſed to the duke of Marlborough, and contains a ſhort view of the military tranſactions in the year 1704, with a very particular as well as poetical deſcription of the two great actions at Schellemberg, and Blenheim. Several other eminent writers employed their pens on the ſame ſubject; particularly Mr. J. Philips, and Mr. Euſden, who was afterwards Poet Laureat. However, Mr. Addiſon's was by far the moſt admired (27), and ſome of his warmeſt friends have ventured to prefer this poem to the reſt of his works. Perhaps this is a partiality to the ſubject, rather than to the piece itſelf, which, however fine, could not be the moſt excellent of Mr. Addiſon's performances, becauſe of its natural irregularity. All things conſidered, without queſtion, the Campaign is truly excellent, but excellent only with regard to its ſubject. For though the world allowed Mr. Addiſon to exceed others therein, yet no true judge of poetry will admit that he excelled himſelf.

Tatler,

Tatler [K], which appeared for the first time, on the 12th of April 1709; Mr. Addison discovered the author by an observation on Virgil, which he had communicated to him. This discovery led him to afford farther assistances, insomuch that, as the author of the Tatlers well expressed it, he fared by this means like a distrest prince, who calls in a powerful neighbour to his aid (a); that is, he was undone by his auxiliary. Such was the superiority of Mr. Addison's genius, and so true a taste the town then had of correct and fine writing. Upon the change of the ministry, our author being more at leisure engaged oftener in that work, until its conclusion on the second of January 1711 (b). Immediately after the Tatler was laid down, Sir Richard Steele formed the project of the Spectator, the plan of which he concerted with Mr. Addison. The first paper appeared on the first of March 1711, and in the course of that celebrated work, Mr. Addison furnished the greater part of those papers which were most admired. It was finished on the 6th of September 1712; and Mr. Addison, to prevent any disputes, or mistakes, which might have otherwise happened, took care to distinguish his papers throughout the whole, by some letter in the name of the Muse CLIO [L]. When the old Spectator was laid down, a new one appeared, which, though written by men of wit and genius, did not succeed, and they had the good sense not to push the attempt too far. Without question, the original Spectator will be always esteemed, not only as excellent in its nature and execution, but as truly honourable to the times in which it was received with so much applause. Posterity must have a high idea of the manners and good sense of the British nation, when they are informed that twenty thousand of these papers were sometimes sold in a day (c). The Guardian, a paper in the same taste, and which is saying much more, in the same spirit, entertained the town in the years 1713 and 1714. Mr. Addison had a large share therein, and his papers were particularly relished (d): and he also wrote once or twice in the Lover (e). It was necessary to speak of these performances together, which has carried us somewhat out of our ordinary road. Let us return, therefore, to the year 1713, in which appeared his famous Cato. He took up the design of writing a tragedy on that subject, when he was very young; he actually wrote it while he was on his travels: however, he retouched it while he was in England, without any formed design of bringing it on the stage (f). But some friends of his believing that it might be advantageous to the cause of liberty, he was prevailed on to make it fit for the stage, which he accordingly did, by adding the greatest part of the last act. When it appeared, it was gazed on as a wonder; all parties applauded it; it ran thirty-five nights without interruption; and, what was more to the author's reputation, the best judges declared in its favour when they had read it, with the same passion the pit had done when it was first seen (g). Mr. Pope wrote the Prologue, which is sublime. Dr. Garth the Epilogue, which is humorous. It was recommended by many excellent copies of verses prefixed to it, among which, the sincerity

[K] Mr. Steele published the Tatler.] It would be very improper to enter farther into the history of the Tatler, than as it concerns Mr. Addison. Mr. Tickell observes, and Sir Richard Steele confesses, that the paper was set on foot and dropt without Mr. Addison's knowledge (28): of course the history of the Tatler belongs properly to another article. The papers written by Mr. Addison, were not distinguished in this collection by any mark; but Sir Richard Steele, at the request of Mr. Tickell, pointed them out to him (29), and not only so, but shewed him such as they were jointly concerned in; and these, as well as those, are printed in the second volume of Mr. Addison's works. It must be allowed, that many of these little essays are not only exquisite, but incomparable. It is impossible to be serious, while we read such of them as are humorous; or not to be grave on the perusal of such as are of an opposite cast. The images are so striking, the language so graceful, the turn so natural, the raillery so lively, and at the same time so innocent, that not to be charmed with these pieces, and to be absolutely without taste, must be for ever synonymous terms.

[L] Name of the Muse CLIO.] The affinity between the Tatlers, Spectators, and Guardians, makes it unnecessary to enter minutely into the merit of such papers as Mr. Addison contributed, in the carrying on the two last undertakings (30). In the Spectators, the character of Sir Roger de Coverly was his particular favourite. We are told by a gentleman, who was thought to be well acquainted with Mr. Addison's affairs, that he was so tender of this character, as to go to Sir Richard Steele, on his publishing a Spectator, wherein he had made Sir Roger pick up a woman in the Temple Cloisters (31), and would not part with his friend, until he had promised to meddle with the old Knight's character no more. However, Mr. Addison to make sure, and to prevent any absurdities, which the authors of subsequent Spectators might fall into, resolved to remove that character out of the way; or, as he pleasantly expressed it to an intimate friend, killed Sir Roger, that nobody else might murder him (32). As to the marking of the Spectators, it was our author's own act and deed: but Mr. Tickell, in his preface to his works, having expressed this in very strong terms, saying, that Mr. Addison had hereby removed the least possibility of mistake in the most undiscerning reader (33): Sir Richard Steele, who was extremely offended with that preface, remarked severely on this passage, and speaking thereof to Mr. Congreve, uses these words. 'I have observed, that 'the editor will not let me, or any one else, obey 'Mr. Addison's commands, in hiding any thing he 'desired should be concealed. I cannot but take 'further notice, that the circumstance of marking 'his Spectators, which I did not know until I had 'done with the work, I made my own act, because 'I thought it too great a sensibility in my friend; 'and thought since it was done, better to be supposed marked by me, than the author himself; 'the real state of which, this zealot rashly and injudiciously exposes. I ask the reader whether any 'thing but an earnestness to disparage me, could 'provoke the editor, in behalf of Mr. Addison, to 'say that he marked it out of caution against me, 'when I had taken upon me to say, it was I that did 'it out of tenderness to him (34).' It must be allowed, that Sir Richard, in the concluding paper of the Spectator (35), had said all that could be expected, if not more, with respect not only to the distinction, but also in regard to Mr. Addison's character particularly: there did not therefore seem to be the least occasion for these precautions, with respect to a man who was really as warm a friend as could be wished, and a much warmer than these cautious people seem to have any idea of.

of Mr. Steele, and the genius of Mr. Euſden, deſerve to be diſtinguiſhed. Foreign nations have done this work of our author's as much honour as our own; and indeed, it is one of thoſe few performances which cannot receive more honour than it deſerves [M]. It was tranſlated more than once into French, obtained two Italian verſions, and has been either tranſlated or imitated in the German language (h). But the greateſt honour that was ever done thereto, was the putting the ſoliloquy of Cato, which is perhaps the nobleſt thing in our language, into a Latin dreſs, which might have been read with admiration, even by the criticks in the court of Auguſtus. Fame has attributed this to the late Biſhop Atterbury (i); and as it was ſuperlatively fine, the world thought fame in the right, and ſo it proved. This excellent tragedy did not eſcape the minor criticks, as the reader will find in the notes. Her Majeſty Queen Anne was not the laſt in doing juſtice to our author, and his performance. She was pleaſed to ſignify an inclination of having it dedicated to her: but the author publiſhed it without a dedication, becauſe, as it is ſaid, he had propoſed to dedicate it elſewhere, and by this method, he thought to avoid offending either his duty or his honour (k). If in the ſubſequent part of his life his leiſure had been greater, we are told he would have written another tragedy, intitled, The Death of Socrates (l). But the honours due to what he had already performed, deprived poſterity of this promiſed labour. Upon the death of the Queen, the Lords Juſtices appointed Mr. Addiſon their Secretary, which took him off from a deſign he had formed, of compoſing an Engliſh dictionary, on the plan of a famous Italian one (m). There was ſome thoughts of making him Secretary of State at that time, but he was at pains to decline it (n), and accepted a ſecond time, under the Earl of Sunderland, the poſt of Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He held it however but a very little time; for on the Earl's being removed, he was made one of the Lords of Trade (o). In 1716, he married the [M] Cannot receive more honour than it deſerves.] As to the tragedy of Cato, we ſhall here preſent the reader with ſome circumſtances relating to its firſt appearance. They are contained in a letter from Alexander Pope, Eſq; to Sir William Trumbull, dated April 30, 1713. 'As to poetical affairs, I 'am content at preſent to be a bare looker on; and 'from a practitioner, turn an admirer, which is (as 'the world goes) not very uſual. Cato was not 'ſo much the wonder of Rome in his days, as he 'is of Britain in ours: and though all the fooliſh 'induſtry poſſible has been uſed to make it thought 'a party play, yet what the author once ſaid of an-'other, may the moſt properly in the world be ap-'plied to him on this occaſion.

Envy itſelf is dumb, in wonder loſt,
And factions ſtrive who ſhall applaud him moſt.

'The numerous and violent claps of the Whig-'party on the one ſide of the theatre, were ecchoed 'back by the Tories on the other; while the author 'ſweated behind the ſcenes with concern, to find 'their applauſe proceeding more from the hand than 'the head. This was the caſe too of the Prologue 'writer, who was clapped into a ſtanch Whig, at 'almoſt every two lines. I believe you have heard, 'that after all the applauſes of the oppoſite faction, 'my Lord Bolingbroke ſent for Booth, who played Ca-'to, into the box, between one of the acts, and preſent-'ed him with fifty guineas, in acknowledgment (as 'he expreſſed it) for defending the cauſe of liberty ſo 'well againſt a Perpetual Dictator. The Whigs 'are unwilling to be diſtanced this way, and there-'fore deſign a preſent to the ſame Cato, very 'ſpeedily; in the mean time they are getting ready 'as good a ſentence as the former, on their ſide: 'ſo betwixt them it is probable, that Cato (as Dr. 'Garth expreſt it) may have ſomething to live upon 'after he dies (36).' Immediately after the publication of this tragedy, there came abroad a pamphlet, intitled, Obſervations upon Cato. This was written by Dr. Sewell, a very ingenious gentleman, and a good poet. The deſign of this piece was to ſhew, that the applauſe this tragedy had met with, was founded in merit. It is a very accurate and entertaining criticiſm, and contributed not a little to the ſecuring our poet the hearts of his readers, as well as of his audience (37). We are not however to ſuppoſe that our author had no enemies, or that there were not enow, who either did not like that tragedy, or pretended not to like it. Amongſt theſe, the formidable Mr. Dennis had the courage to attack it. Firſt in a pamphlet (38), and again in a ſubſequent work, wherein he employed no leſs than ſeven letters in pulling the tragedy to pieces; and ſaying whatever an ill-natured man, with a tolerable ſhare of wit, might be able to ſay, againſt the beſt written piece in the world (39). Another gentleman, who called himſelf a ſcholar of Oxford, conſidered the play in quite a different light, that is, he conſidered it as a political piece, and endeavoured to ſerve his party, by turning the cannon upon the enemy. The title of his pamphlet was, Mr. Addiſon turned Tory (40); and it is written with great ſpirit and vivacity. Dr. Fiddes alſo took ſome exception at the following lines,

In ſpite of all the virtues we can boaſt,
A woman that deliberates is loſt.

The doctor thinks theſe reflect on the fair ſex (41); but this ſeems a very forced conſtruction; the ſentiment is juſt and natural, and all ſtrokes of this ſort ought to be conſidered not as cenſures, but as cautions. The beſt judges, however, declared unanimouſly on the ſide of Mr. Addiſon; and, as occaſion offered, vindicated the merit of this tragedy, againſt all opponents. Mr. Boyer tranſlated it into French, the ſame year it was publiſhed; but very indifferently. Abbé du Bos made an excellent verſion, of which, however, only the three firſt ſcenes were printed (42). Abbot Salvini tranſlated it into Italian; his tranſlation was acted at Leghorn with prodigious applauſe, and he afterwards publiſhed it at Florence (43). It is not known whether Signior Valetta's tranſlation was ever printed; he was a young Neopolitan nobleman, who did it purely for his amuſement (44). The Jeſuits at St. Omer tranſlated it into Latin, and cauſed it to be acted by their pupils there, with great magnificence. They likewiſe ſent Mr. Addiſon a copy of their tranſlation (45). In France, a poet named Des Champs having ſeen this tragedy, wrote another with the ſame title, and dedicated it to the Duke of Orleans. This was firſt exceſſively cried up in France, then tranſlated into Engliſh blank verſe, and publiſhed with a parallel of that piece and the Cato of Mr. Addiſon, wherein the preference was given to the French performance. However, this was all the effect of pique, and the character of the French Cato could never be eſtabliſhed (46). Mr. Voltaire has commended and condemned Mr. Addiſon by turns; and in reſpect to the Cato, he admires and cenſures it extravagantly. The principal character he allows ſuperiour to any before brought upon the ſtage; but for all the love ſcenes he will have them abſolutely inſipid; which may be allowed him when he ſhall prove another of his aſſertions, viz. that Cato was the firſt regular tragedy that ever appeared on the Engliſh ſtage (47).

Counteſs of Warwick (p); and on the firſt breaking out of the rebellion, he publiſhed the Freeholder, which is a kind of political Spectator [N]. There were juſt fifty-five papers in all; the firſt was publiſhed on the twenty-third of September 1715, and the laſt on the twenty-ninth of June, 1716. Theſe pieces were exceedingly admired, and which was more the author's aim, were of great uſe at the time they were written (q). He publiſhed alſo about this time, ſome little pieces of poetry, ſuch as verſes to Sir Godfrey Kneller on the King's picture, and another copy to the Princeſs of Wales, with the tragedy of Cato. In April 1717 (r), his Majeſty King George I. was pleaſed to appoint our author one of his Principal Secretaries of State. His health, which had been before impaired by an aſthmatick diſorder, ſuffered exceedingly by an advancement ſo much to his honour, but attended notwithſtanding with very great fatigue. He bore it however with great patience, till finding, or rather ſuſpecting, that it might be prejudicial to the public buſineſs, he reſigned his office (s). Having thus procured for himſelf a vacancy from buſineſs, he grew better, and his friends were in hopes, that his health would have been thoroughly re-eſtabliſhed. In theſe leiſure moments he applied himſelf ſteadily to a religious work, which he had begun long before, the firſt part whereof, ſcarcely finiſhed, is preſerved and printed in his works (t). He likewiſe intended to have paraphraſed ſome of the Pſalms of David (u); but a long and painful relapſe broke all his deſigns, and deprived the world of this excellent perſon, on the ſeventeenth of June 1719, when he was entering the fifty-fourth year of his age. He died at Holland houſe near Kenſington, and left behind him an only daughter, by the Counteſs of Warwick (w). After his deceaſe, Mr. Tickell, who had the author's commands and inſtructions, collected and publiſhed his works in four volumes in quarto. In this edition there are ſeveral pieces hitherto unmentioned, of which it is neceſſary we ſhould ſpeak. The firſt in order of time is the Diſſertation upon Medals, which, though publiſhed after his death, yet the materials for it were collected in Italy, and he actually began to digeſt them into order, when at Vienna, in the year 1702 (x). Theſe dialogues are every way worthy of Mr. Addiſon; the deſign is juſt and uſeful, the manner correct, beautiful, and in the true taſte of antiquity. All the elegance of Plato, all the good ſenſe and maſculine gravity of Tully, with a becoming air of humour, in which our author was truly an original, are diſcoverable in this little work. The editor took a great deal of pains in tranſlating the Latin quotations, and the verſes prefixed to it by Mr. Pope are as perfect in poetry, as the piece itſelf is in proſe. In November 1707, there came abroad a pamphlet under the title of, The preſent State of the War, and the neceſſity of an augmentation conſidered. It is now printed among Mr. Addiſon's works (y), and I believe nobody who reads it will doubt that it is his. The ſpirit in which it is written, the weighty obſervations contained therein, on the ſtrength and intereſt of foreign nations, and the comprehenſive knowledge ſhewn of all things relating to our own, evince it the work of no ordinary hand. The Whig Examiner, came out on the fourteenth of September 1710, for the firſt time (z). There were five papers in all attributed to Mr. Addiſon. Theſe are by much the ſevereſt things he ever wrote. Dr. Sacheverell (a), Mr. Prior (b), and many other perſons are in them very harſhly treated. The Examiner had done the ſame thing on the part of the Tories, and the avowed deſign of this paper was to make repriſals. In 1713, there was publiſhed a little pamphlet, intitled, The late Trial and Conviction of Count Tariff (c). It was intended to expoſe the Tory miniſtry, on the head of the French Commerce Bill; and is likewiſe a very ſevere piece. Theſe are all that are included in Mr. Tickell's edition, which were publiſhed in the life-time of Mr. Addiſon, without his name; as alſo was the Drummer, or the Haunted Houſe, a Comedy, not taken notice of in this edition, but publiſhed afterwards as Mr. Addiſon's, by Sir [N] A kind of political Spectator.] The Freeholder is particularly mentioned in the text, becauſe it was a work written by Mr. Addiſon entirely, and upon his own plan (48). Some indeed have ſuppoſed, that he was aſſiſted in this work by Mr. Philips (49); but there ſeems to have been no foundation for this report, ſince neither Mr. Tickell ſays any thing of it, nor does it appear from the papers themſelves, that they were written by different hands; for they are the moſt uniform; and, the greateſt part of them, the moſt out of every man's way of writing but Mr. Addiſon's, that can be imagined. There is one thing to be ſaid in reſpect to the Freeholder, which, as it will certainly be ſaid by poſterity, I can ſee no reaſon why it ſhould not be ſaid here: the Freeholder is, without queſtion, the moſt indubitable proof of the uſe a man of true wit, and reaſonable application, may be of to any adminiſtration. The numerous pieces of Sir Roger L'Eſtrange were all calculated either to make the people laugh, or to put them in a paſſion. Dr. Welwood's periodical papers were all politics, and, conſequently, too dry for the generality of readers. During the reign of the Queen, polemic writings were not only ſharp, but bitter, and their authors ſtudied rather to make their adverſaries feel the quickneſs of their reproaches, than to perſuade them by ſound arguments, much leſs to invite them, by moderate and gentle applications, to their different humours and ways of thinking. The Freeholder hath avoided all theſe faults, and, with an inexhauſtible fund of humour, mingles ſometimes the graveſt reaſonings, and at others the kindeſt expoſtulations. Beautiful deſcriptions, exquiſite allegories, viſions almoſt more than human; and, in fine, whatever might pleaſe, whatever could move, whatever ſeemed fitted to attract, is to be found in thoſe inimitable eſſays; and one may ſpeak it without fear of being contradicted by any man who reads them, that they are the beſt turned papers, with a view for the purpoſe for which they were written, that were ever penned. Mr. Addiſon, without queſtion, wrote them in conſequence of his principles, out of a deſire of removing prejudices, and from a ſtrong inclination to ſettle the government, and make his country happy. The making him Secretary of State, therefore, was but doing him juſtice for ſo extraordinary and well-timed a ſervice, which more than balanced that deficiency, which he objected againſt his own preferment, his being no ſpeaker in the Houſe of Commons.

Richard Steele [O]. Since his death, and the coming out of that edition, the following pieces have been aſcribed to our author: Diſſertatio de inſignioribus Romanorum Poetis, i. e. A Diſſertation upon the moſt eminent Roman Poets (d). This is ſuppoſed to have been written about 1692, is allowed to contain many uſeful obſervations, yet nobody has hitherto ventured to decide, whether it is, or is not, Mr. Addiſon's. A Diſcourſe on ancient and modern Learning (e); the time when it was written uncertain, but probably as early as the former. It was preſerved amongſt the manuſcripts of the Lord Somers, which, after the death of Sir Joſeph Jekyl, being publickly ſold, this little piece came to be printed in 1739, and was as well received as it deſerved. To theſe we muſt add, The Old Whig, No. 1. and 2 [P], pamphlets written in defence of the Peerage Bill, 1719. It is not eaſy to account for the not inſerting of theſe papers amongſt

[O] As Mr. Addiſon's, by Sir Richard Steele.] The Drummer was firſt publiſhed without any author's name, but with a preface prefixed by Sir Richard Steele, wherein he tells us, that it had been ſome years in the hands of the author, and falling under his peruſal, he thought ſo well of it, that he perſuaded him to make ſome additions and alterations and let it appear on the ſtage. He owns that it was not well received, or at leaſt, not ſo well received as it deſerved, which he accounts for, by obſerving that the ſtrokes therein are too delicate for every taſte, in a popular aſſembly; and he adds, that his brother-ſharers were of opinion, that it was like a picture, in which the ſtrokes were not ſtrong enough to appear at a diſtance (50). Mr. Tickell publiſhing Mr. Addiſon's works in 1721, omitted this comedy, which Sir Richard Steele ſo much reſented, that he quickly after publiſhed a ſecond edition of it, with an epiſtle to Mr. Congreve thereto prefixed. In this epiſtle he aſſerts, that he recommended the play to the ſtage, and carried it to the preſs; he likewiſe tells us the price it was ſold at, viz. fifty guineas. He refers himſelf to his former preface, for a proof of his zeal on that occaſion, which he obſerves could flow from nothing elſe than his affection for the author. For as to the ſhare that any one elſe had in it, he is poſitive it very little exceeded that of an amanuenſis. 'But indeed, continues he, had I not 'known it at the time of the tranſaction concern-'ing the acting on the ſtage and ſale of the copy, I 'ſhould I think have ſeen Mr. Addiſon in every 'page of it; for he was above all men in that talent 'called Humour, and enjoyed it in ſuch perfection, 'that I have often reflected, after a night ſpent 'with him apart from all the world, that I had had 'the pleaſure of converſing with an intimate ac-'quaintance of Terence and Catullus, who had all 'their wit and nature, heightened with humour 'more exquiſite and delightful than any other man 'ever poſſeſſed. They who ſhall read this play, 'after being let into the ſecret that it was written 'by Mr. Addiſon, or under his direction, will 'probably be attentive to thoſe excellencies, which 'they before overlooked, and wonder they did 'not till now obſerve, that there is not an expreſ-'ſion in the whole piece, which has not in it the 'moſt nice propriety and aptitude to the character 'which utters it; there is that ſmiling mirth, that 'delicate ſatire and genteel raillery which appeared 'in Mr. Addiſon when he was free among intimates; 'I ſay when he was free from his remarkable baſh-'fulneſs, which is a cloak that hides and muffles 'merit, and his abilities were covered only by mo-'deſty, which doubles the beauties which are ſeen, 'and gives credit and eſteem to all that are con-'cealed. The Drummer made no great figure on 'the ſtage, though exquiſitely well acted; but when 'I obſerve this, I ſay a much harder thing of the 'ſtage than of the comedy. When I ſay the ſtage 'in this place, I am underſtood to mean in general 'the preſent taſte of theatrical repreſentations; 'where nothing that is not violent, and as I may 'ſay groſsly delightful, can come on without ha-'zard of being condemned or ſlighted.' Nothing can be more juſt than Sir Richard's ſentiments on this matter (51). The Drummer may be perhaps eſtabliſhed as a teſt of true taſte: he who likes it, has it; he who diſapproves this piece, hath it not. Experience juſtified Sir Richard's conjecture. This play which failed when inimitably acted at Drury-Lane, was, when much worſe performed, loudly applauded at Mr. Rich's houſe, merely becauſe it was then known to be Mr. Addiſon's. How honourable this for our author! how diſhonourable to the audience! how happy was he to have his former writings read by better judges! The time in which he lived was worthy of Mr. Addiſon: but if his writings ſhould ever reach an age, ſo ſtupid or ſo barbarous as not to reliſh them, that will not alter their nature; they will ſtill remain as excellent as before, though not in the eyes of thoſe Goths and Vandals. But we deviate too far from our purpoſe; and yet to what purpoſe do we write, if it be not to defend the world from a decay of taſte, and to preſerve, from the inclemency of ſavage times, thoſe wreaths which men of merit have deſerved.

(50) The firſt edition of the Drummer, was printed for J. Tonſon.

(51) Epiſtle to Mr. Congreve, prefixed to the Drummer, the ſecond edition in 4*to*. 1722. p. 4.

[P] The Old Whig, No. 1. and No. 2.] In the latter end of 1718, and in the beginning of the year 1719, the Peerage Bill began firſt to be talked of, and the ſcope of that bill was this: That inſtead of the ſixteen Peers ſitting in Parliament as Repreſentatives of the Peerage of Scotland, there were for the future to be twenty-five hereditary Peers by the junction of nine out of the body of the Scotch nobility, to the then ſixteen ſitting Peers: That ſix Engliſh Peers ſhould be added, and the peerage then to remain fixed; the Crown being reſtrained from making any new Lords, but upon the extinction of families. What was the real view of this extraordinary ſcheme, is what we have no buſineſs here to inquire into. It is ſufficient for our purpoſe to obſerve, that it gave a great alarm to the nation, and many papers with great ſpirit were written againſt it; amongſt the reſt, one called the Plebeian, ſaid to fall from the pen of a member of the Houſe of Commons; and now known to have been written by Sir Richard Steele (52). To this ſeveral anſwers were publiſhed, and abundance of pieces written in ſupport of this project, none of which, however, were very favourably received. At length came forth the Old Whig, No. 1. on the ſtate of the Peerage, with remarks on the Plebeian. A 4*to* pamphlet (53), written with great perſpicuity, in a nervous ſtyle, not without ſome ſevere reflections on the Plebeian. The author of that paper did not ſuffer it to remain long unanſwered. In his ſecond number he replied to all the arguments therein made uſe of, treating the author with a good deal of aſperity, alledging amongſt other things, that the pamphlet had a very proper title, the author, if he was a Whig, ſeeming ſo old as to have forgot his principles (54). There does not appear, however, any thing in the firſt Old Whig which betrays the author's knowledge of the Plebeian coming from Sir Richard Steele; neither is there any thing in the ſecond Plebeian, which intimates the writer's having the leaſt ſuſpicion, that the Old Whig was Mr. Addiſon's. Though there was at the latter end of the laſt-mentioned paper, an intimation of its author's ſuperior dignity, and more thorough acquaintance with the ſecret of this affair. For the Old Whig firſt declared that his Majeſty had given his conſent, which he ſtyles an act of unparallelled goodneſs (55); of which fact the Plebeian doubted, or at leaſt affected to doubt (56). The ſecond Old Whig was written in ſupport of the firſt, and in anſwer to the ſecond Plebeian. It is a very judicious, and at the ſame time a very warm and very humorous pamphlet; from the very beginning of which it is apparent, that the author knew, or at leaſt was reſolved to conſider Sir Richard, as the writer of the Plebeian (57). He ſtyles him a perfect maſter in the vocation of pamphlet writing in one place, calls him little Dicky in another, tells him, he has made the moſt of a bad cauſe in a third, and adviſes him as a friend in the cloſe, if he goes on in his new vocation, to take care that he be as happy amongſt his works, unleſs we ſuppoſe that the publication of them following immediately the diſappointment of that deſign, made it improper to diſcover how much our author had it at heart. It would lead us into too long a digreſſion, ſhould we conſider here the occaſion of thoſe papers, which, however, ſhall be done in the Notes. Thus we have run through the hiſtory of this great man's life and writings, who, as he was ſuperior to moſt of his contemporaries in other things, ſo he particularly excelled them in this; that his performances are equally perfect [Q]; nothing puerile in the moſt early, nothing below his genius in the laſt; conſtant to his principles, and to his friendſhips, he died as he lived, eſteemed and revered by the great [R], without raiſing any enemies, except ſuch as were ſo on account of party; and even theſe expreſſed their enmity with reluctance [S], ſuch was their admiration of his virtues.

happy in the choice of his ſubject, as he is in the talents of a pamphleteer. The fourth Plebeian contains an anſwer to the ſecond Old Whig. It is written with much greater virulence than any of the reſt of the papers; his concluſion is very remarkable. Authors, ſays he, in theſe caſes are named upon ſuſpicion, and if it is right as to the Old Whig, I leave the world to judge of this cauſe by compariſon of this performance with his other writings; and I ſhall ſay no more of what is writ in ſupport of vaſſalage, but end this paper by firing every free breaſt with that noble exhortation of the tragedian (58),

Remember, O! my friends, &c.
Mr. ADDISON's Cato.

This is ſufficient to ſhew Sir Richard's belief, nor hath any body queſtioned the truth of his conjecture. The Peerage Bill went off notwithſtanding for that ſeſſions, and Mr. Addiſon died before it came on again, in the latter end of the ſame year. It may not however be amiſs to obſerve, that December 7, 1719, on a motion in the Houſe of Commons, for committing the Peerage Bill, it was carried in the negative, by 269, againſt 177 (59).

[Q] His performances are equally perfect.] In the text itſelf, we have endeavoured to do ſome juſtice to our author's character, and eſpecially to that diſtinguiſhing part thereof, the eaſe and readineſs with which he wrote, notwithſtanding the accuracy and correctneſs of all his writings. This, it may be, will be thought beſt ſupported by proof, which therefore we ſhall give in this note. The following Epigram (which is not inſerted in his works) was written when he was a member of the Kit-Cat Club, extempore, and yet it has not only wit, but correctneſs to recommend it.

On the Lady MANCHESTER.

When haughty Gallia's dames that ſpread
O'er their pale cheeks an artful red;
Beheld this beauteous ſtranger there,
In native charms, divinely fair;
Confuſion in their looks they ſhew'd,
And with unborrow'd bluſhes glow'd (60).

(60) Dryden's Miſcellanies, Vol. v. p. 91.

A farther proof of the extraordinary facility, with which he produced even the moſt perfect of his performances, may be taken from what Sir Richard Steele ſays of his Cato; he tells us, that the laſt act was written in leſs than a week's time. 'For this, 'continues he, was particular in this writer, that 'when he had taken his reſolution, or made his plan 'for what he deſigned to write, he would walk about 'a room and dictate it into language, with as much 'freedom and eaſe as any one could write it down; 'and attend to the coherence and grammar of what 'he dictated (61).'

[R] Eſteemed and revered by the great.] To attempt the reckoning up the friends of Mr. Addiſon, would be an endleſs labour; and yet, to ſay nothing of thoſe who diſtinguiſhed Mr. Addiſon, at the ſame time that they were themſelves perſons of the firſt diſtinction, would be an unpardonable omiſſion. We have already taken notice of Lord Somers, whoſe friendſhip to our author continued without interruption as long as he lived. We have likewiſe mentioned Mr. Addiſon's gratitude towards him in the dedication of his travels, after that Nobleman had been impeached in the reign of King William; and was actually, when he dedicated to him, in diſgrace with Queen Anne. We are yet to remark, that as Mr. Addiſon out-lived him, ſo in one of his Freeholders he paid ſuch a tribute to his memory, as muſt endear his own to every man of honour (62). The celebrated Earl of Halifax maintained alſo an inviolable friendſhip throughout his whole life for our author; to whoſe reputation we can add nothing, except it be naming the illuſtrious foreigners who ſubſcribed for his works, which not only does honour to him, but to our nation. They were the Queen of Sweden, his Royal Highneſs the Duke of Orleans Regent of France, the Great Duke of Tuſcany, the Great Prince of Tuſcany, the Duke of Modena, the Duke of Parma, the Prince of Modena, the Prince of Parma, the Doge of Genoa, the Duke of Guaſtalla, Prince Eugene, Cardinal del Giudice, Cardinal du Bois, and Marſhal d'Eſtrees (63). To mention the great names of our own nation, would be to tranſcribe the liſts of our nobility; and therefore we ſhall reſt this point here, preſuming that in few other lives it will be carried farther.

[S] Expreſſed their enmity with reluctance.] The author of a celebrated poem, intitled Faction Diſplayed, who died but lately, and was juſtly celebrated for giving an ingenious turn to his ill-nature, began an early war upon our author. In that poem, he makes his patron Mountague, there characterized by the name of Bathillo, deſcribe him thus:

On Addiſon we ſafely may depend,
A penſion never fails to gain a friend;
Through Alpine Hills, he ſhall my name reſound,
And make his patron known in claſſick ground (64).

(64) A quarto Poem printed at London in 1704, without the name of Author or Printer. The former, however, is ſuppoſed to be Mr. Shippen.

Mrs. Manley, in her ſequel to the Atlantis, gives our author's character at large, under the name of Maro; what ſhe ſays of him, is every way to his advantage, were it not for this ill-natured Apoſtrophe, on ſeeing him in Sergius's gallery. 'O pity, that poli-'ticks and ſordid intereſt ſhould have carried him 'out of the road of Helicon, ſnatched him from the 'embraces of the Muſes, to throw him into an old 'withered ſtateſman's arms, &c. (65).' This withered ſtateſman, whom ſhe had before called Sergius, is the ſame Lord Halifax, mentioned by the foregoing writer. But the ſevereſt attack that ever Mr. Addiſon felt, was from the following verſes, bright and piercing as lightning, and as fatally blaſting:

Peace to all ſuch! but were there one whoſe fires,
True genius kindles, and fair fame inſpires:
Bleſt with each talent, and each art to pleaſe,
And born to write, converſe, and live with eaſe:
Shou'd ſuch a man, too fond to rule alone,
Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne,
View him with ſcornful, yet with jealous eyes,
And hate for arts, that caus'd himſelf to riſe;
Damn with faint praiſe, aſſent with civil leer,
And without ſneering teach the reſt to ſneer:
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to ſtrike,
Juſt hint a fault, and heſitate diſlike;
Alike reſerv'd to blame, or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a ſuſpicious friend;
Dreading ev'n fools, by flatterers beſieg'd,
And ſo obliging, that he ne'er oblig'd:
Like Cato, gives his little ſenate laws,
And ſits attentive to his own applauſe:
While wits and templars ev'ry ſentence raiſe,
And wonder with a fooliſh face of praiſe.
Who but muſt laugh, if ſuch a man there be?
Who would not weep, if Atticus were he (66).

An author, in Miſt's Journal, gives the following account of this tranſaction. 'Mr. Addiſon raiſed this

[A few miſtakes in the original article concerning Mr. Addiſon have now been corrected (f); and we ſhall here add what farther particulars have occurred to us, concerning this valuable man, and juſtly celebrated writer. Mr. Whiſton confirms the truth of his having been intended for Holy Orders; and aſſerts that he was diverted from that purpoſe by Lord Halifax and Lord Somers. It hath even been ſaid, that the Saturday's papers in the Spectator, which were commonly upon religious ſubjects, were deſigned originally for ſermons. Mr. Addiſon was a great friend to Mr. Whiſton; and, in conjunction with Sir Richard Steele, by procuring a number of benefactors to the aſtronomical lectures of that very learned and worthy perſon, contributed to the comfortable ſupport of him and his family, when he had been baniſhed from the univerſity of Cambridge, for attacking the commonly received doctrine of the Trinity (g). In the project which Mr. Addiſon had formed, of compoſing an Engliſh Dictionary, he conſidered Archbiſhop Tillotſon's writings as the chief ſtandard of our language; and, accordingly, marked, as the groundwork of his deſign, the particular phraſes in the ſermons publiſhed during his Grace's lifetime (h). This ſhews how much he admired that eminent Prelate's ſtyle, and renders it probable, that he might, in part, be indebted to him for the perſpicuity and eaſe which appear in his own works. He is reported to have been ſo extremely nice in his proſe compoſitions, that, when almoſt a whole impreſſion of a Spectator was worked off, he would ſtop the preſs, to inſert a new prepoſition or conjunction (i). When the Guardian was dropped, he was ſolicited by Mr. John Hughes, to unite with him in writing another periodical paper, under the title of the Regiſter; but he declined the propoſal, though with great marks of regard to Mr. Hughes, of whoſe abilities and character he had a high and juſt eſteem. Mr. Addiſon alledged, that he had been ſo employed in thoughts of that nature for two or three years paſt, that he muſt take ſome time to reſt himſelf, and lay in fewel for a future work (k). Indeed, conſidering the variety of his beautiful eſſays and ſpeculations, in the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, it is not ſurpriſing that his ſtock of matter ſhould be ſomewhat exhauſted. Dr. Swift, who uſually ſpeaks of him in the moſt honourable terms, aſſerts, that he kept him in his employment under Lord Oxford's miniſtry, and that he recommended him to that nobleman. The Earl of Oxford would, no doubt, have rejoiced in ſuch an acquiſition; but this muſt have been rendered impoſſible, by Mr. Addiſon's attachment both to his principles and his friends. A remarkable teſtimony of his general popularity is afforded by Dr. Swift, in a letter to Stella, of October the 12th, 1710: "Mr. Addiſon's election, ſays he, "has paſſed eaſy and undiſputed; and, I believe, if he had a mind to be choſen King, "he would hardly be refuſed." A cordial friendſhip appears to have ſubſiſted between him and Dr. Swift; with the interruption, however, for a ſhort time, of ſome little reſerve, on account of their different political engagements. Mr. Addiſon's laſt letter to the Dean of St. Patrick's, ſtrongly diſplays the liberality and candour of his temper, and the ſincerity of his regard to the Dean in particular (l) [T]. A very late writer informs us,

'this author, i. e. Pope, from obſcurity, obtained 'him the acquaintance and friendſhip of the 'whole body of our nobility, and transferred his 'powerful intereſt with thoſe great men to this 'riſing bard, who frequently levied by that means 'unuſual contributions on the Public.——— No 'ſooner was his body lifeleſs, but this author, re-'viving his reſentment, libelled the memory of his 'departed friend; and, what was ſtill more hei-'nous, made the ſcandal public (67).' In anſwer to this, it is ſaid, that the whole is falſe; that Mr. Addiſon never introduced Mr. Pope to any nobleman, or procured him the ſubſcription of one gentleman. As to the libel, perſons of integrity are appealed to, who ſaw and approved the foregoing verſes, in no wiſe a libel, but a friendly rebuke, ſent in the author's own hand to Mr. Addiſon himſelf, and never made public by him, until printed by Curl and others (68). There is indeed, a letter of the Biſhop of Rocheſter's extant, wherein theſe verſes are highly commended, but this is ſeven years after Mr. Addiſon's death (69); and there is another letter of Mr. Pope's to Mr. Craggs, written near four years before Mr. Addiſon's death, wherein moſt of the ſame thoughts appear in proſe (70.) [T] The ſincerity of his regard to the Dean in particular.] This letter, as it places Mr. Addiſon's temper in a very agreeable point of view, we ſhall inſert. 'Briſtol, October 1, 1718. Dear Sir, I 'have received the honour of your letter at Briſtol, 'where I have juſt finiſhed a courſe of water-drinking, which I hope has pretty well recovered me 'from the leavings of my laſt winter's ſickneſs. 'As for the ſubject of your letter, though you know 'an affair of that nature cannot well nor ſafely be 'truſted in writing, I deſired a friend of mine to 'acquaint Sir Ralph Gore, that I was under a pre-'engagement, and not at my own choice to act in 'it; and have ſince troubled my Lady Aſhe with a 'letter to the ſame effect, which I hope has not 'miſcarried. However, upon my return to London, I will farther inquire into that matter, and 'ſee if there is any room left me to negociate as 'you propoſe.

'I ſtill live in hopes of ſeeing you in England; 'and if you would take my houſe at Bilton in your 'way (it lies upon the road within a mile of 'Rugby), I would ſtrive hard to meet you there, 'provided you would make me happy in your 'company for ſome days. The greateſt pleaſure I 'have met with for ſome months, is in the converſation of my old friend Dr. Smalridge, who, 'ſince the death of the excellent man you mention (71), is to me the moſt candid and agreeable 'of all Biſhops; I would ſay Clergymen, were not 'Deans comprehended under that title. We have 'often talked of you; and when I aſſure you he has 'an exquiſite taſte of writing, I need not tell you 'how he talks on ſuch a ſubject. I look upon 'it as my good fortune, that I can expreſs my 'eſteem of you, even to thoſe who are not of the 'Biſhop's party, without giving offence. When a 'man has ſo much compaſs in his character, he 'affords his friends topics enough to enlarge upon, 'that all ſides admire. I am ſure a zealous friendly 'behaviour diſtinguiſhes you as much as your many 'more ſhining talents; and as I have received particular inſtances of it, you muſt have a very bad 'opinion of me, if you do not think I heartily love 'and reſpect you; and that I am ever, dear Sir, 'your moſt obedient, and moſt humble ſervant, us, that when Lord Guernſey, during the debates on the Bill for ſtrengthening the Proteſtant intereſt, moved for a clauſe to be added to the Bill, to oblige every perſon who took the abjuration oath to acknowledge the divine inſpiration of the Bible, and the doctrine of the Trinity, he was ſupported in his motion by Mr. Addiſon; but upon what authority this aſſertion is grounded doth not appear (m) [U]. Dr. Young hath related a beautiful circumſtance concerning Mr. Addiſon's behaviour at the approach of death; and the fact is ſo remarkable, that we ſhall give it in the author's own words. "After a long and manly, but vain ſtruggle with his diſtemper, he diſmiſſed his phy- "ſicians, and with them all hopes of life. But with his hopes of life he diſmiſſed not "his concern for the living, but ſent for a youth nearly related, and finely accompliſhed, "but not above being the better for good impreſſions from a dying friend. He came; "but life now glimmering in the ſocket, the dying friend was ſilent: after a decent "and proper pauſe, the youth ſaid, "Dear Sir! you ſent for me: I believe and hope "that you have ſome commands; I ſhall hold them moſt ſacred." May diſtant ages "not only hear, but feel, the reply! Forcibly graſping the youth's hand, he ſoftly "ſaid, "See in what peace a Chriſtian can die." He ſpoke with difficulty, and ſoon "expired (n)."

J. ADDISON (72).'

Though there are not many new particulars to be met with, in relation to the general tranſactions of Mr. Addiſon's life, yet much hath been ſaid concerning him ſince the preceding article was written; and there hath appeared, of late, a tendency to depreciate his merit. His perſonal character has, in ſome degree, been attacked; and eſpecially with regard to his conduct to Mr. Pope [W]. His eminence as a poet

[U] Upon what authority this aſſertion is grounded doth not appear.] On the 13th of December 1718, a Bill was brought into the Houſe of Lords, by Earl Stanhope, intitled, "An Act for ſtrengthen- "ing the Proteſtant Intereſt in theſe kingdoms;" the deſign of which was to repeal the occaſional Conformity and Schiſm Bills; the firſt of which had been enacted in the 10th, and the other in the 12th year of Queen Anne's reign. After warm debates, it paſſed the Houſe of Lords, on the 23d of December, and was ſent down to the Houſe of Commons (73). When it came to be conſidered in that Houſe, on the 7th of January 1718-19, it was there as warmly debated; and on the 9th of January, when the Houſe went into a Committee on the Bill, Lord Guernſey moved, "That it be an inſtruction "to the ſaid Committee, that they have power to "receive a Clauſe, that any perſon when he comes "to take the oath of Abjuration, and other oaths, "ſubſequent to his receiving the Sacrament in "order to his qualification, ſhall acknowledge that "the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Teſta- "ment were given by Divine Inſpiration, and ſhall "acknowledge his firm faith and belief in the ever "bleſſed Trinity." The previous queſtion being put on this motion, it paſſed in the negative, by a majority of ninety voices; ſeveral members, who oppoſed the Bill in general, having diſapproved of Lord Guernſey's amendment (74). Mr. Addiſon was one of the members who divided for the Bill, on the 7th of January; and his not voting againſt Lord Guernſey's motion might ariſe from his abſence. This will be eſteemed the more probable, when we reflect upon the ſtate of his health. His attendance in the firſt day's debate, on which the ſucceſs of the cauſe depended, was, in all likelihood, as much as his ſtrength could bear. Beſides, as Lord Guernſey's motion was evidently deſigned to obſtruct and ruin the Bill, Mr. Addiſon, in joining with his Lordſhip, muſt have endeavoured to prevent the paſſing of an Act, which he himſelf, but two days before, had approved of, and ſupported. He muſt, at the ſame time, have acted contrary to the liberal principles which he had always maintained, contrary to his political connections, contrary to all thoſe friends of his, in both Houſes, with whom he had ever, in ſentiments and affection, been firmly united. Unleſs, therefore, better evidence be produced, for the fact aſſerted by Dr. Maty, than hath yet appeared to us, we can by no means admit of its truth. The Doctor probably was led into an error, by too ſuperficial an examination of the liſt of members who voted for and againſt the Bill, which is inſerted in the Appendix to the eighth volume of the Commons Debates, publiſhed by Chandler.

[W] His perſonal character, &c. has been attacked, and eſpecially with regard to his conduct to Mr. Pope.] Mr. Ruffhead has treated Mr. Addiſon's memory with great ſeverity as a party writer. 'His mode- 'ration in party, ſays this author, appears to have 'been all affected; though he uſed to talk much of 'it, and often recommended it to Mr. Pope, add- 'ing, that he ought not to be contented with the 'applauſe of half a nation. He uſed to blame 'Steele greatly for being too much a party-man; 'and yet, when he found himſelf that he was likely 'to promote his intereſt by party-attachments, he 'entered into them with a zeal which does his 'memory no credit: for this man of moderate prin- 'ciples became the champion of a faction, and did 'not ſcruple to pen the Freeholder (75).' The folly of this charge would only excite contempt, if the malignity of it did not demand indignation. Mr. Addiſon was, from principle, always warmly attached to the free conſtitution of his country, as ſettled by the Revolution, and ſecured by the Hanover ſucceſſion. When he took up his pen in this cauſe, he appears to have written from the heart, and not from a view to perſonal intereſt. At the time in which he began the Freeholder, there was a rebellion in the nation, that threatened the deſtruction of the government, and with it the deſtruction of our civil and religious liberties. By exerting himſelf, therefore, in their defence, he ſhewed himſelf not to be the champion of a party, but the champion of the Public. He ſupported that ſyſtem by which the Engliſh poſſeſs their moſt valuable rights, and by which the preſent King holds his crown.

(75) Ruffhead's Life of Pope, p. 142, Note.

Sir John Hawkins, in his Hiſtory of Muſic, hath, likewiſe, thought proper to treat Mr. Addiſon with no ſmall degree of contempt. The Knight informs us that, 'In conſequence of an opinion that men 'poſſeſſed of a talent for poetry, were beſt qualified 'for public employments, Mr. Addiſon was made 'Secretary of State; Prior was Secretary to the 'Engliſh Plenipotentiaries at the Hague, after that 'Under-Secretary of State, and, laſtly, a Lord of 'Trade; and Congreve, Stepney, Steele, and 'others, had ſeats at ſome of the Public Boards. 'The error of this opinion was evinced in the caſe 'of Mr. Addiſon, who, with all thoſe talents for 'which he is juſtly celebrated, not only made a 'very mean figure in the office of Secretary of 'State, but ſhewed himſelf to be as little fit for 'active life, as an exceſs of timidity, even to 'ſheepiſhneſs, could render a man. Though a 'Miniſter, he attempted to ſpeak in the Houſe of 'Commons, but was not able to do it, and was 'very deſervedly removed to make way for one that 'could. Dr. Mandeville, the author of the Fable 'of the Bees, who, though of very bad principles, 'was a man of underſtanding, and that knew the 'world, was very frequently with the Lord Chief 'Juſtice Parker, afterwards Earl of Macclesfield, 'whom Mr. Addiſon viſited, and expreſſed to the 'Chief Juſtice a deſire to meet him. His Lordſhip 'brought

[X] and a critic [Y], hath been diminiſhed, and many occaſional ſtrictures have been made upon his works [Z]. But, notwithſtanding the ſeveral things which have been advanced,

‘ brought them together, and, after an evening's ‘ converſation, aſked the Doctor what was his ‘ opinion of Mr. Addiſon, " I think," anſwered ‘ the Doctor, " He is a Parſon in a tye-wig (76)." As to the poets, in general, here mentioned, we ſhall content ourſelves, at preſent, with aſking Sir John Hawkins, whether he thinks that his having applied himſelf, for more than thirty years, to the preparing and writing of his Hiſtory of Muſic, hath rendered him unfit for public buſineſs? With regard to Mr. Addiſon, the account given is extremely unjuſt; for he was gradually trained up to a qualification for the ſeveral employments in which he was engaged. It appears that Lord Somers and Lord Halifax intended him for the ſervice of the ſtate, when they ſent him out to travel; nor would his travelling be an unſuitable preparation for that ſervice. In Queen Anne's reign, he was Commiſſioner of Appeals, attended lord Halifax to Hanover, was Under-Secretary to Sir Charles Hedges and the Earl of Sunderland, Secretaries of State, and Principal Secretary to the Marquis of Wharton, when that nobleman was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. After the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, Mr. Addiſon was ſucceſſively appointed Secretary to the Lords Juſtices, Secretary to the Earl of Sunderland as Lieutenant of Ireland, and one of the Lords of Trade. All theſe ſeveral employments ſhew, that he was regularly formed to public buſineſs; and no charge hath been produced againſt him, of a want of ſufficiency in any of the departments we have mentioned. Lord Sunderland, who muſt have well known what were Mr. Addiſon's talents for active life, wiſhed him to have been Secretary of State immediately upon King George the Firſt's coming to the crown; but he modeſtly declined that office, on account of his deficiency as a parliamentary ſpeaker. When he came to be Secretary of State, not to inſiſt upon the experience he had acquired in his many employments, he muſt, by his knowledge of the modern languages, and his readineſs and elegance of compoſition, have been admirably qualified for one moſt important part of his duty, the writing of diſpatches. There is no authority for ſaying, as Sir John Hawkins hath done, that he made a very mean figure in his office; and that he was unfitted for active life, by an exceſs of timidity, even to ſheepiſhneſs. The aſſertion appears to be equally groundleſs, that he was removed to make room for a perſon who could ſpeak in the Houſe of Commons. The real cauſe of his removal was his declining ſtate of health, which rendered him incapable of going through the fatigues of his employment. Mr. Tickell aſſures us, that on this account, Mr. Addiſon begged his Majeſty's leave to reſign. And that he was not turned out, or gave up his place in diſguſt, will be apparent, if we conſider the circumſtances attending his reſignation. This event happened in March 1717-18, when the Earl of Sunderland and the Lord Viſcount Stanhope exchanged their departments in Government; the former becoming firſt Lord of the Treaſury, and the other Secretary of State. Now with both theſe noblemen, and eſpecially with Lord Sunderland, Mr. Addiſon had always been very particularly connected. Mr. Craggs alſo, to whom he reſigned his office, was his moſt intimate friend. It was not likely, therefore, that theſe three eminent perſons ſhould concur to put an affront upon a man, for whom they entertained the higheſt regard. That his reſignation was perfectly voluntary, is evident, from his afterwards zealouſly ſupporting, in the Houſe of Commons, the Miniſtry which then took place; and, above all, from the dying dedication of his works to Mr. Craggs, in which he expreſſes a ſincerity and ardour of affection which could not poſſibly have ſubſiſted, if he had been treated in the manner repreſented by Sir John Hawkins. It was, no doubt, a diſadvantage, that Mr. Addiſon had not a courage and readineſs for ſpeaking in Parliament. But that defect might have been ſupplied, as it had heretofore been, by Mr. Craggs and other Members, if the bad ſtate of his health had not obliged him to retire.

(76) Hawkins's Hiſtory of Muſic, Vol. v p. 315, 316. Note.

As to the ſtory related by Sir John Hawkins, concerning Dr. Mandeville's interview with Mr. Addiſon, it were to be wiſhed that our muſical Knight had given us his authority for it. If the ſtory be true, it is, ſurely, no great reflection upon Mr. Addiſon, that he had a certain degree of reſerve and diffidence in his temper. Where he was free and open, we learn from an unexceptionable witneſs (Sir Richard Steele), that he was a moſt delightful companion. Had he been leſs modeſt and baſhful to ſtrangers than we have reaſon to think he was, he might not, perhaps, have choſen to be very cordial with Dr. Mandeville, whoſe principles and character he muſt have diſliked. The Doctor's reply to Lord Macclesfield, if a fact, indicates the ſarcaſtic turn of mind for which he was diſtinguiſhed, and it may paſs well enough as a ſmart ſaying; but ſeriouſly to relate it to the diſadvantage of Mr. Addiſon, does no credit to Sir John Hawkins. A writer, who can throw out ſuch indigeſted aſſertions to the diſparagement of exalted characters, cannot himſelf expect to be exempted from ſevere reprehenſion. It is not meant, however, to caſt a cenſure on Sir John Hawkins's work in general; which doubtleſs contains much uſeful information with regard to the Hiſtory of Muſic, and ſome biographical matter, from whence we ſhall derive advantage in the courſe of our undertaking.

But the grand charge which hath been produced againſt Mr. Addiſon, is his conduct to Mr. Pope; with regard to whom he is repreſented as having exerciſed a great deal of jealouſy, envy, and malevolence. Dr. Warton, two or three times, expreſſes the ill opinion which he entertained of him in this view (77). Cibber, in his lives of the poets, has related the quarrel between Mr. Addiſon and Mr. Pope, highly to the prejudice of the former (78). But the perſon who hath brought the moſt direct, full, and circumſtantial accuſation againſt him, is Mr. Ruffhead; whoſe charge, if true, would convict him of having been guilty of the greateſt baſeneſs and malignity (79). Mr. Addiſon's general character was ſo amiable, that we have always been hurt at the unfavourable accounts given of him, and have been willing to hope that they were carried to an exceſs. And we are now happy in having the difference between him and Mr. Pope very fully diſcuſſed by a gentleman of conſiderable rank, to whom the Public is obliged for works of much higher importance; but who, at a leiſure hour, hath favoured us with the following excellent paper.

‘ The quarrel between Mr. Addiſon and Mr. ‘ Pope, like others of the ſame kind, would de- ‘ ſervedly have fallen into oblivion, had it not been ‘ perpetuated by Mr. Pope's ſatyric muſe. And the ‘ true grounds of it will probably never be cleared ‘ up to the entire ſatisfaction of the inquiſitive Pub- ‘ lic, as one of the parties had been dead many ‘ years before any of the particulars were divulged, ‘ and thoſe which are now given us come only from ‘ Mr. Pope himſelf. For neither the Biſhop of ‘ Gloceſter himſelf, nor the digeſter of his materials, ‘ Mr. Ruffhead, could have any perſonal knowledge ‘ of the circumſtances of that tranſaction.

‘ The firſt notice we find of it in print is in that ‘ bitter but elegant character of Atticus, which was ‘ written (we are told) in Mr. Addiſon's lifetime, ‘ and ſent privately to him in manuſcript in the year ‘ 1715; but was certainly not made public till two ‘ years after his death; was afterwards printed in ‘ Mr. Pope's Miſcellanies; and finally ingrafted in- ‘ to his epiſtle to Dr. Arbuthnot in 1733. The ‘ cauſe is obſcurely glanced at in letters, and ſcraps ‘ of letters, publiſhed by Mr. Pope in his corre- ‘ ſpondence; was more openly avowed in Mr. War- ‘ burton's notes on the epiſtle to Arbuthnot, verſe ‘ 193, which were publiſhed in 1752; and the ‘ whole was drawn up into a regular charge, by Mr. ‘ Ruffhead in his life of Mr. Pope, printed 1769 ‘ (80).

' The account given is ſhortly this: " That Mr. " Addiſon's and Mr. Pope's friendſhip commenced " in 1713, and continued for ſome time with re- " ciprocal eſteem and affection; that during this " period the tranſlation of the Iliad was ſet on foot, " and the ſubſcription promoted by Mr. Addiſon; " and on the other hand Mr. Pope defended his " friend againſt the brutal attack of Dennis. " At length Addiſon became jealous of Pope's ge- " nius, and encouraged Philips to aſperſe his cha- " racter with reſpect to his political connections; " and ſoon after his jealouſy diſcovered itſelf by a " very peculiar circumſtance. For upon Pope's " adviſing with Mr. Addiſon about altering the " Rape of the Lock by inſerting the machinery, he " diſſuaded him from ſo noble an improvement. " That this circumſtance firſt opened Mr. Pope's " eyes with regard to the real character of his " friend; and his ſuſpicions were ſoon after con- " firmed by the publication of Mr. Tickell's tranſ- " lation of the firſt Book of Homer, in oppoſition " to Mr. Pope's, which he was fully convinced, " from many odd concurring circumſtances, was " indeed Mr. Addiſon's own performance. That " this occaſioned an open breach between Mr. Ad- " diſon and Mr. Pope, which Mr. Jervas and other " common friends endeavoured to reconcile; but " that Mr. Addiſon's unbecoming behaviour and " cool contempt, at an interview between them, " attended by Sir Richard Steele and Mr. Gay, " rendered a reconciliation impracticable. That " Mr. Pope, while yet warm with this provocation, " wrote the character above mentioned of Mr. " Addiſon. That, about this time, the Earl of War- " wick, Mr. Addiſon's ſon-in-law, told Mr. Pope, " that it was in vain to think of being well with his " father; who was naturally a jealous man, and " was hurt by Mr. Pope's ſuperior talents in poetry " to ſuch a degree, that he had ſecretly encouraged " Gildon to write ſomething about Wycherley, in " which he had taken occaſion to abuſe Mr. Pope, " and his family, in a virulent manner, and that " Mr. Addiſon paid him ten guineas as the wages " of his ſcurrility. That the next morning, after " he had received this information, he wrote Mr. " Addiſon an expoſtulatory letter, in which he in- " cloſed the verſes containing his character; which " had ſo good an effect upon him, that, from that " period to the time of his death, he always treated " Mr. Pope with civility, and (as he believed) with " juſtice."

' If this account, and eſpecially the latter part of ' it, be founded in truth, Mr. Addiſon very juſtly ' deſerved that ſeverity with which his memory has ' been treated by Mr. Pope and his profeſſed pane- ' gyriſts. But in juſtice to a character ſo amiable as ' that of Mr. Addiſon, now unable to vindicate ' himſelf, we may be allowed to ſuſpend our belief ' of it, till the accuſation is better proved; eſpe- ' cially as it is evident from dates and facts, chiefly ' extant in Mr. Pope's own works, (but which his ' Biographer has ſtrangely miſplaced and confound- ' ed) that the account given by Mr. Ruffhead can- ' not poſſibly be altogether true, and is hardly ac- ' curate in a ſingle particular.

' It may be doubted whether the acquaintance ' between Addiſon and Pope did not commence as ' early as 1712. For Steele promiſed to bring them ' acquainted in February 1711-12 (81). And we ' find Mr. Addiſon, in October 1712 (82), warmly ' recommending Mr. Pope to the world as a riſing ' genius; and in the ſucceeding month adviſing his ' publication of the Temple of Fame (83). This ' acquaintance was probably improved into friend- ' ſhip by Mr. Pope's writing the prologue to Cato, ' in April 1713. And as in the ſame year 1713, ' the improved edition of the Rape of the Lock was ' publiſhed (84), Mr. Addiſon's ſuppoſed advice, ' diſcouraging the propoſed alterations, muſt therefore ' have been given in the very infancy and not at the ' cloſe of their friendſhip. If he gave ſuch advice, it ' was probably his real opinion. He might think it ' dangerous to tamper with ſo beautiful a poem as ' the original, and had perhaps no conception of ' the art and ingenuity with which Mr. Pope was ' able to interweave the machinery, without break- ' ing the unity of deſign. It is not ſuggeſted that ' Mr. Addiſon diſliked the improvement when made, ' or diſſuaded him from publiſhing the poem in ſuch ' its improved ſtate; which might have been a rea- ' ſonable ground of ſuſpicion. But ſo trifling a ' circumſtance as the difference of opinion upon the ' propriety of the hint when firſt ſtarted, could ne- ' ver be of itſelf ſufficient to open Mr. Pope's eyes, ' and mark Mr. Addiſon's character as a compound ' of meanneſs and jealouſy.

' Indeed, it is plain that Mr. Pope at the time ' thought otherwiſe, or elſe was himſelf inſincere. ' He drew his pen in defence of Cato in 1713, by ' writing a narration of John Dennis's Frenzy, con- ' trary to the wiſh of Mr. Addiſon (who diſapproved ' ſo illiberal an attack), and publiſhed it, though ' againſt his conſent (85). And his letters to Mr. ' Addiſon in October, November, December, and ' January following (which muſt have been written ' after his eyes are thus ſaid to have been opened), ' are full of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of friendſhip ' and confidence. He then intruſted to this man ' (whoſe jealouſy he perceived had been raiſed by ' the very mention of the ſylphs and the gnomes) ' his original deſign of tranſlating and commenting ' upon Homer. Mr. Addiſon (who it ſeems did not ' think Achilles half ſo formidable as Ariel in the ' hands of his poetical rival) received this de- ' ſign with great warmth of encouragement, and he ' was the firſt whoſe advice determined Mr. Pope to ' undertake that taſk (86). He alſo preſſed him to ' turn it to the beſt pecuniary advantage, and for ' that purpoſe to avoid engaging in any party diſ- ' putes; into which he feared he might be drawn ' by his intimacy with Dr. Swift, and the atten- ' tion paid him by many of the Tory Miniſtry. ' The ſuſpicions, if any, which Mr. Pope enter- ' tained of Mr. Addiſon's ſincerity, from his advice ' about the Rape of the Lock, had ſurely by this ' time ſubſided; as indeed they might well do, if ' nothing happened to confirm them till the publica- ' tion of Mr. Tickell's Homer; which, inſtead of ' being ſoon, was not till about two years after.

' In the mean time, a quarrel broke out between ' Mr. Pope and Ambroſe Philips; which involved ' Mr. Addiſon in its conſequences, and put a period to ' the cordiality of their friendſhip. Stung with the ' reputation which Philips had acquired as a writer ' of paſtorals, Pope wrote an ironical paper in the ' Guardian, April 27th, 1713, in ridicule of Phi- ' lips. Mr. Addiſon immediately perceived the ' drift of it, and joined with Mr. Pope in the ' laugh; but Steele underſtood and publiſhed it as ' a ſerious panegyric upon his friend. When the ' jeſt was diſcovered, Philips ſeems to have been ' outrageouſly angry, and to have harboured a deep ' reſentment. For in the ſpring of 1714, he took ' occaſion to abuſe Mr. Pope at Button's Coffee- ' houſe as a Tory, and one united with Dr. Swift to ' write againſt the Whig intereſt, and undermine ' the reputation of himſelf, Steele, and Addiſon. ' Addiſon upon this came to Pope, and aſſured him ' of his diſbelief of this idle ſtory, and hoped their ' friendſhip would ſtill continue (87). Yet he ſeems ' to have been ſomewhat ſtaggered in reſpect to Mr. ' Pope's party attachments, againſt which he had ' cautioned him more than once in the preceding ' year (88); and a coolneſs certainly enſued, which ' continued for ſeveral months. During this eſtrange- ' ment, the interview mentioned by Mr. Ruffhead ' (89), is more likely to have happened than at the ' period in which he places it, the latter end of the ' year 1715; when in reality there was no rupture ' between them. Mr. Pope, it is confeſſed by his ' Biographer, conducted himſelf at this interview ' with great impetuoſity and warmth; and Mr. Ad- ' diſon, who was of a colder conſtitution, and much ' Mr. Pope's ſuperior both in age and ſtation, might ' poſſibly behave with too much hauteur and reſerve. ' But that he harboured no malice againſt him, ap- ' pears from his ſubſequent conduct.

' For the ſudden revolution in politics that hap- ' pened at the death of Queen Anne, and brought ' Mr. Addiſon and his friends into power and office, ' moſt moſt certainly gave him an opportunity of mortifying, if not cruſhing, his competitor, in caſe he had been mean enough to wiſh it. On the contrary, from that inſtant, he was inclined to forget all animoſities, and offered his ſervices, nay his intereſt at court to Mr. Pope (90); to which he returned a very waſpiſh and diſdainful anſwer (91): but however, in a few weeks afterwards, Pope ſoftened his tone, and wrote a more complaiſant letter to Mr. Addiſon himſelf, yet mixed with ſome diſtruſt and reſentment (92). Civilities upon this were again renewed between them; inſomuch that, in April 1715, we find Mr. Pope going to Mr. Jervas's, on purpoſe to meet Mr. Addiſon (93); and in the ſame year he wrote his panegyrical epiſtle in verſe, to be prefixed to Mr. Addiſon's Dialogues on Medals.

At length the great and inexpiable offence was given by Mr. Addiſon to Mr. Pope, by permitting Mr. Tickell, his dependant, and afterwards his under-ſecretary, to publiſh a tranſlation of the firſt Book of the Iliad in the beginning of June 1715, juſt at the time when the firſt volume of Mr. Pope's work was delivered to his ſubſcribers. Whether this book was tranſlated by Mr. Addiſon himſelf in his younger days, or whether he only reviſed and corrected Mr. Tickell's performance, cannot be pronounced with certainty; unleſs the Public were in poſſeſſion of thoſe odd concurring circumſtances which convinced Mr. Pope himſelf, that it was Mr. Addiſon's own tranſlation; though he certainly thought otherwiſe, when he penned the character of Atticus (94). To apologize for its publication at ſo critical a juncture, the following advertiſement was prefixed by Mr. Tickell, though that circumſtance was induſtriouſly ſuppreſſed in all Mr. Pope's publications on the ſubject: "I "muſt inform the Reader, that when I began this "firſt book, I had ſome thoughts of tranſlating the "whole Iliad; but I had the pleaſure of being di"verted from that deſign, by finding the work was "fallen into a much abler hand. I would not "therefore be thought to have any other view in "publiſhing this ſmall ſpecimen of Homer's Iliad, "than to beſpeak (if poſſible) the favour of the Pub"lic to a tranſlation of Homer's Odyſeis, wherein "I have already made ſome progreſs."

(94) "Who when two Wits on rival themes conteſt,
"Approves of both, but likes the worſt the beſt."

Whether, on the ſuppoſition that the ſpecimen was Mr. Addiſon's own (and it is not unworthy of him), he choſe to indulge the vanity of an author, by ſhewing how well he could have performed the whole; or whether (ſuppoſing it Mr. Tickell's, whom he loved and patronized with all the affection of a father) he really meant to have conferred on him a pecuniary obligation by promoting a ſubſcription for his Odyſſey, as he had before done (95) for Mr. Pope's Iliad; it muſt be acknowledged, that in either caſe the publication was indiſcreet and ill-timed. It is true, that Mr. Pope's finances could not now be materially affected, had the Public decided in favour of Tickell's tranſlation; for his ſubſcription was full, and his contract with Lintot was complete. But it certainly bore too much the appearance of rivalſhip and competition; and was, in either light, a weakneſs below Mr. Addiſon's ſtation and character. It is not to be wondered at therefore, that a man of ſo irritable a diſpoſition as Mr. Pope is acknowledged to have been, was hurt beyond meaſure by this tranſaction; and it is probable, that the character of Atticus was written in the heat of his reſentment on this occaſion; as he expreſſed the very ſame ſentiments to Mr. Craggs in his letter of 15th July 1715. But it does not appear (as Mr. Ruffhead aſſerts) that there was any open breach between Mr. Addiſon and Mr. Pope upon this occaſion; and Pope expreſsly tells Craggs theſe was none. Had any ſuch happened; and had Mr. Addiſon then ſhewn the temper aſcribed to him by Mr. Pope's Biographer, he would hardly, in the Freeholder of May 7, 1716, have beſtowed ſuch encomiums on Mr. Pope's tranſlation of the Iliad.

(95) Ruffhead, p. 185.

Upon the whole, however Mr. Pope may be excuſable for penning ſuch a character of his friend in the firſt tranſports of poetical indignation, it reflects no great honour on his feelings to have kept it in petto for ſix years, till after the death of Mr. Addiſon, and then to permit its publication (whether by recital or copy makes no material difference) (96); and at length, at the diſtance of 18 years, hand it down to poſterity ingrafted into one of his capital productions. Nothing ſurely could juſtify ſo long and ſo deep a reſentment, unleſs the ſtory be true of the commerce between Addiſon and Gildon; which will require to be very fully proved, before it can be believed of a gentleman who was ſo amiable in his moral character, and who (in his own caſe) had two years before expreſsly diſapproved of a perſonal abuſe upon Mr. Dennis. The perſon indeed from whom Mr. Pope is ſaid to have received this anecdote, about the time of his writing the character (viz. about July 1715), was no other than the Earl of Warwick, ſon-in-law to Mr. Addiſon himſelf. And the Something about Wycherley, (in which the ſtory ſuppoſes that Addiſon hired Gildon to abuſe Pope and his family) is explained by a note on the Dunciad, I. 296, to mean a pamphlet containing Mr. Wycherley's Life. Now it happens that, in July 1715, the Earl of Warwick (who died at the age of twenty-three in Auguſt 1721) was only a boy of ſeventeen, and not likely to be entruſted with ſuch a ſecret by a ſtateſman between forty and fifty, with whom it does not appear he was anyway connected or acquainted. For Mr. Addiſon was not married to his mother the Counteſs of Warwick till the following year 1716. Nor could Gildon have been employed in July 1715 to write Mr. Wycherley's Life, who lived till the December following. As therefore ſo many inconſiſtencies are evident in the ſtory itſelf, which never found its way into print till near ſixty years after it is ſaid to have happened, it will be no breach of charity to ſuppoſe that the whole of it was founded on ſome miſapprehenſion in either Mr. Pope or the Earl; and unleſs better proof can be given, we ſhall readily acquit Mr. Addiſon of this the moſt odious part of the charge.'

(96) Biſhop Atterbury's Letter, 26 Feb. 1721-2.

[X] As a poet.] For a time he was highly extolled in this reſpect; but of late his reputation hath been much upon the decline. The ingenious Dr. Warton, however, places him in the ſecond claſs of our poetical authors; Spenſer, Shakeſpear, and Milton conſtituting the firſt; and joins him with Dryden, Prior, Cowley, Waller, Garth, Fenton, Gay, Denham, and Parnell (97). But other writers ſeem diſpoſed to aſſign a much lower rank to Mr. Addiſon. The late Mr. Gilbert Cooper, in his Letters concerning Taſte, hath aſſerted, that he was a very indifferent critic, and a worſe poet. He allows that Mr. Addiſon 'tranſlated the poetical deſcriptions of Ovid very elegantly and faithfully into his own language;' but then he adds, that 'he fell infinitely ſhort of them in his original compoſitions, for want of that unconſtrained fire of imagination, which conſtitutes a true Poet. Hence, he ſays, we may be enabled to account for the peculiar fatality which attends Mr. Addiſon's poetical writings, that his tranſlations ſeem originals, while his own compoſitions have the confined air of tranſlations (98).' In vindication of theſe remarks, Mr. Cooper afterwards analyſes two of Mr. Addiſon's ſimiles, that of the Angel in the Campaign, and another at the concluſion of the firſt act of Cato. With regard to theſe ſimiles, he obſerves, 'that both betray a great poverty of imagination, by an inſipid repetition of one thought in different expreſſions. To begin then with the celebrated ſimile of the Campaign, which, for half a century, has been undiſtinguiſhingly admired.

of our moſt eaſy, elegant, and graceful writers; as having been ſingularly beautiful in his allegorical papers, and admirable for the vein of humour which runs through many of his compoſitions [AA].]

ADRIAN

'Now take the ſecond line of each couplet, and 'examine whether the thought is varied. Is not 'ſhaking a guilty land with the riſing tempeſt, and 'directing the ſtorm, and guiding the furious blaſt, 'the ſame action? Is not acting by divine com-'mand, in the firſt verſe, and performing the Al-'mighty's orders in the fifth, the ſame thought 'likewiſe? Marcia's ſimile in Cato abounds ſtill 'more with this tireſome tautology:

'So the pure limpid ſtream, when foul with ſtains,
'Of ruſhing torrents, and deſcending rains,
'Works itſelf clear, and as it runs refines.

'Of ruſhing torrents, and deſcending rains, works (99) Ibid. p. 32. 34. 'itſelf clear, and as it runs refines (99)!'

Not to enter minutely into this criticiſm, we ſhall content ourſelves with remarking, that the repetitions complained of, do not deſtroy the general merit of the compariſons. Both of the ſimiles are beautiful; and that of the Angel is ſublime in the conception, whatever inaccuracy there may be in the expreſſion. It muſt be allowed, that Mr. Addiſon is ſometimes tautological in his language; and Dr. Campbell hath juſtly pointed out another inſtance of it, in the two firſt lines of the tragedy of Cato (100). But to conclude, as Mr. Cooper hath done, that Mr. Addiſon had no right to a pretenſion of being a good poet (101), is carrying the matter farther than good ſenſe and ſound criticiſm will warrant.

(100) Campbell's Philoſophy of Rhetoric, Vol. ii. p. 273.
(101) Cooper, ubi ſupra, p. 34.

It muſt not be concealed, that Mr. Addiſon's poetical reputation hath been lowered by a writer far ſuperior to Mr. Cooper, in taſte, literature, and critical ſagacity. Dr. Hurd, in diſcuſſing the queſtion, 'whether the uſual forms of learning be 'not rather injurious to the true poet, than really 'aſſiſting to him;' anſwers, 'that it ſhould ſeem to 'be ſo for a natural reaſon. For the faculty of 'invention, as all our other powers, is much im-'proved and ſtrengthened by exerciſe. And great 'reading prevents this, by demanding a perpetual 'exerciſe of the memory. Thus the mind becomes 'not only indiſpoſed, but, for want of uſe, really 'unqualified to turn itſelf to other views, than 'ſuch as habitual recollection eaſily preſents to it. 'And this, I am perſuaded, hath been the caſe 'with many a fine genius, and eſpecially with one 'of our own country (102); who, as appears from 'ſome original efforts in the ſublime allegorical 'way, had no want of natural talents for the 'greater poetry; which yet were ſo reſtrained and 'diſabled by his conſtant and ſuperſtitious ſtudy of 'the old claſſics, that he was, in fact, but a very 'ordinary poet (103).' The reaſon aſſigned for Mr. Addiſon's deficiency in the power of invention, is ingenious and candid; and it muſt be acknowledged, that there is much truth in the repreſentation of the influence which his claſſical literature had upon him. He did not uſually diſplay, in his poetry, a highly vigorous imagination. Nevertheleſs, we find it difficult to unite with the Biſhop of Litchfield, in calling him 'a very ordinary poet.' Without pretending to any great critical acuteneſs, we ſhall briefly deſcribe the ſentiments which roſe in our minds, upon a curſory reperuſal of Mr. Addiſon's poems. The verſes addreſſed to Mr. Dryden, and to his Majeſty King William, have nothing in them peculiarly ſtriking. The tranſlation of Virgil's Georgic is remarkably defective in the accuracy of the rhymes. The ſong of St. Cecilia's Day, is undoubtedly far inferior to Dryden's noble ode. As it is modeſtly called a ſong, and might be written haſtily for a particular purpoſe, it was probably never intended to rival Dryden. In the account of the greateſt Engliſh poets, Mr. Addiſon hath ſhewn that he had not a juſt ſenſe of the excellencies of Chaucer and Spenſer; though, perhaps, there may be ſome truth in what hath been ſaid concerning the tediouſneſs of Spenſer's allegories. Milton is finely celebrated. The applauſe given to Congreve was ſcarcely merited; and ſtill leſs that which is beſtowed upon Montague. The Letter from Italy is truly beautiful. A pleaſing enthuſiaſm runs through it; the verſification is correct and harmonious; and if Mr. Addiſon had never written any thing beſides, this production alone would be ſufficient to reſcue him from the character of having been 'a very ordinary poet.' Though the Campaign hath many admirable paſſages in it, we cannot help thinking with Dr. Warton, that it is too much a Gazette in rhyme (104). The Opera of Roſamond is beautiful upon the whole; but we agree with the ſame Gentleman, that it is debaſed and degraded by the character of Sir Truſty (105); and, it may be added, by the character of Grindeline. The ſucceſs of this Opera upon the ſtage, was hindered by its being badly ſet to muſic (106). Mr. Addiſon's tranſlations from Horace and Ovid are fine; and, in this reſpect, particular juſtice hath been done to him by Mr. Cooper (107). With regard to the tragedy of Cato, the love parts may be excuſed (ſo far as the excuſe will bear), from the univerſal taſte of the age; and the ſame may be ſaid for the concluſion of the acts in rhyme, and with ſimiles. Though the love parts in general are heavy, yet the ſcene between Portius and Lucia, when ſhe makes her vow, is intereſting; and ſo likewiſe is that, in which Marcia diſcovers her affection to Juba. The characters of Marcus, Syphax, and Sempronius are natural; and diſtinctly, though not ſtrongly, marked. If Marcia's be thought too ſtoical for a woman, it ſhould be remembered, that ſhe was Cato's daughter. And beſides, ſhe diſplays the tenderneſs of her ſex, in the ſcene wherein Juba is ſuppoſed by her to be dead. But the great character of this play is that of Cato himſelf. As it is not ſufficiently agitated with paſſion, it is not, on that account, well adapted for the ſtage. But taking it as it was, and as it ought to be repreſented, if admitted at all in the theatre, it is admirably drawn and ſupported. The verſification is beautiful, and there are many excellent paſſages in the tragedy; though it muſt be confeſſed, that being defective in vehemence and pathos, it doth not powerfully call forth the emotions of terror or of pity. As it was extravagantly extolled at its firſt appearance, it hath, of late years, been unduly degraded. Dr. Hurd hath directly expreſſed the ſame ſentiment; and, notwithſtanding the faults which he diſcerns in Cato, has given it the appellation of a fine tragedy (108). It is not generally known that Mr. Addiſon borrowed ſeveral hints of the celebrated ſoliloquy, at the beginning of the fifth act, from May's Supplement to Lucan. The copy of verſes to the Princeſs of Wales, which is truly elegant, is written with an affection which ſhews that the author was in his element when appearing in the cauſe of Whiggiſm, and of the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. The ſame cauſe inſpired him in the poem to Sir Godfrey Kneller, which concludes with ſome of the moſt beautiful allegorical lines that are to be met with in poetry. The Comedy of the Drummer is well characteriſed by Sir Richard Steele in the Epiſtle to Mr. Congreve, prefixed to the ſecond edition (109). The play, though ſcarcely buſy and buſtling enough to pleaſe the generality of hearers on the ſtage, abounds with that native, unaffected, genuine humour which will ever delight us in the cloſet. The characters, which are truly comic, are finely varied and ſuſtained. It may be queſtioned, whether the plot be not ſomewhat unnatural. Had the comedy firſt appeared in the preſent age, it would probably on this account have been attacked with unrelenting ſeverity by our newspaper writers and occaſional critics. The fierce aſſaults which, from all quarters, are now inſtantly made upon every new theatrical production, are extremely unfavourable to the efforts of dramatic genius. Mr. Addiſon's Latin poetry diſplays the elegance of his claſſical taſte. There is a beautiful paſſage concerning the Duke of Gloceſter, in the poem upon the peace of Ryſwick in 1697. The War between the Pygmies and the Cranes is replete with animated deſcription, and the concluſion is fine. The Puppet-ſhow is deſcribed with much humour; and the Ode to Dr. Thomas Burnet is in the true ſpirit of Horace. The cloſe is excellent. In the preceding ceding obſervations, we have been obliged to differ, in ſeveral reſpects, from Dr. Warton; whoſe remarks upon the Tragedy of Cato, and upon Mr. Addiſon's other poems, though ſometimes unduly ſevere, are too ingenious, and, in many inſtances, too juſt, to be here omitted.

'The tragedy of Cato itſelf, is a glaring inſtance 'of the force of party; ſo ſententious and declamatory a drama would never have met with ſuch 'rapid and amazing ſucceſs, if every line and ſentiment had not been particularly tortured, and applied to recent events, and the reigning diſputes 'of the times. The purity and energy of the diction, and the loftineſs of the ſentiments, copied 'in a great meaſure from Lucan, Tacitus, and Seneca the philoſopher, merit approbation. But I 'have always thought, that thoſe pompous Roman 'ſentiments are not ſo difficult to be produced, as is 'vulgarly imagined; and which, indeed, dazzle 'only the vulgar. A ſtroke of nature is, in my 'opinion, worth a hundred ſuch thoughts; as,

'When vice prevails, and impious man bears ſway,
'The poſt of honour is a private ſtation.

'Cato is a fine dialogue on liberty, and the love 'of one's country; but conſidered as a dramatic 'performance; nay, as a model of a juſt tragedy, as 'ſome have affectedly repreſented it, it muſt be 'owned to want action and pathos; the two hinges 'I preſume, on which a juſt tragedy ought neceſſarily to turn, and without which it cannot ſubſiſt. 'It wants alſo character, although that be not ſo 'eſſentially neceſſary to a tragedy as action. Syphax, indeed, in his interview with Juba, bears 'ſome marks of a rough African; the ſpeeches of 'the reſt may be transferred to any of the perſonages concerned. The ſimile drawn from mount 'Atlas, and the deſcription of the Numidian traveller ſmothered in the deſert, are, indeed, in character, but ſufficiently obvious. How Addiſon 'could fall into the falſe and unnatural cuſtom of 'ending his three firſt acts with ſimiles, is amazing 'in ſo chaſte and correct a writer. The loves of 'Juba and Marcia, of Portius and Lucia, are vicious 'and inſipid epiſodes; debaſe the dignity, and deſtroy the unity, of the fable.'——'It is pity that 'the tragedy of Cato, in which all the rules of the 'drama, as far as the mechaniſm of writing teaches, 'are obſerved, is not exact with reſpect to the unity 'of time. There was no occaſion to extend the 'time of the fable longer than the mere repreſentation takes up; all might have paſſed in the compaſs of three hours from the morning, with a deſcription of which the play opens? if the poet, in 'the fourth ſcene of the fifth act, had not talked of 'the ſetting ſun playing on the armour of the ſoldiers.——

'Having been imperceptibly led into this little 'criticiſm on the tragedy of Cato, I beg leave to 'ſpeak a few words on ſome other of Addiſon's 'pieces. The firſt of his poems, addreſſed to Dryden, Sir John Somers, and King William, are 'languid, proſaic, and void of any poetical imagery or ſpirit. The letter from Italy is by no 'means equal to a ſubject fruitful of genuine 'poetry, and which might have warmed the moſt 'cold and correct imagination. One would have 'expected, a young traveller, in the height of his 'genius and judgment, would have broke out 'into ſome ſtrokes of enthuſiaſm. With what flatneſs and unfeelingneſs has he ſpoken of ſtatuary 'and painting! Raphäel never received a more 'phlegmatic eulogy. The ſlavery and ſuperſtition 'of the preſent Romans are well touched upon towards the concluſion; but I will venture to name 'a little piece on a parallel ſubject, that excels 'this celebrated letter; and in which is much lively 'and original imagery, ſtrong painting, and manly 'ſentiments of freedom. It is a copy of verſes written at Virgil's tomb, and printed in Dodſley's 'Miſcellanies.

'That there are many well-wrought deſcriptions, 'and even pathetic ſtrokes, in the Campaign, it 'would be ſtupidity and malignity to deny. But 'ſurely the regular march, which the poet has obſerved from one town to another, as if he had 'been a commiſſary of the army, cannot well be 'excuſed. There is a paſſage in Boileau, ſo remarkably oppoſite to this fault of Addiſon, that 'one would almoſt be tempted to think he had the 'Campaign in his eye when he wrote it, if the time 'would admit it:

'Loin ces rimeurs craintifs, dont l'eſprit phlegmatique
'Garde dans ſes fureurs un ordre didactique;
'Qui chantant d'un heros les progrés éclatans
'Maigres hiſtoriens, ſuivront l'ordre des temps;
'Ils n'oſent un moment prendre un ſujet de vüe,
'Pour prendre dole, il faut que Lille ſoit rendüe;
'Et que leur vers exact, ainſi que Mezerai,
'Ait fait déja toucher—les remparts de Coutrai.

'The moſt ſpirited verſes Addiſon has written, 'are an imitation of the third ode of the third book 'of Horace, which is indeed performed with energy and vigour; and his compliment to Kneller 'on the picture of King George the Firſt. The 'occaſion of this laſt poem is peculiarly happy; for 'among the works of Phidias which he enumerates, 'he ſelects ſuch ſtatues as exactly mark and characteriſe the laſt ſix Britiſh Kings and Queens *:

"Great Pan who wont to chaſe the fair,
"And lov'd the ſpreading oak, was there;
"Old Saturn too, with upcaſt eyes,
"Beheld his abdicated ſkies;
"And mighty Mars for war renown'd,
"In adamantine armour frown'd:
"By him the childleſs goddeſs roſe,
"Minerva ſtudious to compoſe
"Her twiſted threads; the web ſhe ſtrung,
"And o'er a loom of marble hung;
"Thetis, the troubled ocean's queen,
"Match'd with a mortal, next was ſeen,
"Reclining on a funeral urn,
"Her ſhort-liv'd darling ſon to mourn.
"The laſt was He, whoſe thunder ſlew
"The Titan race, a rebel crew,
"That from a hundred hills ally'd,
"In impious league their King defy'd."

* "Charles II. famous for his lewdneſs; the alluſion to his being concealed in the Oak is artful. James II. William III. Queen Mary, who had no heirs, and was a great workwoman. Queen Anne, married to the Prince of Denmark, who loſt the Duke of Glouceſter in his youth. George I. who conquered the Highland Rebels at Preſton, 1715."

'There is ſcarcely, I believe, any inſtance where 'mythology has been applied with more delicacy 'and dexterity, and has been contrived to anſwer 'in its application, ſo minutely, exactly, and in ſo 'many correſponding circumſtances (110).'

Mr. Walpole hath done the ſame juſtice to the concluding lines of the verſes to Sir Godfrey Kneller, which he calls the moſt beautiful of Addiſon's poetic works (111). Upon the whole, we by no means agree with Mr. Cooper, in his attempts to reduce Mr. Addiſon below the ſecond claſs of our Engliſh poets. In our opinion, there are great excellencies in ſeveral of his poems; though Dr. Hurd's remark is undoubtedly juſt, that he is defective in characteriſtic imagery (112).

[Y] And a critic.] The reaſon which Mr. Cooper aſſigns for calling Mr. Addiſon a very indifferent critic is, that he wanted that deep philoſophical ſpirit which is requiſite in works of criticiſm (113). This deep philoſophical ſpirit Mr. Cooper himſelf does not appear to have eminently poſſeſſed; and, therefore, on his own account, he had little claim to arraign Mr. Addiſon. However, the true queſtion is, whether the charge be juſt; and it muſt be acknowledged that the ſame charge is produced and ſupported with no ſmall appearance of reaſon, by a diſtinguiſhed critic, mentioned in the preceding note, from whom the Writer of the Letters concerning Taſte might perhaps borrow his aſſertion. Dr. Hurd, in his notes on Horace's Epiſtle to Auguſtus, having ſhewn the merit of inventing and applying general rules in poetical criticiſm, proceeds as follows:

'And, thus much being premiſed, we ſhall now 'be able to form a proper judgment of the method 'which ſome of the moſt admired of the ancients, as 'well as moderns, have taken in this work of criticiſing. The moſt eminent, at leaſt the moſt 'popular are, perhaps, Longinus, of the Greeks; 'P. Bouhours, of the French; and Mr. Addiſon, 'with us in England. 1. All the beautiful paſſages 'which Longinus cites are referred by him to five 'general claſſes. And 2dly, theſe general claſſes 'belong all to the common principles of ſublimity. 'He does not ſay this paſſage is excellent, but 'aſſigns the kind of excellence, viz. ſublimity. 'Neither does he content himſelf with the general

'notion of ſublimity, but names the ſpecies, viz. 'Grandeur of ſentiment, power of moving the paſ- 'ſions, &c. His work therefore enables us to claſs 'our perceptions of excellence, and conſequently 'is formed on the true plan of criticiſm. 2. The 'ſame may be obſerved of P. Bouhours. The paſ-'ſages cited by him are never mentioned in general 'terms as good or bad; but are inſtances of good or 'bad ſentiment. This is the genus in which all his in-'ſtances are comprehended: but of this genus he 'marks alſo the diſtinct ſpecies. He does not ſay, 'this ſentiment is good; but it is ſublime, or natural, 'or beautiful, or delicate: or that another ſentiment 'is bad; but that it is mean, or falſe, or deformed, or 'affected. To theſe ſeveral claſſes he refers his par-'ticular inſtances; and theſe claſſes themſelves are 'referred to the more comprehenſive principles of 'the excellence or fault of ſingle ſentiment, as op-'poſed to the various other excellencies and faults 'which are obſerved in compoſition. 3. Mr. Ad-'diſon, in his criticiſm on Milton, proceeded in like 'manner. For, firſt, theſe remarks are evidently 'applicable to the general obſervations on the 'poem; in which every thing is referred to the com-'mon heads of fable, morals, ſentiments, and lan-'guage; and even the ſpecific excellencies and faults 'conſidered under each head diſtinctly marked out. 'Secondly, the ſame is true concerning many of the 'obſervations on particular paſſages. The reader is 'not only told, that a paſſage has merit; but is 'informed what ſort of merit belongs to it. Neither 'are the remaining obſervations wholly without uſe. 'For ſuch particular beauties and blemiſhes, as are 'barely collected, may yet ſerve as a foundation to 'future enquirers for making further diſcoveries. 'They may be conſidered as ſo many ſingle facts, 'an attention to which is excited by the authority of 'the critic; and when theſe are conſidered jointly 'with ſuch as others may have obſerved, thoſe ge-'neral principles of ſimilitude may at length be 'found, which ſhall enable us to conſtitute new 'claſſes of poetical merit or blame.

'Thus far the candid reader may go in apolo-'gizing for the merits of theſe writers. But, as in 'ſound criticiſm, candour muſt not be indulged at 'the expence of juſtice, I think myſelf obliged to 'add an obſervation concerning their defects; and 'that on what I muſt think the juſt principles 'here delivered. Though the method taken by 'theſe writers be ſcientifical, the real ſervice they 'have done to criticiſm is not very conſiderable. 'And the reaſon is, they dwell too much in generals: 'that is, not only the genus to which they refer their 'ſpecies is too large, but thoſe very ſubordinate 'ſpecies themſelves are too comprehenſive. Of the 'three critics under conſideration, the moſt in-'ſtructive is, unqueſtionably, Longinus. The ge-'nus itſelf, under which he ranks his ſeveral claſſes, 'is as particular as the ſpecies of the other two. 'Yet even his claſſes are much too general to con-'vey any very diſtinct and uſeful information. It 'had been ſtill better, if this fine critic had deſcended 'to lower and more minute particularities, as ſub-'ordinate to each claſs. For to obſerve of any ſen-'timent, that it is grand, or pathetic, and ſo of the 'other ſpecies of ſublime, is ſaying very little. 'Few readers want to be informed of this. It 'had been ſufficient, if any notice was to be taken 'at all of ſo general beauties, to have done it in the 'way which ſome of the beſt critics have taken, of 'merely pointing to them. But could he have diſ-'covered and produced to obſervation thoſe peculiar 'qualities in ſentiment, which occaſion the impreſ-'ſion of grandeur, pathos, &c. this had been ad-'vancing the ſcience of criticiſm very much, as 'tending to lay open the more ſecret and hidden 'ſprings of that pleaſure, which reſults from poeti-'cal compoſition. P. Bouhours, as I obſerved, is ſtill 'more faulty. His very ſpecies are ſo large, as 'make his criticiſm almoſt wholly uſeleſs and in-'ſignificant.

'It gives one pain to refuſe to ſuch a writer as Mr. 'Addiſon, any kind of merit, which he appears to 'have valued himſelf upon, and which the genera-'lity of his readers have ſeemed willing to allow 'him. Yet it muſt not be diſſembled, that criti-'ciſm was by no means his talent. His taſte was 'truly elegant; but he had neither that vigour of 'underſtanding, nor chaſtiſed philoſophical ſpirit, 'which are ſo eſſential to this character, and which 'we find in hardly any of the ancients, beſides 'Ariſtotle, and but in a very few of the moderns. 'For what concerns his criticiſm on Milton in parti-'cular, there was this accidental benefit ariſing 'from it, that it occaſioned an admirable poet to be 'read, and his excellencies to be obſerved. But 'for the merit of the work itſelf, if there be any 'thing juſt in the plan, it was, becauſe Ariſtotle 'and Boſſu had taken the ſame route before him. 'And as to his own proper obſervations, they are, 'for the moſt part, ſo general and indeterminate, as 'to afford but little inſtruction to the reader, and 'are, not unfrequently, altogether frivolous. They 'are of a kind with thoſe, in which the French 'critics (for I had rather inſtance in the defects 'of foreign writers than of our own) ſo much 'abound; and which good judges agree to rank in 'the worſt ſort of criticiſm (114).'

(114) Hurd's Critical Works, Vol. ii. p. 110—114.

Theſe obſervations are in general ſo juſt, as well as ingenious, that, we are afraid Mr. Addiſon muſt, in ſome degree, fall under the charge. Nevertheleſs, we are willing to make a few remarks in his favour; if it be but to reſtrain the petulance of ordinary writers, who may be encouraged, by ſuch an authority, to throw out their cenſures without diſcernment and without candour. Let it then be obſerved, that thoſe who the moſt call in queſtion his philoſophical ſagacity as a critic, do juſtice to his exquiſite taſte. Mr. Cooper allows, that he was bleſſed with a taſte truly delicate and refined; which 'rendered him capable of diſtinguiſhing what were 'beauties in the works of others, though he could 'not account ſo well why they were ſo (115).' Dr. Hurd we ſee likewiſe aſſerts that 'his taſte was 'truly elegant.' It is a farther conſolation to the profeſſed admirers of Mr. Addiſon, that the excellence he is ſaid to have wanted, was found in hardly any of the ancients, beſides Ariſtotle, and but in a very few of the moderns. To be placed in the ſame rank with Longinus, is no ſmall degree of merit. Longinus hath contributed, in a high degree, to preſerve the principles of ſound taſte in the world; and the like praiſe is due to Mr. Addiſon. On this account our own country is much indebted to him, however defective he may be thought in the philoſophy of his criticiſms. If he determined only from his feelings, thoſe feelings were juſt ones. It is ſpoken of by Dr. Hurd, to the commendation of Horace, and ſaid with a philoſophical exactneſs, that he made his own feeling the teſt of poetical merit (116). Mr. Addiſon, by doing ſo, hath been the means, more perhaps than any other man, of ſpreading a good taſte in the Engliſh nation. In his Eſſay on the Georgics, he diſplayed a right ſenſe of the excellencies of that divine poem. His papers concerning true and falſe wit, the outlines of which may be ſeen in his notes upon Ovid, long baniſhed from among us the inclination to puns, rebuſes, anagrams, and other abſurd kinds of compoſition. His criticiſm upon Milton firſt brought the Paradiſe Loſt into general attention and admiration. All theſe things (and other inſtances might be added) are much to his honour, though it ſhould be allowed that there is no great depth of ſagacity in his obſervations. However, if his works were to be minutely analyzed, there would, we are perſuaded, be a ſpirit of diſcernment found in many of his remarks. In the Eſſay on the Georgics, he hath judiciouſly diſcriminated the ſpecies of poetry which there prevails from that of the paſtoral kind. He hath availed himſelf in his papers upon wit, of Mr. Locke's philoſophical explanation of the ſubject; which, ſo far as it goes, is juſt, though it may not include the whole of the matter. It is true, that Mr. Addiſon, in his criticiſm upon Milton, hath taken his principles from Ariſtotle and Boſſu; but from whom elſe could he take them? If theſe writers drew the laws of epic poetry from nature and from Homer; if no other laws could be laid down conſiſtently with ſound philoſophy; was Mr. Addiſon to invent new rules, which were capricious or falſe? In following theſe illuſtrious guides, he certainly acted with wiſdom. It has been objected to him, that the fine paſſages produced from the Paradiſe Loſt are obvious and well known. Not to ſay that they are better known now, than at the time when the Spectator was written, would it have been proper to have omitted the beſt paſſages, becauſe they would naturally have occurred to other persons of taste and discernment? We have sometimes been ready to imagine, that the severity exercised against Mr. Addison, hath arisen, in part, from his quarrel with Mr. Pope: and to trace the progress and consequences of the dislike which hath hence been formed against him, might be a curious speculation. His fault was, in fact, the fault of the age in which he lived. Philosophical criticism had not then been cultivated. The few hints of that kind which occur in the great Lord Bacon, were little known or attended to; and as to the rambling but agreeable prefaces of Dryden, they had no pretensions to the character. The truth of the case is, that Mr. Addison was, in this respect, far superior to his cotemporaries. We appeal to his essay on the pleasures of the imagination; which hath been strangely overlooked by the impugners of his critical sagacity. His admirable papers upon that subject display several sources of genuine criticism; and, as he himself observed, suggest to the reader what it is that gives a beauty to many passages of the finest writers both in prose and verse (117). Nothing so philosophical, with regard to the objects of taste and the internal senses, had hitherto appeared in this country. Mr. Cooper's peculiar favourite, Dr. Akenside, in his poem on the pleasures of imagination, hath made great use of Mr. Addison's essay; and the same hath been done by various authors. It ought not to lessen his reputation, or detract from his excellence, that since the time in which he lived, considerable advances have been made in the knowledge of the human mind, and the principles of what is beautiful in composition. None can be greater admirers than we are of philosophical criticism, or more sincerely rejoice in the good effects it hath produced. But surely, we may do justice to a Burke, a Hurd, a Lowth, a Harris, a Lord Kaims, a Gerard, a Campbell, a Beattie, and a Priestley, without casting a shade upon Mr. Addison's merit. Perhaps the spirit of refinement in some modern speculations hath not always been accompanied with the spirit of truth. But it is not our intention to censure. What we would contend for is, that a high tribute of applause ought to be paid to a man who contributed, in so eminent a degree, as Mr. Addison did, to diffuse good taste in the nation, and to promote the cause of polite literature.

(117) Spectator, No. 409.

[Z] Occasional strictures have been made upon his works.] We shall here add a few instances to those which have already been produced. Mr. Walpole censures Mr. Addison's character of Lord Somers, in the Freeholder (118), as diffuse and feeble; and says, that in truth he was sometimes as weak a writer, when he wrote seriously, as he was admirable in touching the delicacies of natural humour (119). But a few passages, which may be thought exceptionable, can by no means justify so severe a charge. His serious writings will, by competent judges, be pronounced to have great beauty and merit. Sir John Hawkins asserts, that when, in his singularly humorous papers, intended to ridicule the Italian Opera, Mr. Addison is necessitated to speak of music, he does it in such terms as plainly indicate, that he had no judgment of his own to direct him; that the goodness of his ear, as well as his knowledge of the subject, may be questioned; and that, in his general sentiments of music and musicians, he is ever wrong (120). If these remarks be just, they are not confined to Mr. Addison: for Sir William Temple, Mr. Dryden, and other respectable names have a like censure passed upon them. Whatever might be his skill and taste in music, it should seem that his ridicule of the Italian Opera contributed to the reformation of that species of entertainment; and we are told, that the humour of the ridicule is so strong and pointed, that the Pope is said, on reading his papers, to have laughed till his sides shook (121). Captain Edward Thompson, in the late splendid edition of Mr. Andrew Marvell's works, ascribes to Marvell, the two fine hymns in No. 453 and 465 of the Spectator, which hitherto have universally, and, we doubt not, justly been ascribed to Mr. Addison (122). Captain Thompson's general charge, as it respects not Mr. Addison only, but Mr. Mallet and Dr. Watts (not Tickell), will be considered in another place (123). Here we shall content ourselves with observing, that any man who can suppose that the ease, elegance, and harmony of the versification of the Ode which begins, 'The spacious firmament on high, &c.' could flow from Marvell's pen, must be very deficient in taste and judgment. The eminent and excellent Bishop Lowth, in his introduction to English Grammar, hath pointed out a few inaccuracies of expression which Mr. Addison hath fallen into, in common with Dryden, Pope, Swift, and others of our finest writers. The ingenious Dr. Blair of Edinburgh, in his Lectures on Oratory (a manuscript copy of which we have seen), hath analyzed some of Mr. Addison's prose compositions; and, while he gives due applause to their excellencies, mentions, with judgment and candour, the places wherein the arrangement might be altered for the better.

[AA] Many of his compositions.] It is an act of justice to those who have been, in some respects, the censurers of Mr. Addison, to recite their testimonies in his favour. Mr. Cooper celebrates him as a great and good man; who was inimitable as a prose writer, for those moral and humorous Essays; but more particularly those delightful allegories his muse Clio has left us (124). Dr. Hurd, besides occasional terms of commendation, dispersed in different places, represents him, in the passage before quoted, as a fine genius; who, as appears from some original efforts in the sublime allegorical way, had no want of natural talents for the greater poetry (125). Dr. Warton concludes his strictures on Mr. Addison's poetical character, with the following just encomium: 'Whatever censures we have here, too 'boldly perhaps, ventured to deliver on the pro- 'fessed poetry of Mr. Addison; yet must we can- 'didly own, that in various parts of his prose 'Essays are to be found many strokes of genuine 'and sublime poetry; many marks of a vigorous 'and exuberant imagination. Particularly, in the 'noble allegory of Pain and Pleasure, the vision 'of Mirza, the story of Maraton and Yaratilda, 'of Constantia and Theodosius, and the beautiful 'Eastern tale of Abdallah and Balsora; and many 'others: together with several strokes in the Essay 'on the Pleasures of Imagination. It has been the 'lot of many great names, not to have been able 'to express themselves with beauty and propriety 'in the fetters of verse, in their respective lan- 'guages, who have yet manifested the force, fer- 'tility, and creative power of a most poetic genius, 'in prose. This was the case of Plato, of Lucian, of 'Fenelon, of Sir Philip Sidney, and Dr. T. Burnet, 'who, in his Theory of the Earth, has displayed an 'imagination very nearly equal to that of Milton:

'——————Mœnia mundi
'Discedunt! totum video per inane geri res!

'After all, the chief and characteristical excellency 'of Mr. Addison, was his humour; for in humour 'no mortal has excelled him, except Moliere. 'Witness the character of Sir Roger de Coverley, 'so original, so natural, and so inviolably preserv- 'ed; particularly in the month which the Spec- 'tator spends at his hall in the country. Witness 'also the Drummer, that excellent and neglected 'Comedy; that just picture of life and real man- 'ners; where the poet never speaks in his own 'person, or totally drops or forgets a character, for 'the sake of introducing a brilliant simile, or acute 'remark: where no train is laid for wit, no Jere- 'mys or Bens are suffered to appear (126).'

Dr. Young, in his conjectures on original composition, draws Mr. Addison's character as a writer at large, to great advantage. He makes, indeed, some strictures upon his Cato, similar in sentiment to those already given; and relates a circumstance concerning that Tragedy, which has not before been mentioned. 'When Addison was a stu- 'dent at Oxford, he sent up this play to his friend 'Dryden, as a proper person to recommend it to 'the Theatre, if it deserved it; who returned it with 'very great commendation; but with his opinion, 'that on the stage it would not meet with its de- 'served success. But though the performance was 'denied the Theatre, it brought its author on the 'public stage of life. For persons in power in- 'quiring soon after of the Head of his College for 'a youth of parts, Addison was recommended, and 'readily received, by means of the great reputa- 'tion which Dryden had just then spread of him 'above.'

'above.' In the concluſion of the character, Dr. Young carries his praiſes of Mr. Addiſon very high. 'He has, ſays the Doctor, a more refined, 'decent, judicious, and extenſive genius, than 'Pope or Swift. To diſtinguiſh this triumvirate from 'each other, and, like Newton, to diſcover the 'different colours in theſe genuine and meridian 'rays of literary light, Swift is a ſingular wit, 'Pope a correct poet, Addiſon a great author. 'Swift looked on wit as the jus divinum to domi-'nion and ſway in the world; and conſidered as 'uſurpation, all power that was lodged in perſons 'of leſs ſparkling underſtandings. This inclined 'him to tyranny in wit. Pope was ſomewhat of 'his opinion, but was for ſoftening tyranny into 'lawful monarchy; yet were there ſome acts of 'ſeverity in his reign. Addiſon's crown was elec-'tive, he reigned by the public voice:

'——————— volentes
'Per populos dat jura, viamque affectat Olympo.
VIRG.

'But as good books are the medicine of the 'mind, if we ſhould dethrone theſe authors, and 'conſider them, not in their royal, but their me-'dicinal capacity, might it not then be ſaid, that 'Addiſon preſcribed a wholeſome and pleaſant re-'gimen, which was univerſally reliſhed, and did 'much good; that Pope preferred a purgative of 'ſatire, which, though wholeſome, was too pain-'ful in its operation; and that Swift inſiſted on a 'large doſe of ipecacuanha, which, though rea-'dily ſwallowed from the fame of the phyſician, 'yet, if the patient had any delicacy of taſte, he 'threw up the remedy, inſtead of the diſeaſe?

'Addiſon wrote little in verſe, much in ſweet, 'elegant, Virgilian proſe; ſo let me call it, ſince 'Longinus calls Herodotus moſt Homeric; and 'Thucydides is ſaid to have formed his ſtyle on 'Pindar. Addiſon's compoſitions are built with 'the fineſt materials, in the taſte of the ancients; 'and (to ſpeak his own language) on truly claſſic 'ground: and though they are the delight of the 'preſent age, yet I am perſuaded that they will 'receive more juſtice from poſterity. I never read 'him, but I am ſtruck with ſuch a diſheartening 'idea of perfection, that I drop my pen. And, 'indeed, far ſuperior writers ſhould forget his 'compoſitions, if they would be greatly pleaſed 'with their own.

'And yet (perhaps you have not obſerved it), 'what is the common language of the world, and 'even of his admirers, concerning him? They 'call him an elegant Writer. That elegance which 'ſhines on the ſurface of his compoſitions, ſeems 'to dazzle their underſtanding, and renders it a 'little blind to the depth of ſentiment, which lies 'beneath: thus (hard fate!) he loſes reputation 'with them, by doubling his title to it. On ſub-'jects the moſt intereſting and important, no Au-'thor of his age has written with greater, I had 'almoſt ſaid, with equal weight: and they who 'commend him for his elegance, pay him ſuch 'a ſort of compliment, as they would pay to 'Lucretia, if they ſhould commend her only for 'her beauty (127).'

We are particularly pleaſed with the juſtice here done to Mr. Addiſon, as having a merit ſuperior to that of a merely elegant writer. His works have been ſingularly uſeful in ridiculing folly, and expoſing vice; in promoting good ſenſe, propriety of manners, and virtuous conduct. Few Authors can be mentioned, in our language, who have done, in theſe reſpects, ſuch eminent ſervices to their country. We ſhall cloſe the encomiums upon Mr. Addiſon, with two paſſages from Mr. Melmoth, in his Fitzoſborne's Letters. This ingenious and polite Writer, treating on metaphors, obſerves; 'Were I to point out the beauty and efficacy of 'metaphorical language, by particular inſtances, 'I ſhould rather draw my examples from the mo-'derns than the ancients; the latter being ſcarcely, 'I think, ſo exact and delicate in this article of 'compoſition as the former. The great improve-'ments, indeed, in natural knowledge, which have 'been made in theſe later ages, have opened a 'vein of metaphor entirely unknown to the an-'cients, and inriched the fancy of modern wits 'with a new ſtock of the moſt pleaſing ideas. A 'circumſtance which muſt give them a very conſi-'derable advantage over the Greeks and Romans. 'I am ſure at leaſt, of all the writings with which 'I have been converſant, the works of Mr. Addi-'ſon will afford the moſt abundant ſupply of this 'kind, in all its variety and perfection. Truth 'and beauty of imagery is, indeed, his character-'iſtical diſtinction; and the principal point of 'eminence which raiſes his ſtyle above that of every 'Author in any language that has fallen within my 'notice. He is every where highly figurative; 'yet, at the ſame time, he is the moſt eaſy and 'perſpicuous Writer I have ever peruſed. The 'reaſon is, his images are always taken from the 'moſt natural and familiar appearances; as they 'are choſen with the utmoſt delicacy and judgment. 'Suffer me only to mention one out of a thouſand I 'could name, as it appears to me the fineſt and moſt 'expreſſive that ever language conveyed. It is in 'one of his inimitable papers upon Paradiſe Loſt, 'where he is taking notice of thoſe changes in 'nature, which the Author of that truly divine 'poem deſcribes as immediately ſucceeding the 'Fall. Among other prodigies, Milton repreſents 'the Sun in an eclipſe; and at the ſame time, a 'bright cloud in the weſtern regions of the Hea-'vens, deſcending with a band of Angels. Mr. 'Addiſon, in order to ſhew his Author's art and 'judgment in the conduct and diſpoſition of this 'ſublime ſcenery, obſerves, 'The whole Theatre 'of nature is darkened, that this glorious machine 'may appear in all its luſtre and magnificence." 'I know not, Orontes, whether you will agree in 'ſentiment with me, but I muſt confeſs I am at a 'loſs which to admire moſt on this occaſion, the 'Poet or the Critic (128).'

The ſame Gentleman, in a letter upon grace in writing, concludes in the following terms: 'I 'know not whether Sir William Temple may not 'be conſidered as the firſt of our proſe authors, 'who introduced a graceful manner into our lan-'guage; at leaſt that quality does not ſeem to have 'appeared early, or ſpread far amongſt us. But 'whereſoever we may look for its origin, it is cer-'tain to be found in its higheſt perfection in the 'eſſays of a gentleman, whoſe writings will be 'diſtinguiſhed ſo long as politeneſs and good ſenſe 'have any admirers. That becoming air which 'Tully eſteemed the criterion of fine compoſition; 'and which every reader, he ſays, imagines ſo eaſy 'to be imitated, yet will find ſo difficult to attain; 'is the prevailing characteriſtic of all that excellent 'Author's moſt elegant performances. In a word, 'one may juſtly apply to him what Plato, in his 'allegorical language, ſays of Ariſtophanes, that 'the Graces having ſearched all the world for a 'temple wherein they might for ever dwell, ſettled 'at laſt in the breaſt of Mr. Addiſon (129).'

There are none of his works in which his merit, as a graceful writer, more diſtinguiſhingly appears, than in his humorous pieces. His humour is ſo natural, ſo eaſy, ſo unaffected, that we never grow weary of it; and we ſhall find, upon a diligent examination of his papers of this kind, that it is prodigiouſly various and extenſive. He ſcarcely ever deſcends to perſonal ſatire; and his ridicule of certain characters in life, while it is remarkably ſtriking, is ſo gentle, that perſons who anſwer to the characters muſt read him with pleaſure. A Wit which was ſo copious and inexhauſtible, without treſpaſſing againſt good-nature, or offending againſt decency, is entitled to the higheſt admiration and applauſe. K.

(g) near St. Alban's in Hertfordshire. His father having left his family, and taken the habit in the monastery of St. Alban's, young Nicolas was reduced to the necessity of frequenting that house, and submitting to the lowest offices, for his daily support. After some time he desired to take the habit in that monastery; but being rejected by the Abbot Richard [A], he resolved to try his fortune in another country (b). Accordingly he left England, and went to Paris; where, though poor and destitute, he applied himself with great diligence to his studies, and laid in a wonderful stock of learning (i). But having still a strong propensity to a religious life, he quitted Paris, and went into Provence, where he became a regular Clerc in the monastery of St. Rufus [B]. Here he made such a progress in literature, and distinguished himself so remarkably for his piety, and strict observance of the monastic discipline, that, upon the death of the Abbot, he was unanimously chosen superior of that house (k); and we are told (l), that he repaired, or rather rebuilt, that convent. He did not long enjoy this abbacy: for the Monks, growing weary of the government of a foreigner, accused him of certain pretended crimes before Pope Eugenius III.; who, having examined the matter of their complaint, and heard Nicolas's prudent and modest defence of himself, declared him innocent. However, his Holiness, being sensible of our Abbot's great merit, and thinking he might be more serviceable to the Church in a higher station, gave the monks leave to choose another Head [C], and created Nicolas Cardinal-Bishop of Alba, in 1146 (m). In the year 1148, Pope Eugenius sent him into Denmark and Norway, in quality of Apostolical Legate; where, by his diligent preaching and instructions, he converted those barbarous nations to the Christian faith (n). It is said, he erected the church of Upsal into an Archiepiscopal See (o). The time of his legation being expired, he returned to Rome, and was received with great marks of honour by the Pope and Cardinals. And not many days after his return, Pope Anastasius, who succeeded Eugenius, being dead (p), our Bishop of Alba was unanimously advanced to the Papal Chair in November 1154, and took the name of ADRIAN (q). The news of this promotion reaching England, King Henry II. sent Robert Abbot of St. Alban's, and three Bishops, to Rome, to congratulate the new Pope on his election [D]; upon which occasion Adrian granted very considerable privileges

[A] He was rejected by the Abbot Richard.] Matthew Paris informs us, that young Breakspear was refused admission into the monastery of St. Alban's for insufficiency, or want of learning. 'Qui cum 'examinatus & insufficiens inveniretur, dixit ei 'Abbas satis civiliter; Expecta, fili, & adhuc scho- 'lam exerce, ut aptior habearis (1). —— Who be- 'ing examined, and found insufficient, the Abbot, 'civilly enough, said to him,* Wait, my son, and go 'to school a little longer, till you are better qua-'lified.' Gulielmus Neubrigensis tells quite another story. 'Ille vero (says that author) adolescen-'tiam ingressus, cum propter inopiam scholis vacare 'non posset, idem monasterium quotidianæ stipis 'gratia frequentabat. Unde pater erubuit, verbis-'que mordacibus socordiam ejus increpitans, omni 'solatio destitutum cum gravi indignatione abegit '(2). —— Being now a youth, and unable, through 'poverty, to frequent the schools, he went daily to the 'monastery for his support. His father grew ashamed 'of this idle course of life; and perpetually chiding his 'son, in the severest terms, for his want of industry, 'obliged him to quit the monastery, destitute of all assist-'ance.' Leland has adopted the narrative of Matthew Paris (3): But Bale will have it, that he was rejected because he was a bastard (4). Pits assigns no reason for this repulse; but if the character he gives of young Breakspear be a true one, Abbot Richard deserves blame for rejecting a person, who would have done great honour to his house. 'Erat 'adolescens corpore pulcher, facie venustus, incessu 'compositus, ingenio acutus, lingua promptus, 'eloquio facundus, sermone cautus, judicio jam 'pene maturus, in actionibus prudens & dexter, 'moribus urbanus, comptus, elegans, zelo divinæ 'gloriæ, idque secundum quandam scientiam, plenus, 'omnibus denique tum corporis tum animi melioribus dotibus ita prædictus, ut in eo dona Dei naturam, pietas educationem, judicii maturitas & aliæ 'perfectiones superarent ætatem (5). —— He was a 'beautiful and graceful young man; witty and elo-'quent; circumspect in all his words and actions; 'courteous, neat, and elegant; full of zeal for the 'glory of God, and that according to some degree of 'knowledge; so possessed of the best endowments both of 'mind and body, that in him the gifts of heaven ex-'ceeded nature; his piety, his education; and the 'soundness of his judgment, and his other qualifications, 'the tenderness of his years.'

[B] He became a Regular Clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus.] He was not presently admitted to take the habit, but passed some time in recommending himself to the Monks by a diligent observance of all their commands. This obsequious behaviour, joined with the beauty of his person, and his prudent conversation, rendered him so acceptable to those religious, that after some time they intreated him to take the habit of the Canonical Order. *Est autem in illa regione Monasterium nobile Clericorum Regularium quod dicitur S. [D] The King sent an embassy to Rome, to congratulate the new Pope on his election.] The Ambassadors, according to Matthew Paris, were exposed to perils both by sea and land: for in their voyage they met with a violent storm, from which they narrowly escaped by invoking the assistance of St. Margaret; and after they were come ashore, they were several times in danger of robbers, before they arrived at Beneventum, where the Pope then was. His Holiness received them with great marks of respect; and when they had executed their commission, the three Bishops returned home, leaving Abbot Robert behind them (8). King Henry sent the Pope a letter by those Ambassadors, the purport of which is as follows: After some compliments upon his advancement, the King proceeded to express his good wishes, and how desirous he was, 'that this prelate might 'answer the expectations of his station.' And here, in terms of great deference and respect, he chalked out vileges to the monaſtery of St. Alban's [E]. The next year, King Henry having ſolicited the Pope's conſent that he might undertake the conqueſt of Ireland, Adrian readily complied, and ſent him a Bull for that purpoſe [F]. His indulgence to that Prince out a ſort of plan, together with ſome general directions for his Holineſs's conduct. He ſuggeſted to him, 'that ſince Providence had tranſplanted him, 'as it were, into paradiſe, it was expected he ſhould 'improve in proportion to the richneſs of the ſoil; 'and that, being raiſed to ſo high a ſtation, it was 'his duty to act vigorouſly for the intereſt of Chriſt-'endom, and ſo to govern the Churches of God, 'that all ſucceeding generations might eſteem him 'an honour to the country which gave him birth.' He proceeded to expreſs his hopes, 'that that tem-'peſtuous ſpirit which diſturbs the air, and often 'beats ſtrongeſt upon places of the higheſt ſituation, 'might never ſhake his Holineſs, or make the emi-'nence of his ſtation an occaſion of his greater 'ruin.' And 'ſince the ſuperintendency of the 'univerſal Church belonged to him,' he entreated him 'to proceed immediately to the promotion of 'ſuch Cardinals as were both able and willing to 'ſhare the burthen with him, and aſſiſt him in the 'government.' And here his Highneſs recommended to him 'to avoid being biaſſed by any ſecular 'regards in his choice; not to be ſwayed by the 'motives of relation, quality, or wealth; but to 'pitch upon ſuch men as feared God, and hated co-'vetouſneſs; ſuch as were remarkable for their in-'tegrity, and moſt zealous for the ſalvation of mens 'ſouls.' And, 'ſince the unworthineſs of the 'clergy is the greateſt diſſervice to the church,' he beſought his Holineſs, 'to be very careful in the 'diſpoſal of eccleſiaſtical preferments, that the pa-'trimony of our bleſſed Saviour might not be in-'vaded and miſapplied by any unqualified perſon.' From hence the King proceeded to mention the calamitous condition of the Holy Land, and how miſerably it was haraſſed by the incurſions of the Infidels; and deſired 'his Holineſs would apply his 'thoughts to find out ſome ſerviceable expedient 'for that part of Chriſtendom.' He put him in mind likewiſe of the declenſion of the Greek Empire, and expreſſed his hopes, 'that the univerſal 'Paſtor would extend his care in proportion to his 'juriſdiction, and that every part of the Chriſtian 'Church would ſhare the bleſſings of his govern-'ment; that ſince God had raiſed him to the top of 'ſpiritual grandeur, he would take care to ſhine 'forth in an exemplary conduct; that his govern-'ment would be ſo commendable and juſt, as to be-'come not only a general bleſſing in his lifetime, 'but that future ages might be the better for his 'memory, and his native country might congratu-'late her own happineſs in producing ſo glorious a 'prelate.' The King concluded his letter with deſiring his Holineſs's prayers for himſelf, his court, and his kingdom (9).

[E] Pope Adrian granted very conſiderable privileges to the monaſtery of St. Alban's.] It was obſerved in the laſt remark, that, after the diſcharge of the embaſſy, the three biſhops returned home, and abbot Robert ſtaid behind at Beneventum. It ſeems he thought this a favourable opportunity of recovering ſome dignities and privileges belonging to his abbey, which had been invaded by the Biſhop of Lincoln; and to this end he had brought with him ſeveral valuable preſents for his Holineſs; and among the reſt three rich mitres, and ſome ſandals, the workmanſhip of Chriſtina Prioreſs of Markgate. In a conference he had with the pope, his Holineſs would only accept of the mitres and ſandals on account of their excellent workmanſhip, but refuſed the other preſents, ſaying in a jeſting way; I will not accept your gifts, becauſe, when I deſired to take the habit in your monaſtery, you rejected me. Sir, ſaid the Abbot, we could by no means receive you, it being repugnant to the will of God, whoſe Providence reſerved you for greater things. The Pope replied, I thank you for this polite and obliging anſwer; and added, Deareſt Abbot, aſk boldly whatever you deſire; I ſhall always be ready to ſerve St. Alban, who am myſelf his diſciple (*). 'Devotionem et urbanitatem 'ipſius commendavit, et jocoſe ait, Abnuo recipere 'munera tua, quia me aliquando ad alas religionis 'domus tuæ confugientem, et habitum monaſticum cha-'ritative poſtulantem, recipere renuiſti. Cui Abbas; 'Domine, vos nequaquam potuimus recipere, voluntas 'enim Domini repugnavit, cujus prudentia vitam 'veſtram direxit ad altiora. Et reſpondit Dominus 'Papa; Eleganter et civiliter reſpondiſti, et com-'placuit ei reſponſionis verbum; et addidit, Abbas 'chariſſime, audacter pete quod vis, non poterit beato 'Albano deeſſe ſuus Albanenſis (10).' The Abbot hereupon diſtributed the reſt of his preſents among the Cardinals and the Pope's domeſtics, 'knowing '(ſays my author) the inſatiable avarice of the Ro-'mans.' Sciens ipſos Romanos eſſe inſatiabiles ſanguiſſugæ filios, pecuniæ ſitibundos. One day, as he was in private converſation with the Pope, he let fall ſome hints concerning the various oppreſſions of the Biſhop of Lincoln, mingling his complaints with tears and ſighs; which ſo moved his Holineſs, that he granted to the church of St. Alban's the noble and ſingular privilege of being exempt from all epiſcopal juriſdiction, excepting that of the ſee of Rome; with many other valuable liberties and immunities (11). Soon after abbot Robert's return, he diſpatched two meſſengers to Rome with a pair of golden candleſticks, which he had promiſed the Pope when he was at Beneventum. Adrian received them very graciouſly, and depoſited them in St. Peter's church, in perpetual memory of the Engliſh Protomartyr St. Alban. And in return for this preſent, his Holineſs ſent by the ſame meſſengers to the church of St. Alban's the relics of the Thebæan Legion, a fine pall given him by the Emperor, ſome ſandals, a ring, and other donations to a conſiderable value (12).

[F] He ſent King Henry a bull for the conqueſt of Ireland.] That inſtrument is extant in Matthew Paris (13), Giraldus Cambrenſis (14), Radulphus de Diceto (15), and in Rymer's Fœdera (16). To ſatisfy the curioſity of the mere Engliſh reader, I ſhall here give a tranſlation of it: Adrian, Biſhop, ſervant of the ſervants of God, to his moſt dear ſon in Chriſt, the illuſtrious King of England, ſends greeting and apoſtolical benediction. Your Magnificence is very careful to ſpread your glorious name in the world, and to merit an immortal crown in heaven, whilſt, as a good catholic Prince, you form a deſign of extending the bounds of the Church, of inſtructing ignorant and barbarous people in the Chriſtian Faith, and of reforming the licentious and immoral; and, the more effectually to put this deſign in execution, you deſire the advice and aſſiſtance of the holy ſee. We are confident that, by the bleſſing of God, the ſucceſs will anſwer the wiſdom and diſcretion of the undertaking. You have adverti ſed us, dear Son, of your intended expedition into Ireland, to reduce that people to the obedience of the Chriſtian Faith; and that you are willing to pay for every houſe a yearly acknowledgment of one penny to St. Peter, promiſing to maintain the rights of thoſe churches in the fulleſt manner. We therefore, being willing to aſſiſt you in this pious and laudable deſign, and conſenting to your petition, do grant you full liberty to make a deſcent upon that iſland, in order to enlarge the borders of the Church, to check the progreſs of immorality, and to promote the ſpiritual happineſs of the natives. And we command the people of that country to receive and acknowledge you as their ſovereign lord; provided the rights of the churches be inviolably preſerved, and the Peter-pence duly paid. For indeed it is certain (and your Highneſs acknowledges it) that all the iſlands, which are enlightened by Chriſt the Sun of righteouſneſs, and have embraced the doctrines of Chriſtianity, are unqueſtionably St. Peter's right, and belong to the juriſdiction of the holy Roman Church. If therefore you reſolve to put your deſigns in execution, be careful to reform the manners of that people, and commit the government of the churches to able and virtuous perſons: that the Chriſtian Religion may grow and flouriſh, and the honour of God and the ſalvation of ſouls be effectually promoted: ſo ſhall you deſerve an everlaſting reward in heaven, and leave a glorious name to all poſterity. We may obſerve from the contents of this Bull, how far the Popes of that age ſtretched their pretenſions with reſpect to the dominions of princes. For here we ſee Adrian very freely preſenting King Henry with Prince was so great, that he even consented to absolve him from the oath he had taken not to set aside any part of his father's will [G]. This Pontiff was soon made sensible of the cares and disquietudes attending so high a station; and he made warm complaints thereof to his countryman Johannes Sarisburiensis [H]. The rest of his life and actions, having no connexion with the civil or ecclesiastical history of Great Britain, shall be briefly thrown together in a note [I]. He died [K], September 1, 1159, in the fourth year and tenth month of his Pontificate, and was buried in St. Peter's church, near the tomb of his predecessor Eugenius (r). The learned Editor of Camden's Britannia tells us (s), Adrian had been Rector of Tydd in Lincolnshire; and Dr. Cave informs us (t), that he left his mother to be maintained by the alms of the church of Canterbury. There are extant several letters written by Pope Adrian (u), and some homilies (w). [L].

with the crowns of the Irish Kings, and commanding their subjects to transfer their allegiance from their lawful sovereigns to a foreign invader. However King Henry, though encouraged by the Pope's Bull, postponed the Irish expedition, and made no attempts upon that island till about fourteen years after.

[G] He absolved King Henry from the oath he had taken not to set aside any part of his father's will.] The case was this: Geoffrey Plantagenet, late earl of Anjou, had issue, by the empress Maud, three sons, Henry, Geoffrey, and William. This prince, being sensible that his own dominions would of course descend to his eldest son Henry, and that the kingdom of England, and the dutchy of Normandy, would likewise fall to him in right of his mother, thought fit to devise the earldom of Anjou to his second son Geoffrey. And, to make this settlement the more firm, he took an oath of the bishops and nobility, not to suffer his corpse to be buried till his son Henry had sworn to fulfil every part of his will. The Earl being dead, Henry came to attend his father's funeral. But when the oath was tendered to him, he refused for some time to swear to a writing, the contents of which he was not pre-acquainted with. However, being pressed with the scandal of letting his father lie unburied, he took the oath, though with great reluctance. After the funeral, the will was broken open and read; and though the contents displeased Henry, he concealed his resentments for the present. But after his accession to the throne, upon his complaint to Pope Adrian that the oath was forced upon him, he received a dispensation from his Holiness, absolving him from the obligation he had laid himself under (17). The author, cited in the margin, would fain justify the King and the Pope in this affair, upon that loose maxim, that oaths extorted are not obligatory. Et quoniam extorta sacramenta vel vota non obligant, nisi forte ex subsequenti consensu convalescant, facile (ut dicitur) ab illo sacramento absolutionem impetravit (18). But if King Henry's oath was void of course, as this writer supposes, what occasion was there for the Pope's dispensation? And if it remained in full force, it is hard to imagine which way the Pope could release it. Had the matter of the oath been unlawful, there would have been some sense in the absolution from it. But, in promising not to alter the disposition of his father's will, Henry only run the risque of suffering in his right, and swore to nothing but what was in his power to make good. This instance alone is sufficient to shew that Adrian was none of the safest guides in matters of conscience. It may be proper to tell the reader, that, in consequence of this dispensation, Henry dispossessed his brother Geoffrey of the dominions of Anjou, allowing him only a yearly pension for his maintenance.

[H] He made warm complaints to Johannes Sarisburiensis.] Baronius informs us (19), that, in the very first year of Adrian's reign, his countryman, and old friend, Johannes Sarisburiensis, or John of Salisbury, afterwards bishop of Chartres, paid him a visit; and that his Holiness complained to him in the strongest terms of the uneasiness of his station. He assured him, 'That all the former hardships of 'his life were mere amusement to the misfortunes of 'the popedom; that he looked upon St. Peter's chair 'to be the most uneasy seat in the world, and that his 'crown seemed to be clapped burning on his head.'

(19) Annal. T. xii. an. 1154.

[I] The rest of his life and actions shall be briefly thrown together.] In the beginning of his pontificate, he boldly withstood the attempts of the Roman people to recover their ancient liberty under the consuls, and obliged those magistrates to abdicate their authority, and leave the government of the city to the Pope. In 1155, he drove the heretic Arnold of Bresse, and his followers, out of Rome. The same year, he excommunicated William King of Sicily, who ravaged the territories of the church, and absolved that prince's subjects from their allegiance. About the same time, Frederick King of the Romans having entered Italy with a powerful army, Adrian met him near Sutrium, and concluded a peace with him. At this interview, Frederick condescended to hold the Pope's stirrup whilst he mounted on horseback: After which his Holiness conducted that Prince to Rome, and in St. Peter's church placed the imperial crown on his head, to the great mortification of the Roman people, who assembled in a tumultuous manner, and killed several of the Imperialists. The next year, a reconciliation was brought about between the Pope and the Sicilian King, that Prince taking an oath to do nothing farther to the prejudice of the Church, and Adrian granting him the title of King of the Two Sicilies. This Pope built and fortified several castles, and left the papal dominions in a more powerful and flourishing condition than he found them (20). [Vertot, in his history of Malta, gives an account of some disputes between the patriarch of Jerusalem, and the Knights Hospitallers, which were laid before Adrian.]

(20) Vide Platina, de vit. Pontif. in Hadriano IV.

[K] His death.] Gulielmus Neubrigensis says nothing of the manner of Pope Adrian's death; but Matthew Paris tells us (21), he was poisoned out of spite by the Romans, because he had refused to consecrate a citizen's son a bishop, who was unworthy of that station. Post hos autem paucos dies, idem Papa Adrianus, quia cujusdam potentis civis Romani filium indignum, in episcopum, timore repressus divino, creare & consecrare noluit, preventus insidiis, potionatus, veneno infectus, & interfectus est. We have another account of his death in Bale, who tells us, upon the authority of Joannes Funcius, that Pope Adrian being one day walking with his attendants, a fly got into his throat; and the surgeons not being able to extract it, he was suffocated (22). Fuller tells the same story with a small variation. 'As he was 'drinking (says that author) he was choaked with a 'fly, which, in the large territory of St. Peter, 'had no place but his throat to get into; but 'since a fly stopped his breath, fear shall stop my 'mouth, not to make uncharitable conclusions from 'such casualties (23).' It is remarkable, that Platina is silent as to the manner of Pope Adrian's death; which surely he would not have been, had it really been attended with such extraordinary circumstances. And what shall we say to the silence of the learned Antiquarian Leland in this matter, but that he gave no credit to the reports concerning the manner of our Pontiff's death?

[L] And some homilies.] [There is a very good account of the transactions and policy of Pope Adrian and of Henry the Second, with regard to the Bull for the Conquest of Ireland, in Dr. Leland's history of that country (24.) The same may be said of Lord Lyttelton's relation of the same event; who after reciting the Pope's Bull, makes the following judicious reflections:

(24) Leland's History of Ireland, Vol. i. p. 4—10.

'When Henry acknowledged that Ireland and all 'other islands, which had received the doctrines of the 'Christian faith, belonged of right to the jurisdiction 'of St. Peter, and the most holy Roman church, he 'certainly meant a spiritual jurisdiction; for other-'wise this concession would have given to the Pope

'the temporal ſovereignty of England, as well as 'of Ireland. But yet the purport of the Bull, by 'which his Holineſs in effect diſpoſed of that iſland, 'ſeemed to imply that the property, or ſupreme 'dominion, was in him: and it appears from the 'words of John of Saliſbury himſelf, whom Henry 'employed in this buſineſs, that this pretenſion was 'founded on the forged donation of Conſtantine to 'Pope Sylveſter the Second. Moreover Giraldus 'Cambrenſis, in reckoning up the claims which 'Henry had to Ireland, mentions this grant of 'Adrian, and the confirmation of it by the autho-'rity of Pope Alexander the Second, as ſufficient to 'anſwer all objections, or cavils, againſt the pre-'tenſions of that prince; the ſupreme pontiffs (as he 'ſays) aſſerting to themſelves the ſovereignty of all 'iſlands, by a ſpecial right. He means by the do-'nation of Conſtantine above mentioned. So ex-'travagant were the ideas of the clergy in that age 'concerning the rights of the Roman pontificate! 'and this ought to have made the temporal powers 'more careful in their tranſactions with Rome, to 'do nothing which might countenance thoſe mon-'ſtrous claims. It plainly appears by this bull, 'that Pope Adrian conſidered the payment of a 'penny from every houſe in Ireland, which had 'been offered by Henry as a moſt indiſpenſable 'condition of the ſanction he gave to this unjuſt 'undertaking, which was really ſelling the inde-'pendence and liberty of the Iriſh for ſo much pro-'fit to himſelf and the apoſtolical ſee. But he had 'a further view in ſo ſtrongly inſiſting thereupon. 'For, though peter-pence, in its firſt inſtitution by 'King Offa, was only eleemoſynary, for the ſuſ-'tenance of poor Engliſh ſtudents at Rome; yet 'the Popes had long deſired, that it ſhould be un-'derſtood as a tribute, by which their ſovereignty 'was acknowledged. And the granting it from 'Ireland, where no ancient uſage had eſtabliſhed 'ſuch a gift, looked like a confeſſion of that pre-'tended right on the part of King Henry. The 'ring alſo which that prince received from Adrian, 'as a mark of inveſtiture, gave an appearance of 'his holding the dominion of Ireland from and un-'der the Pope; though it is certain he owned no 'ſuch dependence.

'Upon the whole, therefore, this bull, like 'many before and many ſince, was the mere effect 'of a league between the papal and regal powers, 'to abet and to aſſiſt each other's uſurpations: nor 'is it eaſy to ſay whether more diſturbance to the 'world and more iniquity have ariſen from their 'acting conjointly, or from the oppoſition which 'the former has made to the latter! In this in-'ſtance the beſt, or indeed the ſole excuſe, for the 'proceedings of either, was the ſavage ſtate of the 'Iriſh, to whom it might prove beneficial to be 'conquered, and broken thereby to the ſalutary 'diſcipline of civil order and good laws (25)."

His Lordſhip's ſole excuſe might well have been ſpared; ſince, were any ſuch excuſe ever to be admitted, it would furniſh a pretence for endleſs injuſtice and oppreſſion.

The writers of the Modern Univerſal Hiſtory have given from John Aventinus, part of a letter written by Adrian to the Emperor Frederic, about the year 1157, which diſplays, in a moſt ſtriking light, the inſolence of this Pope, with reſpect to the pretended papal juriſdiction over princes. 'The Roman Em-'pire was tranſlated from the Greeks to the Ger-'mans; but the King of the Teutones was not call-'ed Emperor, before he was crowned by the 'Apoſtolic Power. Before his conſecration he was 'King, after it he became Emperor. Of whom 'then, but us, does he hold the empire? From the 'election of his own princes he enjoys the name of 'King; from our conſecration he derives the ap-'pellation of Emperor Auguſtus and Cæſar; there-'fore through us he governs. Recollect what hath 'happened of old. Zacharias promoted Charles to 'the Imperial dignity, and gave him the name of 'Great; and decreed, that the King of the Ger-'mans ſhould thenceforward and for ever be Em-'peror, and Champion of the Apoſtolic Chair; 'that he might reduce Apulia to the dominion of 'the Biſhop of Rome, to whom (as well as the 'city itſelf) it formerly belonged; whereas the 'Emperor's is at Aix, in the foreſt of Ardenne. 'Whatever he hath as Emperor, he hath from us; 'for, as Zacharias transferred the Empire from the 'Greeks to the Germans, ſo can we transfer it from 'the Germans to the Greeks. It is in our power to 'beſtow it upon whom we will. Beſides, we are 'appointed by God to rule over kingdoms, and 'nations, that we may deſtroy, pluck up, build, 'plant,' &c. (26).] B.

ADRIAN (DE CASTELLO), Biſhop of Bath and Wells in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII. and Cardinal-Prieſt of the Roman Church, was deſcended from a mean and obſcure family called by the name of the Caſtelli, and born at Cornetto (a), a ſmall town in Tuſcany (b). Having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his parts and learning, he obtained ſeveral employments at the court of Rome. In 1488, he was ſent by Pope Innocent VIII. in quality of his Nuncio extraordinary, to appeaſe the troubles in Scotland: but, upon his arrival in England, being informed that his preſence was no longer neceſſary in that kingdom, where the commotions had been ended by a deciſive battle, he ſet himſelf to execute ſome other commiſſions, with which he was charged, particularly that of collecting the Pope's tribute or Peter-pence, his Holineſs having appointed him his Quæſtor or Treaſurer for that purpoſe. He ſtayed ſome months in England, and, during that time, had the addreſs to inſinuate himſelf into the good graces of Morton, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who recommended him ſo effectually to the King, that his Majeſty thought fit to employ him as his agent for the Engliſh affairs at the court of Rome; and, as a recompence of his faithful ſervices, promoted him firſt to the Biſhopric of Hereford, and afterwards to that of Bath and Wells (c). The Pope's bull, in virtue of which he was collated to the ſee of Hereford, is dated Auguſt the ſecond, 1504. He received the temporalities of Bath and Wells at Rome, in conſequence of the King's letters, dated October the thirteenth, the ſame year: on the twentieth, he received the ſpiritualities from the Archbiſhop by his Proctors; and the ſame day was enthroned at Wells by his proxy, who was the celebrated hiſtorian Polydore Vergil, at that time the Pope's ſub-collector in England, and afterwards appointed, by Adrian, Archdeacon of Wells. Our Prelate let out his biſhopric to Farmers, and afterwards to Cardinal Wolſey, himſelf reſiding at Rome (d); where he built a magnificent palace, on the frontiſpiece of which he cauſed to be inſcribed the name of his benefactor Henry VII. leaving it, after his deceaſe, to that Prince, and to the Kings of England his ſucceſſors. In the mean time, Alexander VI. who ſucceeded Innocent VIII. had appointed our Adrian his principal Secretary, and Vicar-General in ſpirituals and temporals; and, as a farther mark of eſteem and confidence, created him a Cardinal-Prieſt, with the title of St. Chryſogonus, the thirty firſt of May 1503 (e). months after his creation, he narrowly escaped losing his life by poison [A], at a feast, to which he was invited, with some other Cardinals, by the Pope and his son Cæsar Borgia (f). Under the pontificate of Julius II. who succeeded Alexander, Cardinal Adrian, having taken some disgust, or because he distrusted that Pope, who was a declared enemy of his predecessor, voluntarily banished himself from Rome [B], and did not return till the holding of a conclave for the election of a new Pope; into which, though it was already shut, he was admitted, by consent of the sacred college, and probably gave his voice for the election of Leo X (g). Soon after, he was unhappily privy to a conspiracy against that Pontiff [C], into which he was the more easily led, by too fondly crediting the prediction of a Cunning-woman, or Fortune-teller, who had assured him, 'That Leo would be cut off by an unnatural death, and that he would be succeeded 'by an elderly man named Adrian, of obscure birth, but famous for his learning, and 'whose virtue and merit alone had raised him to the highest honours of the Church.' This prophecy, which our Cardinal foolishly and rashly applied to himself, was exactly verified in the election of Adrian VI. who succeeded Leo X. The conspiracy being discovered [D], Cardinal Adrian was condemned to pay twelve thousand five hundred ducats, and to give a solemn promise that he would not stir out of Rome. But, whether he was unable to discharge so heavy a fine, or apprehended farther severities, he withdrew privately from that city: whereupon, in a consistory held the sixth of July 1518, he was declared excommunicated, and deprived, not only of the cardinalate and all his benefices, but even of his ecclesiastical orders (b). Near four years before this time, he had been removed from his office of the Pope's Collector in England, at the request of King Henry VIII. and through the instigation of Cardinal Wolsey [E]. [A] He narrowly escaped losing his life by poison.] Pope Alexander having invited some of the most distinguished members of the sacred college to a sumptuous entertainment; his son Cæsar Borgia resolved to take this opportunity to remove out of the way such of the guests, whose grandeur and riches he chiefly envied; and to this purpose he prepared some poisoned wine: but the Cup-bearer, providentially mistaking one flaggon for another, administered the poisoned liquor to the wicked contriver of this black design, who drank it off without suspecting the mistake (1). For the particulars and consequences of this horrid attempt, which cost the Pope himself his life, the reader is referred to the historians who have written the lives of Alexander VI. and his son Cæsar Borgia. As to what concerns Cardinal Adrian, who was present at this fatal banquet, and one of the destined victims of Borgia's inhuman malice, M. Aubery informs us (2), that having inadvertently tasted the poisoned wine, he was seized with most excruciating pains in his bowels, which brought on frequent convulsions, and afterwards a kind of lethargy; that he was obliged, for some ease and refreshment, to roll himself quite naked in cold water poured on the floor of his chamber; that he escaped indeed with life, but not without casting his skin, which, through the violence of the poison, peeled off from all parts of his body.

(2) Ibid.

[B] He voluntarily banished himself from Rome.] This circumstance of the Cardinal's life, M. Aubery tells us (3), is not agreeable to the opinion of Raphael de Volaterra, who (4) extols his great skill and address, in constantly supporting the credit and reputation he had acquired at the court of Rome, and in always finding the means happily to extricate himself from the most dangerous conjunctures, and such as had proved fatal to others. But the express testimony of Paris de Grassi, master of the ceremonies, and what Guichardin remarks (5) of the King of France, who ordered Cardinal Adrian's name to be inserted, as having been one of those who had convened the synod of Pisa, prove plainly enough, that he met with no better treatment under the pontificate of Julius II. than the other favourites of Alexander VI. and that he had some occasions given him of discontent, or at least that he did not think himself safe under the power of the new Pope. My author says farther, that his Holiness, not knowing to what he should ascribe the Cardinal's extreme fear and voluntary exile, began to imagine, that it might be owing to remorse of conscience for having made some attempt upon his authority or his life.

[C] He was unhappily privy to a conspiracy against Pope Leo X.] I call it a Conspiracy, after M. Aubery, who informs us, that Cardinal Petrucci was the chief of the conspirators, and Adrian one of those to whom he imparted the secret of his wicked designs, and whose indiscrete or malicious silence rendered them accomplices of his guilt (6). But, according to Polydore Vergil, this conspiracy was nothing more than the intemperate rage of an angry Cardinal, who was a perfect master of the Roman freedom of speech (7). The affair, as that historian relates it (8), was briefly this: The Pope had taken under his protection the inhabitants of Sienna, and deprived Cardinal Alfonso Petrucci, and his family, of the principality they had long enjoyed there, in order, as his Holiness declared, entirely to root out the seeds of faction with which that city was disturbed. This proceeding highly incensed the Cardinal against the Pope, whom he charged with ingratitude, in thus repaying the assistance he had lent him, in bringing about his election: he complained openly of the injury done him, publickly expressed his detestation of that Pontiff, and imprecated a thousand deaths on him. He happened once to vent his rage in the hearing of the Cardinals, Adrian, and Francis Volaterran, who reproved him severely, but did not think they had sufficient grounds for an information against him. However Petrucci, in the heat of his passion, went away from Rome, and soon after, upon an assurance of indemnity, returned; but still continued his resentment, and abusive language against the Pope; who was so exasperated thereby, that he ordered him to be apprehended, and thrown into prison, where soon after he died.

[D] The conspiracy being discovered.] Let us hear M. Aubery. His Holiness, he tells us (9), having caused the three principal conspirators to be arrested, learned from their depositions, that the Cardinals Soderini (10) and de Castello were their accomplices, having been present at very secret conferences with them. A consistory was thereupon held, in which those two Cardinals, after much reluctancy, especially on the part of the latter, were induced to make a public confession of their fault, and Adrian owned, he had heard Petrucci say, that he would kill the Pope, but that he paid no regard to what he said on account of his youth.

[E] He was removed from his office of the Pope's Collector at the request of King Henry VIII. and through the instigation of Cardinal Wolsey.] Wolsey, aiming at the dignity of a Cardinal, employed Adrian as his Solicitor at the court of Rome; but finding that he betrayed him, and did him ill offices, he made use of his interest with the King, to get him turned out of his post. There is extant in Mr. Rymer's Fœdera, &c. (11) a letter from Leo X. dated at Rome, October the thirty-first, 1514, in answer to one from King Henry to his Holiness. The Pope therein tells him, 'That he had condescended to 'remove the Cardinal from the office of Collector, 'for no other reason, but because the King had de- 'sired it; and that he would do even more for him, 'if it was not plain that he acted only at the instiga- 'tion of another, and not of his own accord.'

heads of his accuſation, drawn up at Rome, were; 'That he had abſented himſelf from 'that city in the time of Julius II. without the Pope's leave; that he had never reſided 'as he ought to have done, at the church of St. Chryſogonus, from which he had his 'title; that he had again withdrawn from Rome, and had not appeared to a legal 'citation; and that he had engaged in the conſpiracy of Cardinal Petrucci, and had 'ſigned the league of Francis Maria, Duke of Urbino, againſt the Pope (i).' He was at Venice when he received the diſagreeable news of his condemnation (k); but what became of him afterwards, or when and where he died, we know not, though it is pretended he took refuge ſomewhere in Aſia among the Turks (l). Cardinal Wolſey ſecured to himſelf the vacant See of Bath and Wells, which he had farmed of Adrian (m). There is to be ſeen, we are told (n), at Riva, a village in the dioceſe of Trent, a Latin inſcription on one Polydorus Caſamicus [F], the Pope's Janitor, written by Cardinal Adrian; at the end of which he deplores his own wretched condition, and exalts the happineſs of his friend, whoſe death had put an end to his miſeries. Polydore Vergil and M. Aubery give us a very advantageous idea of the manners and learning of this Prelate [G].

[G] An advantageous idea of the manners and learning of this Prelate.] Polydore Vergil highly extols him for his various and uncommon learning, his exquiſite judgment in the choice of the propereſt words, and the truly claſſical ſtyle of his writings, in which he was the firſt, ſince the age of Cicero, who revived the purity of the Latin language, and taught men to draw their knowledge from the ſources of the beſt and learnedeſt authors. Erant in eo plurimæ literæ, non vulgares, ſed reconditæ, ac ſummum bonorum verborum delectu judicium; qui memoria noſtra primus omnium, poſt illud diſertiſſimum Ciceronis ſeculum, ſuis ſcriptis mortales excitavit ad perfectas literas de doctiſſimorum autorum fontibus hauriendas, dotuitque modum purè, nitidè, ac luculenter loquendi, ſic ut, eo doctore, in præſentia ubique gentium Latinitas ab integro renaſcatur (11). He was of a gay and chearful diſpoſition; and, as if he would imitate Cicero in this point, as well as in purity of ſtyle, he took great pleaſure in rallying or bantering, of which we have the following inſtance. Diſputing one day about precedency with Cardinal Caruajal, who maintained, that, ſince he had been reſtored by the Pope to the Cardinalate, he ought to hold the ſame rank as if he had never been degraded from it; Adrian reſolved at laſt to give him place, but not without one ſtroke of raillery upon his antagoniſt, to whom he ſaid, making a low bow, Your moſt reverend lordſhip may go before me, if you pleaſe, ſince biſcuit (*) has always been preferred to common bread, reproaching him thereby with his former rebellion, and the diſgrace he was forced to undergo, before he could be promoted a ſecond time to the dignity of a Cardinal (12).

ÆLFRED, ALFRIDE, ALDFRID, or ELDFRID, was the illegitimate ſon of Oſwi, King of Northumberland. He was educated as became the ſon of a King, and, as Beda tells us, ſtudied amongſt the Scots, and acquired a great knowledge in the ſcriptures, and in all ſolid and uſeful learning (a). On his return into his father's kingdom, he behaved himſelf with great wiſdom and prudence, and it is particularly related of him, that he perſuaded his brother-in-law, Peada, the ſon of Penda, King of the Mercians, to renounce Heatheniſm, and to embrace the Chriſtian Religion. On the death of his father Oſwi, Egfrid, his brother, who ſucceeded in the throne, perſecuted him with implacable malice, merely becauſe he was a Prince of great parts, and there had been ſome talk of raiſing him to the throne. To avoid his fury, Ælfred retired into Ireland, though ſome ſay into Scotland, where, converſing only with the learned, he led a philoſophic kind of life; being diſtinguiſhed from other private men only by the virtues of the mind (b). Yet even here, his brother could not let him reſt, but moſt injuriouſly making war on thoſe who had given him refuge, was ſlain in battle (c). Hereupon the nobility of the kingdom of Northumberland unanimouſly invited Ælfred to take poſſeſſion of the vacant throne, which he accordingly did, in the year 686 [A]. He found the kingdom in great confuſion, and by his wiſdom and piety ſoon brought it into order; eaſed the people of the oppreſſive taxes his brother had laid upon them, and, by a ſtrict adminiſtration of juſtice, rendered them perfectly eaſy and happy. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning as much after he became King, as he had done before; for which reaſon, not only ſcholars flocked to his court, but even the learned in other countries paid tribute to his abilities, by dedicating their books to him; as did the famous Scottiſh Abbot Adamanus, and Adelmus, Biſhop of Sherburn (d). It is however admitted, that as he was no martial Prince, ſo his dominions were more

There is an article of him in a late edition of Moreri (1); and ſhall it be ſaid there are any more careful of the fame and credit of Engliſhmen, than we ourſelves are? It is true, this Prince was no King of England, he was King only of a very ſmall part of it. He did honour, however, to the whole, nay, and to Scotland and Ireland too; in the former country he was educated, in the latter he long reſided, and for his eminent virtues was admired and beloved in both. Some epiſtles to the learned men in both countries he left behind him, but it is not known whether they are ſtill preſerved or not. This however we know, that his learning, wiſdom, and piety, is celebrated by many of our ancient authors, as the margin will ſhew (2).

ſtraitened than they had been in the days of his anceſtors. He is cenſured for perſecuting Biſhop Wilfrid [B], in whoſe room he cauſed John, of Beverly, a man famous for piety and learning, to be conſecrated Biſhop of Hexham, in Northumberland, whom he afterwards exalted to the Archbiſhoprick of York. He governed with great reputation the kingdom of Northumberland nineteen years, and dying on the 24th of December, in the year 705 (e), was buried at Drifeld. He married Cyniburg, or, as ſome call her, Kenburg, the daughter of Penda, King of Mercia, by whom he had Oſrede, his ſon and ſucceſſor; but in nothing like his father, the remembrance of whoſe virtues induced the people to make this ſon of his King, though he was at that time a child of eight years old (f).

[B] Perſecuting Biſhop Wilfrid.] Moſt of our hiſtorians mention the differences between this Prince and Wilfridus, Archbiſhop of York, very conciſely; and thoſe who have written the life of this King, do it ſtill more obſcurely. The eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians, to whom it properly belongs, treat it, however, very copiouſly, and from them we ſhall give the reader a ſuccinct account of it. This Wilfridus, at the time of Alfred's acceſſion to the throne, was beyond the ſeas, expelled from his archiepiſcopal ſee of York, by the King's brother and predeceſſor. In the ſecond year of this Prince, which was 687, Wilfridus returned with mandatory letters from the Pope, for his reſtoration. With theſe the King in part complied, for he promoted John, of Beverly, who was then Biſhop of Hexham, to the Archbiſhoprick of York, and offered Wilfridus his Biſhoprick, which he accepted. There he ſat quietly five years; but, in 692, he was again expelled, not ſo much by the King's will, as on account of diſputes among the clergy. Upon this he went abroad again, applied himſelf a ſecond time to the Pope, and after thirteen years attendance, obtained a ſentence in his favour; whereupon he returned into England, after Alfred had been dead ſome years (3).

ÆLFRED, or ALFRED (the Great), by ſome alſo called Elfred, and by others Alured, was the youngeſt ſon of Æthelwolf, King of the Weſt Saxons: he was born at Wannating, or Wanading, which ſome take to be Wantage in Berkſhire, then a royal ſeat, A. D. 849 (a). His father, who was a very wiſe and religious Prince, believing that he ſaw in him a brighter and more promiſing genius than in his other children, ſent him, while yet an infant, that is, in the fifth year of his age, to Rome, where Pope Leo IV. adopted him, and anointed him (b), which ſome aſſert to have been a regal unction, though others think he was only confirmed (c) [A]. His father, in the decline of his life, going to viſit the Holy See, took this favourite ſon of his along with him, whereby he had an opportunity of ſeeing and hearing many things, which made ſuch ſtrong impreſſions on him, as were not to be worn out during his whole life (d). On his return to England, his parents were no leſs tender of him than before; yet this tenderneſs was not of much ſervice to Ælfred (e), ſince it eſtranged him from learning, and conſiſted too much in the indulging of idleneſs, and a purſuit of youthful pleaſures. On his father's death he had an appenage bequeathed to him by will; but his brothers, who ſucceeded in the throne, put him off with fair words, ſo that his poſſeſſions remained narrow enough. However, as he had a very grave phi-

[A] Though others think he was only confirmed.] There are many reaſons why the anointing Ælfred to be King, is ſcrupled (1). 1. He was his father's younger ſon; and had three, at leaſt, if not four, brethren between him and the crown. 2. He was but five years old, and therefore it is not likely that his father ſhould intend him for a Vice-King. 3. Such an unction could have no other conſequence, than that of making him obnoxious to his brethren. But notwithſtanding theſe exceptions, it ſeems pretty clear, that he was really anointed in order to inveſt him with a royal character. Many reaſons have been offered in ſupport of this opinion; but, for the ſake of cutting things as ſhort as poſſible, we will ſhew that the foregoing objections are not very cogent; and that there is indubitable authority on the other ſide. As to his diſtance from the throne, that is no objection at all, if the cuſtom of the times and his father's will be conſidered (2). From both which it appears, that great Princes made all their ſons Kings; and that this was what Æthelwolf both deſigned, and in part effected. With reſpect to the ſecond point, it is evident that a great part of Wales was conquered that year (3); and it is therefore very probable, his father intended, when he was of an age fit to govern, to make Ælfred King of Demetia, or South Wales (4), as he had before inveſted two of his other ſons with royal titles. The laſt objection really anſwers itſelf, for the fact fell out ſo. The brethren of Ælfred grew jealous of him, and defeated him not only of the kingdom which his father intended him, but likewiſe of the ſmall portion that Prince left him, after he had altered his former purpoſe (5). A multitude of authors ſpeak of Ælfred's journey to Rome, and of his unction; yet there are two whoſe teſtimonies in many reſpects ſeem preferable to the reſt. The firſt of theſe is Aſſer, Biſhop of Sherburn, who was intimate with King Ælfred; and who, in the memoirs he wrote of that Prince, and dedicated to himſelf, hath under the year 853, theſe words (6): The ſame year King Æthelwolf ſent his ſon Ælfred to Rome, attended by many of the nobility and perſons of lower rank. Leo IV. then poſſeſſed the Apoſtolic See, who anointed the ſaid infant Ælfred as a King, confirmed him, and adopted him as his own ſon. This author, therefore, plainly affirms he was both crowned and adopted. The other writer is Æthelred, a Monk of the royal family, who lived very near theſe times, who ſays, that after Leo had conſecrated him King, he, from that act, ſtiled him his ſon, as Biſhops, at the time of confirmation, are wont to call thoſe little ones their children (7). Robert, of Glouceſter (8), ſays expreſsly, that he was crowned King; and that he was the firſt of our Princes who was anointed, which is alſo aſſerted by Thomas Rudborne (9). In this, however, they ſeem to be miſtaken; for not only the Monk of Malmſbury (10), who was well acquainted with theſe things, aſſerts, that in 790, Offa, King of Mercia, cauſed his ſon Egfert to be anointed King in his life-time; but alſo Gildas (11), the moſt ancient of our hiſtorians, ſpeaks of unction as a thing common in his time amongſt the Britiſh Princes. Hence it is clear, that he was not the firſt of our Kings, nor even the firſt of our Saxon Kings conſecrated by unction. Sir Henry Spelman (12), after mentioning ſome of theſe authorities, concludes juſtly, that he was anointed King. But Alford (13), the Jeſuit, ſeems to be more in the right, who alledges, he was both anointed King, and confirmed by Pope Leo; and that, in reſpect to this ſecond ceremony, the Pope was his godfather.

loſophic ſpirit, and began now to think of recovering the time he had loſt in his non-age, he readily admitted theſe excuſes, and would willingly have been content with his books and his eaſe (f). But it was not long he enjoyed even theſe ſmall comforts. The Danes invading the kingdom, he was conſtrained to abandon a contemplative for an active life, ſerving his brethren both with his counſels and in perſon; till at length, they being all dead [B], he, in the two and twentieth year of his age, anno dom. 871, became King in his own right (g); which dignity, however, he aſſumed with much reluctancy, not only on account of his love to a retired life, but alſo becauſe he knew that a crown was a very heavy burthen, and that though it was adorned with jewels, yet it was at the ſame time lined with cares (h). He had ſcarcely leiſure to attend his brother's funeral, when he was forced to fight for the crown he had ſo unwillingly accepted. At Wilton he engaged the Daniſh army, and in the beginning of the battle had the advantage, but, in the purſuit, the Danes diſcovering his weakneſs, rallied, and drove him out of the field (i). We need not wonder at this, ſince, beſides their deficiency in numbers, the Saxons muſt have been exceſſively haraſſed, as there had been eight or nine battles that year (k). Soon after the engagement at Wilton, there followed a treaty. This, however, they obſerved but indifferently, roaming up and down, and pillaging wherever they came. At laſt they put an end to the kingdom of Mercia, and forced its monarch not only to leave his dominions, but the iſland (l). The next year after this, they acted in ſuch a manner as gave Ælfred to underſtand, that he had nothing to truſt to but arms: for this reaſon he took pains to fit out a fleet, which was to guard the coaſts, and keep theſe rovers from landing. Some effect this deſign of his produced, for a ſquadron of five Daniſh ſhips coming on the coaſt, one of them was taken (m). However, a great army of Danes, commanded by ſeveral of their Kings, marched as far as Grant-bridge, and quartered thereabouts the beſt part of the year, and the next ſummer they advanced to Werham: there King Ælfred met them with all the forces he could raiſe; but not finding himſelf ſtrong enough to fight them, he concluded a peace, not without the interpoſition of money, if ſome of our hiſtorians deſerve credit (n). However it was, a peace he made, and the Danes ſwore never to invade his dominions; but, according to their wonted cuſtom, broke their faith in a few months [C]. The next year, being 876, the barbarous Danes committed new and great hoſtilities, which compelled the King to march againſt them, with what forces

[B] Till at length, they being all dead.] It would have taken up too much room in the text, to have entered into the tranſactions of Ælfred in his non-age. However, as the knowledge of them is, in ſome meaſure, requiſite to the thorough underſtanding of ſeveral circumſtances of this article, we ſhall ſay as much as is neceſſary of them in this note. His father Æthelwolf, according to the beſt accounts we have, had five ſons and a daughter (14). Of theſe Æthelſtan the eldeſt, was King of Kent, in his father's life-time, and died before him. Æthelbald, the ſecond ſon, raiſed a rebellion againſt his father, when he came back from Rome; and that good-natured Prince, to avoid any effuſion of blood, conſented to divide with him his dominions (15). He did not long ſurvive this; but, before his death, he, by a full and diſtinct teſtament, endeavoured to ſettle all the claims of his children in ſuch a manner, as might prevent their diſturbing the public peace. By this will, Æthelbald and Æthelbert had his kingdoms divided between them: his private eſtate, he left to his younger ſons Æthelred and Ælfred, together with what money was found in his coffers (16). As for his daughter, ſhe married Burthred, King of Mercia, and being with her huſband expelled her country by the Danes, went into Italy; and, after his death, lived a nun at Padua. Æthelwolf deceaſed in 858, when Ælfred was but ten years old (17). Æthelbald ſucceeded him, and governed two years and a half. On his demiſe, Æthelbert ſeized the crown, which he held for five years, during which ſpace he was continually vexed by the Danes, againſt whom he fought with undaunted courage, though with unequal ſucceſs. He died in 866 (18), and was ſucceeded by his brother Æthelred, who having reaſon to be diſſatisfied with the King his brother's conduct, while he was a private man, ſolemnly promiſed his younger brother Ælfred, he would do him that juſtice which had been denied by the two former Kings, in giving him what his father had by will bequeathed him. On his acceſſion, Ælfred demanded a performance of his promiſe, when the King excuſed himſelf on account of the troubleſome times; but aſſured him, that if he kept every thing to himſelf at preſent, yet at his death he would leave him all (19). With this Ælfred was ſatisfied; for being inclined to follow his ſports, fond of domeſtic pleaſures, and extremely addicted to literature, he inclined rather to have led a retired life. But having given ſome proofs of his courage in the former King's reign, Æthelred would never part with him, but made uſe of him as his Firſt Miniſter, and General in chief of his armies. In this capacity it was, that he, raſhly engaging the Daniſh army, which was very numerous, and then lay near Reading, was in great danger of being totally defeated, had not the King come in to his aſſiſtance with a freſh body of men, which changed the fortune of the day; inſomuch that the Danes loſt the field, and therein one King, nine of their Chiefs, whom the Saxons called Earls, and a prodigious number of common ſoldiers (20). This, however, did not hinder the Danes from attacking and defeating the two brothers a fortnight after; followed very ſuddenly by another ſuch diſaſter, wherein King Æthelred (21) received his mortal wound.

[C] Broke their faith in a few months.] All our ancient hiſtorians, and eſpecially thoſe who lived in their times, unanimouſly agree in charging the Danes with moſt horrid acts of perfidy (22). Conſidering, however, the pains taken by theſe authors, to juſtify their countrymen in all things, and their evident partiality in ſuch points as regard the ancient Britons, we might well enough doubt their ſincerity in this reſpect, if it was not confirmed by facts, and by the authority of foreign writers. To ſay the truth, the perfidy of the Danes was the reſult of their barbariſm. From making it their conſtant practice to burn and deſtroy whatever they could not carry away, they were quickly ſtraitned in their quarters; and thus being obliged to ſhift them often, they ſoon found themſelves in ſuch a ſituation as to have no means of ſubſiſtance, without obtaining it by force, from thoſe with whom they had lately made peace. To theſe wrong ſteps of theirs, was owing the wretched condition in which this whole iſland then was; all its beſt towns, many of its fineſt monaſteries, and the far greater part of its villages, being but ſo many heaps of ruins. The want of cultivation alſo produced dreadful famines; and theſe, as uſual, were followed with forces he could get together. He found them in Exeter, where, for ſome time, he held them beſieged (o). While things were in this ſituation, his fleet ſucceſsfully engaged part of the enemy's, though it conſiſted of a hundred and twenty ſail, ſunk many, and diſperſed the reſt, which, attempting to gain ſome of the Engliſh ports, by a ſtorm were driven on the coaſts, and all miſerably periſhed (p). This ſo terrified the Barbarians, that they once more made peace and gave hoſtages. However, in 877, having obtained new aids, they came in ſuch numbers into Wiltſhire, that the Saxons, quite tired out, could not be perſuaded to make head againſt them. Many to avoid them fled out of the kingdom; not a few ſubmitted themſelves; and the reſt ſuffering fear to ſuperſede their duty, fled every man to the place wherein he might beſt be concealed. In this diſtreſs, Ælfred conceiving himſelf no longer a King, laid aſide all ſigns of royalty, and, to ſecure his perſon, took ſhelter in the houſe of one who kept his cattle (q). While he remained in this retreat, a little adventure happened, of which ſeveral of our hiſtories take notice. The good woman of the houſe having one day made ſome cakes, put them before the fire to toaſt, and ſeeing Ælfred ſitting by, trimming his bow and arrows, ſhe thought he would of courſe take care of the bread; but he, it ſeems, intent on what he was about, let the cakes burn; which ſo provoked the woman, that ſhe rated him roundly, telling him he would be glad to eat them, and ought therefore to have looked after their toaſting (r). The King, however, did not continue long in this wretched ſituation; for obſerving that a part of Somerſetſhire was ſo encloſed by the waters of the Perrot and the Thone, as to form a moraſs, which it was almoſt impracticable to force; he, in the centre thereof, where there was about two acres of firm ground, built a fort, for the ſecurity of himſelf, his family, and the few faithful ſervants that repaired thither to him (s). This place he named Æthelingey, or rather Æthelinga-igge, that is, the Iſle of Nobles, now called Athelney (t) [D]. There he continued ſome months, ſallying frequently out upon the Danes (eſpecially when they thought themſelves ſecure and lay careleſsly) with incredible ſecrecy and ſucceſs. After almoſt a year ſpent in this manner, underſtanding that ſome of his ſubjects had routed a great army of the Danes, killed their Chiefs or Kings, and taken their magical ſtandard (u) [E], he iſſued his letters to acquaint them with the place where with conſuming plagues, as we read in Aſſerius, and other ancient writers (23). We need not wonder, therefore, that Ælfred was deſirous of getting ſome time to breathe; or that being juſt ſeated on the throne, he ſhould be willing to obtain a thorough knowledge of the ſtate both of his dominions and his people. Inſtead, therefore, of attributing this treaty of his with the Danes, to indolence, or want of ſpirit, we ought to conclude it the effect of his foreſight and great prudence, which inclined him to ſeek ſome means for reſtoring and ſtrengthening his decayed ſtate, before he engaged in freſh wars, with a fierce and barbarous people, who, by continual acceſſions of new comers, throve by fighting, and gained ground even by defeats.

(23) Aſſer. Menev. Chron. Sax. &c.

[D] Now called Athelney.] The diſtreſs the King was in when he took ſhelter in this iſland, is very ſtrongly painted by Aſſerius Menevenſis, who very probably heard what he relates from the King's own mouth. We are told that St. Neolas, his kinſman, predicted to him this misfortune. That wiſe and good man, it ſeems, diſcerning in the two firſt years of Ælfred's reign, a greater inclination to the employments and recreations of a private life, than to attend the affairs of ſtate, and diſcharge the function of a King, took upon him to reprove Ælfred, and in the end, when he found his diſcourſes wrought not much, foretold him, that the time was at hand, when God would ſeverely chaſtize him for his negligence; and when he ſhould have enough of that privacy, which he now ſeemed ſo much to covet (24). Among other ſingular accidents which befel him in this retreat, the following is much inſiſted upon by ſome of our hiſtorians, though not mentioned by Aſſerius. It happened one day in the winter, that the King having ſent all his attendants out to ſearch for fiſh and other things in the iſland, was left alone with his Queen in the fort. This leiſure he employed, as he was wont, in reading; but was quickly diſturbed by the voice of a poor man, who with great earneſtneſs begged for ſomewhat to ſatisfy his hunger. Ælfred thereupon deſired his wife to examine their cupboard, wherein ſhe finding only one ſmall loaf brought it to him, and told him it would ſcarcely ſuffice his ſervants when they came home from fiſhing. The King, however, directed her to give half to the poor man, whoſe name was Nider, truſting, as he ſaid, that God would ſend more. She did as ſhe was directed, and the King returning to his book, read till he was ſleepy, whereupon he went to his couch to ſlumber away his cares. In his ſleep he had a very extraordinary dream. He thought he ſaw St. Cuthbert, the famous Biſhop of Holy Iſland, who told him, that God having puniſhed the ſins of the Saxons by the ſword of the Danes, now pitied their calamities, and looking with an eye of favour on his late act of charity, had determined to reſtore him to his throne; and of the truth of this, the return of his ſervants with a large quantity of fiſh, ſhould ſerve him as a token. The King waking called to the Queen, who was alſo fallen aſleep, and told her his dream, which ſhe no ſooner heard, than ſhe aſſured him ſhe had dreamed the ſame thing. Immediately after his ſervants returned with a vaſt quantity of fiſh, which greatly encouraged the King, and put him upon thoſe great and glorious undertakings, which reſtored the luſtre of the Saxon diadem (25). We have omitted a great many miraculous circumſtances, with which a certain author graces the ſtory we have juſt now recited, and have followed Spelman in calling the lady who was with the King, his Queen, and not his mother, who died long before his father. But it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the Abbot of Rieval ſays, that the King directed his ſervant to beſtow this alms, without mentioning any lady at all (26).

[E] Their magical ſtandard.] It will be proper to make uſe of Sir John Spelman's explication of this dark point. In this defeat, ſays he, there was taken that famous Daniſh ſtandard, called Reaſan, or the Raven, the great confidence of thoſe Pagans. It was a banner, with the image of a raven, magically wrought by the three ſiſters of Hinquar and Hubba, on purpoſe for their expedition, in revenge of their father Lodebroch's murder, made, they ſay, almoſt in an inſtant, being by them at once begun and finiſhed in a noon tide, and believed by the Danes to have carried great fatality with it, for which it was highly eſteemed of them. It is pretended, that being carried in battle; towards good ſucceſs it would always ſeem to clap the wings, and make as if it would fly; but, towards the approach of miſhap, it would hang down, and not move. Whatſoever it was, the impoſtor was now betrayed; for being taken by ſurprize, they had loſt their oracle, before they had time to conſult with it (27). That this ſtory, however fabulous, is no invention of our writer's, is evident from what we meet where he was, and to invite the nobility to come thither and conſult with him. This they accordingly did, and ſhewed a great alacrity, when the King propoſed taking the field with an army, and no longer acting only by ſtealth, as it were, againſt the enemy (w). However, before they came to a final reſolution, Ælfred, that his ſubjects might not hazard too much, expoſed his own perſon in a moſt extraordinary manner. For putting on the habit of a harper, he went into the enemy's camp, where, without ſuſpicion, he was every where admitted, and had even the honour to play before their Princes. This having furniſhed him with an exact knowledge of their ſituation, he returned with like ſecrecy to his nobility, whom he directed to go to their ſeveral homes, there to draw together each man as great a force as he could, with which, at a day prefixed, he was to come to the great wood, now called Selwood, in Wiltſhire (x). This they punctually performed, and the Danes, with no ſmall ſurprize, heard that King Ælfred, whom they looked upon as a fugitive, was about to attack them with a royal army. The King, taking advantage of the terror they were in, fell upon them, and totally defeated them at Æthendune, now Eddington (y). Thoſe who eſcaped from this battle, poſſeſſed themſelves of a neighbouring caſtle or fort, almoſt ruined, which they fortified immediately, and wherein they were quickly beſieged by the victorious Saxons. After a long and cloſe ſiege, the Danes were forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. But Ælfred dealt by them like a merciful Prince, giving up to ſuch of them as ſhould embrace the Chriſtian religion the whole kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, on condition that they ſhould oblige the reſt of their countrymen to quit the iſland, and prevent, as far as in them lay, the landing of any more foreigners therein (z). For the performance of theſe articles he took hoſtages, and when, in purſuance of the treaty, Guthrum, the Daniſh Captain, or, as ſome called him, King, came with thirty of his chief officers to Ælfred, who lay then encamped at Aalre, now Auler, a ſmall village in Somerſetſhire, to be baptized, the King anſwered for him at the font, gave him the name of Æthelſtan, and adopted him for his ſon. He then entertained him and his friends twelve days, or, to ſpeak in the ſtyle of our Saxon anceſtors, twelve nights, at his houſe at Wedmore, or Wetmore, after which he diſmiſſed them with royal preſents (a). This certain advantage the Saxons got by the Danes turning Chriſtians, that now they kept their oaths, and removing the next year from Chippenham to Cirenceſter, and about a twelvemonth after into the country aſſigned them, there for the preſent they ſat down, and ſettled themſelves very quietly (b). The ſame year a new ſwarm of Danes came up the river Thames, and wintered at Fullouham, now Fulham; but Ælfred was ſo well provided, that they thought proper to go off again, and try their fortunes in France (c). The Saxon fleet alſo performed great things at ſea, and the King depending much thereon, ſpared neither pains nor coſt to keep it conſtantly in good order (d). In 884, the Danes landed in Kent in great numbers, and laid ſiege to Rocheſter, but the inhabitants made ſo ſtout a reſiſtance, that the King came time enough to their relief, forced the enemy to raiſe the ſiege, and return once more to France (e). A little after, his fleet had the good luck to beat a very conſiderable one of the Danes, deſtroyed thirteen ſhips, and according to the King's orders, gave no quarter to any of the men on board (f). Yet within a ſhort ſpace after this, they themſelves were defeated, but that defeat turned to their advantage, ſince it made them extremely vigilant for the future (g) [F]. Ælfred having now ſome leiſure, reſolved to repair, re-fortify, and re-people the ancient city of London, which he had lately recovered from the Danes, and meant to keep as a frontier. Accordingly he re-edified it, placed a garriſon therein, and eſtabliſhed as the Governor thereof, Æthered, whom he had created Earl of Mercia, and to whom he gave his meet with in the hiſtory of the northern nations by Olaus Magnus, wherein there are very prolix accounts of the like nature (28). It ſhould ſeem, that either the Danes redeemed this ſtandard, or got another of the ſame ſort wrought, ſince on one of the coins of Anlaff, King of Northumberland, there is a raven, which he bore in his banners (29), and from one of the coins of King Canute, it appears to have given original to a family, one of the Monetarii to that King, being called Refen (30).

(27) Life of Alfred, p. 61.

[F] Extremely vigilant for the future.] It may ſeem ſtrange, that the King having ſo lately made peace with the Danes, and received them for his ſubjects, ſhould be obliged to take ſo much pains to defend his country againſt them; for there is no doubt at all, that theſe very Danes were part of thoſe who had ſubmitted to King Ælfred. In order to clear this difficulty, we muſt enter minutely into the ſituation of the Danes under King Guthrum. We have ſtill extant two treaties, or articles of capitulation, between King Ælfred, and Guthrum King of the Danes (31). The firſt is very ſhort, and appears to have been the articles agreed on, at the immediate ſurrender of the Danes, when they had not time to be very explicit. The latter is larger, and takes in all that the Danes bound themſelves to, in conſideration of the lands beſtowed upon them by King Ælfred; and from thence it appears, that they had granted them the kingdoms of Eaſt Anglia and Northumberland, which, however, were ſtill dependent upon Ælfred, who concurred with King Guthrum in his charters (32). But notwithſtanding all theſe engagements, Guthrum was far from being true to the King. On the contrary, he executed what he had promiſed very ſlowly, received many new comers under his protection, and connived at their fitting out ſuch pyratical fleets, as this was, to plunder King Ælfred's dominions; pretending, however, when any complaint was made, that they were a wild lawleſs crew, who for a while indeed had remained under his juriſdiction, but were now revolted; and therefore he was not accountable for their behaviour. This action happened in the dead of the night; ſo that the King's fleet was rather ſurpriſed than beaten; and all the uſe the enemy made of this little advantage, was to procure a new treaty with the King, who, for his own eaſe, was once again pleaſed to grant them peace (33).

daughter Æthelfleda in marriage (b). This Earl was not only an excellent officer, but also a great ſtateſman, and a very worthy man; for which reaſon, not only all the Saxons who had ſubmitted to the Danes, but ſuch alſo of the Danes themſelves as began to learn the Saxon manners, ſubmitted to him and ſettled in London, and the other places under his obedience (i) [G]. After ſome years of reſt, Ælfred was called again into the field; for the Danes being heartily beaten in the Weſt of France, came with a fleet of two hundred and fifty ſail on the Eaſt coaſt of Kent, and landing fixed themſelves at Appletree. Shortly (k) after came another fleet up the Thames, conſiſting of eighty veſſels, and having diſcharged the ſoldiers on board them, they built a fort at Middleton. Ælfred, in this ſituation, drew together a conſiderable army; but before he marched towards the enemy, he forced the Danes, ſettled in Northumberland and Eſſex, to give him hoſtages for their good behaviour (l). Then he moved towards the invaders, and very prudently choſe a camp between their armies, thereby preventing their junction. A great body, however, moved into Eſſex, and from thence, croſſing the river, came into Surrey, where at Farnham the King's forces met them, and defeated them (m). In the midſt of theſe confuſions, the Danes who were ſettled in Northumberland, in breach of their oaths, and, notwithſtanding the hoſtages they had given to the King, equipped two fleets, the one of a hundred, and the other of forty veſſels, and, after plundering both the northern and ſouthern coaſts, ſailing about, came to Exeter and beſieged it (n). The King no ſooner received information of their perfidious behaviour, than he reſolved to march directly to Exeter, leaving behind him a great body of Welſh. Before his arrival the Danes were poſſeſſed of the place, but he ſhut them up therein, and, notwithſtanding they made many deſperate ſallies, kept them effectually blocked up. The body of the Welſh he had left behind him, believing it neither their intereſt nor their duty to be idle, marched to London and joined the citizens. They had not been long at London, before news came that Hæſten, one of the Kings of the Danes, was marched out with the bulk of his forces to forage, and had left his family and his riches at Beamfleet, where he had built a fort; whereupon they reſolved immediately to attack it in his abſence. In this expedition they had all the ſucceſs they could wiſh, not only taking the place, with the wife and children of the Daniſh King, but alſo all the riches they had collected by many years rapine. Hæſten, when he received the news, was ſo much troubled thereat, that he ſent to Ælfred, then before Exeter, to beg a peace, which the good King granted him upon very reaſonable terms, and which he, like a true Dane, broke as ſoon as it was concluded: particularly, he plundered the diſtrict belonging to Earl Æthered, though he had been godfather to one of this Prince's ſons, and, after all, joining the other Daniſh army, he marched with them to Shobury in Eſſex, where they built another caſtle. Thence paſſing the Thames with ſuch as joined them from Northumberland, and the territories of the Eaſt Angles, they marched on to Severn, waſting all in their way. On the banks of this river, viz. at the Buttington in Montgomeryſhire, Ælfred's generals gave them a check, and, encamping on the other ſide of the river, hindered them from paſſing for many weeks (o). In the mean time, the King had brought thoſe he beſieged in Exeter to ſuch extremities, that, having eaten their horſes, they were ready to devour each other. Deſpair, therefore, rendering them deſperate, they ſallied on the King's forces, but were beaten, though with great loſs on the King's ſide. The remnant of this body of the Danes fled into Eſſex, to the fort they had built there, and to their ſhips (p). But, before the King had any leiſure to recruit himſelf, another Daniſh leader, whoſe name was Laf, came with a great army out of Northumberland, and deſtroyed all before him, marching on to the city of Werheal in the Weſt, which ſome take to be Cheſter: there they remained the reſt of that year, the next they invaded North Wales, which they plundered and deſtroyed, and when there was nothing more to be taken, they divided, one body returning into Northumberland, and another into the territories of the Eaſt Angles; whence proceeding into Eſſex, they ſeized upon a ſmall iſland called Mereſig (q). Thence, ſome time after, they parted, ſome ſailing up the river Thames, and others up the Lee Road, where drawing up their ſhips, they built a fort about twenty miles from London, which proved a great curb upon the citizens. The Londoners, unable to bear this reſtraint

[G] Under his obedience.] The Danes had poſſeſſed themſelves of London, in the time of his father, and had held it till now as a convenient place for them to land at, and fortify themſelves in; neither was it taken from them but by a cloſe ſiege (34). However, when it came into the King's hands it was in a miſerable condition, ſcarcely habitable, and all its fortifications ruined. The King, moved by the importance of the place, and the deſire of ſtrengthening his frontier againſt the Danes, reſtored it to its antient ſplendor. The method he took to fill it with inhabitants was altogether worthy of his conſummate prudence. For obſerving that through the confuſion of the times, many, both Saxons and Danes, lived in a looſe diſorderly manner, without owning any government; he, commiſerating their misfortune, neceſſity having firſt driven them to this way of life, offered them now a comfortable eſtabliſhment, if they would ſubmit and become his ſubjects. This propoſition was even better received than he expected; for multitudes growing weary of a vagabond kind of life, joyfully accepted ſo unmerited an offer. Theſe advantages were greatly improved by his ſon-in-law, the new Earl of Mercia, who ſo perfectly anſwered the King's intentions, and by his wiſdom and mildneſs procured the people ſuch advantages, that numbers of the more civilized Danes, made it their choice to retire into his territories, there to live by their induſtry, and enjoy the benefit of thoſe laws, which Ælfred had made for the good of all his ſubjects (35).

with any patience, went in a great body and attacked the fort, but they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, which obliged the King, about harveſt-time, to encamp with a body of troops in the neighbourhood of that city, in order to cover the reapers from the excurſions of the Danes. While he was thus employed, Ælfred one day riding by the ſide of the river Lee, began to entertain an opinion, that by cutting certain trenches, the Daniſh ſhips might be laid quite dry: this, therefore, he attempted, and ſucceeded in it ſo well, that the Danes abandoned their fort, and marched away to the banks of the Severn, where having built a fortreſs, at a place called Quatbrig, they ſat down and wintered. Such of the Daniſh ſhips as could be got off, the Londoners carried in triumph into their own road, and the reſt they burnt and deſtroyed (r). During theſe three years, the Engliſh were not only vexed with the continual irruptions of this barbarous people [H], but ſuffered likewiſe by a dreadful plague, which affected alike, both men and cattle (s). The Danes ever unquiet, in a ſhort ſpace, began again to invade the territories of the Weſt Saxons, both by land and ſea, but did more miſchief as pirates, than as robbers; for having learned how to build long and large ſhips, they were in a manner maſters at ſea, and of conſequence depopulated all the coaſt. Ælfred, having long thought of the beſt method how to remedy theſe diſorders, contrived to build ſtill larger and better ſhips than thoſe uſed by the Danes, which having effected, he ſent theſe gallies on the coaſts of the iſle of Wight, and of Devonſhire, which were miſerably infeſted by ſix piratical veſſels. Ælfred's ſquadron performed all that could be expected, driving two of theſe pirate ſhips on ſhore, ſinking three, and ſuffering one only to eſcape. But this was not performed without great loſs on the King's ſide, eſpecially of officers. Such of the Danes as landed when their ſhips ran on ſhore, were taken priſoners, and brought to the King at Wincheſter, where he gave judgment upon them, that they ſhould be hanged as piratical murderers, and enemies to mankind (t). In the ſubſequent part of the King's life, viz. in the years 898, and 899, there happened nothing very remarkable [I], ſave that the King employed that peace and leiſure which he then had, in effectually eſtabliſhing that government which with much care and pains he had framed, not more for the ſecurity of himſelf and ſucceſſors, than for the eaſe and benefit of his ſubjects in general, of which conſtitutions here, as in their proper place, we think neceſſary to give a ſuccinct account.

Before the reign of Ælfred, though there were many Kings who took the title, yet was there none who could with propriety be called Monarch of the Engliſh nation. For notwithſtanding there was always, after the time of Egbert, a Prince who held a kind of pre eminence over the reſt; yet had he no direct dominion over their ſubjects, as in the latter part of his reign Ælfred had; for to him all parts of England, not in the poſſeſſion of the Danes, ſubmitted, and ſo did alſo a great part of Wales: neither was this great power attained by the ſword, or through his ambition of ruling, but rather through the fame of his wiſdom and mildneſs (u). We have already ſpoken of the laws he made, of which, though there remain but few [K], we have any aſſurance are truly his, yet are we well informed, that to his conſtitution we owe many of thoſe advantages, (u) Chron. Saxon. p. 99. Aſſer. Menev. p. 49.

[H] Continual irruptions of this barbarous people.] In order to have a clear idea of theſe diſturbances, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that Guthrum, King of the Danes, dying in 890 (36), King Ælfred took all the pains imaginable, to ſecure the obedience of his ſubjects, which they promiſed; and in 894 gave hoſtages (37). But when by the coming of numbers of their countrymen into this iſland; they thought themſelves ſtrong enough to eſcape puniſhment for perjury, they broke without ſcruple their agreement, and were as troubleſome and cruel as any of the new comers. The King's contrivance in draining the river Lee, is thought to have produced that noble meadow lying between Hertford and Bow; for at Hertford, was the Danes fort, and thence we may eaſily conceive, they kept the inhabitants of London in continual terror by frequent excurſions (38). Authors are by no means agreed, as to the method the King purſued in laying dry the Daniſh ſhips. One author (39) tells us, that he did it by ſtraitening the channel, which ſeems very improbable; but Henry of Huntingdon (40), with a greater appearance of truth, alledges, that he cut ſeveral canals, which exhauſted its water. His indefatigable endeavours not only to defend his kingdom againſt all invaders, but alſo to puniſh thoſe perfidious Danes, who had ſubmitted to him, ſucceeded ſo well, that he appointed Guthred (41) a Saxon, though of Daniſh original, King of Northumberland; and took all Eſſex from the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, which had been yielded to the Danes, appointing one Birtheolf (42) to be Earl thereof, who proved a new and great check to his reſtleſs and pilfering neighbours, ſo long as he lived. But he, together with many other of Ælfred's prime nobility, was carried off by the plague, mentioned (43) in the text, and which ſeems to have been chiefly owing to the depopulation made by the Danes.

[I] There happened nothing very remarkable.] It would be both tedious and troubleſome, to ſet down all that we find in modern writers, concerning Ælfred; and, therefore, we chuſe to confine ourſelves in this latter part of his life, where we have not the aſſiſtance of Aſſerius, to the Saxon Chronicle, and other ancient authors. The ſtories which we have relating to miracles and apparitions, ſeem to be the fabric of later times, though ſome of them are diſguiſed under the name of antient authors. It looks like debaſing the great actions of this excellent Prince, to intermix with them the dreams of monkiſh writers, who, taking occaſion from lands granted to a monaſtery, or ſome ſuch circumſtance, frame ſuch ſtrange tales, as nothing but the exceſſive blindneſs of ſucceeding ages could render credible. What leſſer exploits were performed in his time againſt the Danes, as they belong rather to the particular articles of thoſe who performed them, or to the general hiſtory of thoſe times, ſo we pretend not to inſert them here, where the perſonal hiſtory of Ælfred is properly concerned. But whoever would ſee things of this nature in the fulleſt light, may conſult Dr. Walker's verſion of Sir John Spelman's life of Ælfred, where, in the notes and appendix, he will find matter ſufficient to exerciſe his curioſity.

[K] There remain but few.] There ſeems to be good reaſon to believe, that the complete body of laws formed by King Ælfred, is either loſt, or elſe not diſtinguiſhable at this day, to which opinion we are led

led by many reaſons. Several laws are mentioned as made by Ælfred, which are not extant among thoſe laws that we have. In the Mirror of Juſtices, a book written in the reign of Edward I. or rather reviſed then by Andrew Horne; there is mention made of a body of his laws, and even of a collection of his judgments then in public uſe, of which we know nothing at this day; though it appears by Harding's chronicle (44), that they were uſed in Weſtminſter-hall, in the reign of Edward IV. Mr. Lambard, who publiſhed the laws we now have, takes notice in his epiſtle to the reader, that other laws of King Ælfred there were, which he was not without hopes of recovering. That all are not loſt is owing in ſome meaſure to the induſtry of John Bromton (45), or whoever penned the chronicle which goes under his name, where we find them with thoſe of other Saxon Kings. They conſiſt of three diſtinct chapters, the firſt of which is entitled, the Laws of King Ælfred; the ſecond is the ſhorter; and the third the longer treaty between him and the Daniſh King of the Eaſt Angles, who is therein called Godrinus. Before thoſe which are ſtiled the laws of Ælfred, and which are in number fifty-one, there is a preface (46), wherein the King recites many things concerning the excellency and uſe of laws, the apoſtolic canons, and the decalogue. In the cloſe the King tells us, that he had collected out of the laws of his anceſtor King Ina, out of thoſe of Offa, King of Mercia, and of Æthelbert, the firſt Chriſtian Saxon King, ſuch as appeared to him moſt juſt and reaſonable; and having communicated them to the learned men of his kingdom, he, with their aſſent, publiſhed them to be the rule of his people's actions. Some think that this is a direct confutation of what Harding and others have written concerning King Ælfred's laws, viz. that they were collected from thoſe of the Trojans, Greeks, Britons, Danes, &c. But to this two anſwers may be given, firſt, that theſe are not perhaps the laws to which thoſe writers refer, but rather the completer code, which, as we have remarked, is not extant that we know of. Secondly, it may be inſiſted on, that theſe very laws were ſo collected, becauſe for this there is direct proof. King Ælfred aſſerts, that he collected from the laws of King Ina; and if we will believe King Ina (47) himſelf, his laws were many of them taken from the Britiſh conſtitutions; and thoſe, if we will believe their authors, were excerpts from the Greek and Trojan laws. Without all queſtion, theſe inſtitutions are very wiſe, and well ſuited to the times and purpoſes they were given for. But Sir John Spelman (48) ſeems to be miſtaken, when he aſſerts, that they were milder than the ancient Saxon laws, to which this nation were obedient when in Germany, becauſe the contrary appears by comparing them. What led Sir John into this opinion, was the commutations ſettled by theſe laws for capital offences. For though death was the puniſhment of many crimes, yet in moſt caſes the offender might be redeemed for a certain ſum of money. For the life and limb of every man, from the peaſant to the prince, was valued at a certain rate; ſo that if any killed or maimed him, he was to make recompence according to that valuation. In caſe of ſlaughter this fine was called wiregild; and, when paid, the King had one part, which was called frithbote, for the breach of his peace and the loſs of his ſubject. The Lord had another ſtiled manbote, for the loſs of his man; and the relations of the party ſlain had the other third, called magbote or cengild, for the injury they had ſuſtained. If this fine was not paid, the kindred of the perſon ſlain might puniſh him who ſlew him with death. If the offender fled, then his relations or townſmen paid the wiregild. In caſes of maim, the puniſhment was according to Lex talionis, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, unleſs the offender was in a capacity of commuting with money at the ſettled price (49). Amongſt theſe laws there is one only relating to inheritance, and that provides, that if a man left his land to his next relation, under a condition that he ſhould not diſpoſe of it, then he ſhould be incapable of ſelling of it, except to his next relation, even though the limitation was not expreſſed in writing, if proof could be made thereof by a lawful witneſs (50). It is very clear, from this ſyſtem of laws, that things were not yet in a very ſettled condition, ſince there are grievous penalties inflicted on ſuch as fought in the King's houſe, in the preſence of the Archbiſhop, in the Alderman's court, or in leſſer judicatures (51). We may alſo diſcern that the manners of the people were very corrupt, from all which, as well as from the ſilence of theſe laws with reſpect to hundreds and tythings, we may well enough conclude, that this collection of ordinances was made pretty early in the King's reign, and before he had brought things to that regularity, which he afterwards did (52). The firſt treaty between King Ælfred and Guthrum, or Godrinus, King of the Eaſt Angles, conſiſts of ſeven articles, all which relate to the peace of both their dominions, and conſiſts of articles for preventing the ſubjects of either Prince, from injuring the ſubjects of the other (53). The ſecond treaty or capitulation, which in Mr. Lambard's edition bears the title of Fœdus Edwardi & Guthrum, is, however, Ælfred's without all doubt; for Guthrum, or Godrinus, died ten years before Edward came to the crown. In the Saxon edition it conſiſts but of twelve articles; but Bromton in his Latin tranſlation makes them ſeventeen (54). They relate moſt of them to religious matters, and the whole driſt of them ſeems to be, the reducing all the Danes ſettled in England, to the belief and practice of the Chriſtian religion. Conſidered in this light they are certainly an excellent ſyſtem, and one thing is very remarkable, that the prieſts were puniſhed by theſe laws in the King's courts, beſides ſuffering ſpiritual penance, according to the canon law (55), which is a plain proof, that the power to which the Pope afterwards pretended, of exempting the clergy from all ſecular juriſdiction, was not as yet heard of, or at leaſt admitted. It alſo deſerves notice, that by the eleventh law in the Saxon edition, and the ſixteenth in the Latin, fortune-tellers, &c. are puniſhed, and all people are forbidden to entertain them (56), the Danes being eſpecially addicted to ſorcery, as all the northern Pagans were, and ſtill are. Alford (57) the Jeſuit hath publiſhed moſt of Ælfred's laws in his Annals, more methodically as he would have us believe, than elſewhere they are to be met with. But this is ſo far from being true, that the manner in which he has publiſhed them is by no means ſatisfactory. For in the firſt place they are divided into laws eccleſiaſtical and civil, ſo that Ælfred's firſt collection is diſtracted, ſo that no connection appears between the laws as they follow. But beſides this, the Jeſuit interpoſes his own commentary at every turn, in order to refute Spelman; ſo that the reader muſt redreſs the inaccuracy of the author, before he can apprehend any thing of the ſenſe of Ælfred's laws. Alford takes the ſame ſtep in relation to the treaties between Ælfred and Guthrum; and it is for this reaſon, that we did not mention his edition, when we ſpoke of thoſe of Lambard and Bromton.

what is called the Common Law, ſo ſtyled, either on account of its being the common law of all the Saxons, without reſpect to the different kingdoms in which they lived, or becauſe it was common both to the Saxons and the Danes (y). It is indeed a diſputed point, whether he was the firſt who divided the kingdom into ſhires; but it ſeems to admit of no diſpute, that he ſettled thoſe boundaries and leſſer diſtinctions which remain at this day (z) [M]. In conſequence of this, he framed a book, called The Book of Wincheſter, which contained a ſurvey of the kingdom, and of which the Doomes-day-book ſtill preſerved in the Exchequer, is no more than a ſecond edition (a). He, likewiſe, made uſe of this diviſion for the proper diſtribution of juſtice ſo happily, that whereas he found the kingdom in the utmoſt confuſion, and the people therein ſo indigent, and ſo given to rapine, that it was equally difficult to acquire wealth, or to keep it when acquired; yet before his death he brought all things into ſuch order, as that never any kingdom was better governed, and ſo effectually tamed the covetous ſpirit that induces one man to take from another, that money or jewels might be left on the public roads, and no paſſenger attempt to touch it (b). In the management of affairs of ſtate, he, after the cuſtom of his anceſtors the Kings of the Weſt Saxons, made uſe of the great council of the kingdom, conſiſting of Biſhops, Earls, the King's Aldermen, and his Chief Thanes or Barons. Theſe in the firſt part of his reign he convoked as occaſion ſerved; but when things were better ſettled, he made a law, that twice in the year at leaſt, an Aſſembly or Parliament, if we may be allowed ſo to call it, ſhould be held at London, there to provide for the well governing of the commonwealth; from which ordinance his ſucceſſors varied a little, holding ſuch aſſemblies not in any place certain, but wherever they reſided, at Chriſtmas, Eaſter, or Whitſuntide (c). As to extraordinary affairs, and ſuch emergencies as would not admit of calling great councils, the King acted therein by the advice of ſuch Biſhops, Earls, and officers in the army, as happened to be about his perſon (d). In reſpect to military concerns, there hath been already ſo much ſaid, as makes it unneceſſary to add much here. Let it however be obſerved, that though this nation could never boaſt of a greater ſoldier than he, ſince he fought fifty-ſix ſet battles by ſea and land, and of theſe eight in one year (e); yet was he ſo far from being of a cruel, blood-thirſty, or ambitious temper, that he never willingly made war on any, or refuſed to grant peace whenever it was deſired (f). His troops he rendered by degrees invincible, through juſt and regular diſcipline, and appointed ſuch methods of raiſing, recruiting, and diſtributing them in winter-quarters, that his ſubjects and his militia were ſynonymous terms, every man who could bear arms being a ſoldier, and no man ſerving but in his turn, and according to law (g). His coaſts he ſecured by guard-ſhips, making his navy his peculiar care (h). His frontiers were covered by caſtles well fortified, which, before his time, the Saxons had never raiſed. Add to all this, that his inſtructions and example raiſed numbers of able officers, whoſe abilities the King conſtantly cheriſhed by proportionable rewards (i). In reſpect to other affairs, Ælfred was no leſs knowing and induſtrious, as appears by his repairing the cities throughout his dominions demoliſhed by the Danes, erecting new ones, and adorning and embelliſhing ſuch as were in a mean and low condition (k). One would think that a more diſtinct account might eaſily be given of this matter: but the truth is, that the writers who lived in and near his time, found it ſo difficult to mention them all, that they contented themſelves with general expreſſions, excepting what they ſay of London and Winchester, the latter of which was the royal ſeat of the Weſt Saxon Kings. However, there is a certain circumſtance preſerved, whereby we may gueſs at the great things he performed in this way; ſince it is affirmed, that one ſixth part of his clear revenues was applied to the payment of his workmens wages, who had beſides meat and drink at the King's coſt (l). Lucky accidents, and the painful reſearches of antiquaries, have juſtified this conjecture by various diſcoveries [N]. In reſpect to religious foundations, as this Prince was exceedingly remarkable able for his piety, ſo he excelled moſt of his predeceſſors in his care on this head. For, beſides re-edifying and reſtoring almoſt every monaſtery in his dominions, which either the prevailing poverty of the times, or the ſacrilegious fury of the Danes, had brought to ruin, he built many, and improved more, beſides other acts of munificence towards the Church, which were perhaps as uſeful and honourable to the full, though it would take up too much room to inſiſt on them here (m) [O]. As to his founding the univerſity of Oxford, it is a matter ſo warmly diſputed, and has employed ſo many learned pens, that it by no means becomes us to decide it. Thus much, however, is certainly due on that head to King Ælfred, that he reſtored and ſettled that univerſity, endowed it with revenues, and ſought out and placed there the moſt famous profeſſors in ſeveral ſciences, as will be ſhewn in a note (n) [P]. A King who was ſo careful of his people, might well allow ſomething to his royal magnificence, eſpecially ſince in all he did of this ceſter (61), treating of this ſubject, break out thus: What can be ſaid of the cities he reſtored, and of thoſe built by him, where there were none before! plainly intimating, that it ſeemed to them an infinite work. Time hath diſcovered, that he was the founder of Shafteſbury, in Dorſetſhire; for as William of Malmſbury informs us, there was dug out of the ruins of old walls, a ſtone with this inſcription:

[M] Remain at this day.] The curious reader may meet with the principal arguments uſed on both ſides of this controverſy, in Mr. Hearne's collection of diſcourſes on Britiſh antiquities (59). What is aſcribed to Ælfred, is not a bare diviſion of the country, but the ſettling a new form of judicature, which he did thus: he divided his whole dominions into ſhires, ſettling their boundaries very exactly, then he divided each ſhire into three parts, called trythings; which, though now grown out of date, yet are there ſome remains of this ancient diviſion in the ridings of Yorkſhire, the laths of Kent, and the three parts of Lincolnſhire. Each trything was divided into hundreds, or wapen-takes, and theſe again into tythings, or dwellings of ten houſeholders. Each of theſe houſeholders ſtood engaged to the King, as pledge for the good behaviour of his family, and all the ten houſeholders were mutually pledges for each other; ſo that if any one of the tything was ſuſpected of an offence, if the Head-Boroughs, or Chiefs of the tything, would not be ſecurity for him, he was impriſoned, and if he made his eſcape, the tything and hundred were fined to the King. Each ſhire was under the government of an Earl, under whom was the Reive, his Deputy, ſince, from his office, called Shire reive, or Sheriff; and, beſides theſe, there were Wites, or Wiſe-men, who were a kind of Juſtices, who ſat to hear cauſes in the county court, where ſuch things were determined, as came by appeal from the inferior or hundred courts (60). It would draw this note into too great a length, ſhould we inſiſt on the many advantages flowing from theſe regulations; and beſides, if we only conſider, that by this method the King had ſecurity for every one of his ſubjects, for none was accounted a liege-man, or entitled to the protection of the laws, who did not belong to ſome tything or other; we cannot but confeſs, that it is the wiſeſt plan of government, which is perhaps any where extant.

That is, A. D. 880. being the eighth of his reign, King Ælfred founded this city. The ſame author farther tells us, that it was much decayed in his time. He is alſo ſaid to have been the founder of Middleton and Balford in Kent, as alſo of the Devizes in Wiltſhire, and of Ælfreton in Derbyſhire. Malmſbury alſo being burnt and ruined by the Danes, he reſtored and re-built it (63). There is alſo a coin of his which ſeems to intimate, that he did as much for the city of Norwich. This coin was firſt publiſhed by Speed (64), and has been ſince inſerted in Sir Andrew Fountain's Tables. On one ſide is a head, which Mr. Walker and Sir Andrew ſeem to think belongs to Ælfred, King of Northumberland, though it much reſembles thoſe of Ælfred the Great, publiſhed by Mr. Walker himſelf. On the reverſe is a monogram, which Mr. Edward Thwaits, who wrote notes on thoſe coins, ingenuouſly gueſſed to ſignify Civitas Northuicum (65). Now this ſeems plainly to prove, that this cannot belong to Ælfred of Northumberland; for, as Mr. Camden well obſerves, Norwich was not a place of great conſideration in his time (66). It is therefore more probable, that Speed was in the right, and that this piece of money belongs to Ælfred the Great, and refers to his reſtoring that city.

[O] Though it would take up too much room here.] There never was a Prince more cautious than Ælfred, that no one part of his duty ſhould withdraw his attention from the reſt. When his misfortunes compelled him to take ſhelter in the iſle of Athelney, he built upon the two acres of firm ground which lay in the midſt of the marſhes, a ſtrong fort, and on the other ſide of the narrow path which led to it, he built a redoubt, to prevent the enemy from making themſelves maſters of it. As ſoon as his victories had delivered him from an apprehenſion of retiring thither again, he demoliſhed the caſtle, and with the materials reſtored an ancient monaſtery, which he adorned and beautified, as far as his own and the nation's circumſtances, which ſcarcely afforded either materials or workmen, would permit (67). When he had finiſhed it, he was at a loſs for perſons to reſide in it. This forced him to ſend for an Abbot out of Saxony, to invite ſeveral Monks from France; and, to make up the number he added Engliſh youths, chuſing rather to place there ſuch as might be inſtructed in learning, than old lazy drones, who neither had, nor would acquire any (68). The next religious houſe he founded, was a nunnery in his new city of Shaftſbury, at the Eaſt gate thereof: this houſe he filled with nuns, who were all of them noble by deſcent, and made his daughter Æthelgeof, their Abbeſs (69). In conjunction with his Queen Ælſwith, he founded a nunnery at Wincheſter; and, a little before his death, he deſigned, and laid the foundation of a monaſtery, called the New Monaſtery there (70). This houſe was very unluckily ſituated; for abutting on the cathedral, the King was forced to pay the Biſhop a mark of gold, for every foot of land which he took in for the uſe of his monks; neither did this put an end to theſe difficulties, as will be ſeen in another place (71). He was a benefactor to the biſhoprick of Durham, by confirming the grant made by Guthrum, King of Northumberland, of all the country between the Tine and Tiſe to that church (72). He likewiſe granted much to the abbey of Glaſtenbury (73); and ſent to the cathedral church of Sherburn, ſeveral precious ſtones, which were brought to him from the Indies (74). The abbey of Wilton was a royal foundation before his time, for an abbeſs and twelve nuns; but he increaſed their number to twenty-ſix, on account of a victory he obtained over the Danes, in the neighbourhood of that place (75). There is alſo a charter of his extant, whereby he granted the profits of a wharf in London, to the cathedral church of Worceſter (76). He took care, beſides all this, to ſend his alms conſtantly to Rome, as appears from various paſſages of the Saxon chronicle, wherein we find the names of the perſons by him intruſted on ſuch occaſions (77). Yet it does not appear, that he was ſlaviſhly addicted to that court; but, on the contrary, that he ſupported the dignity of his crown and its ſupremacy; though, according to the reigning opinion of thoſe times, he willingly paid all poſſible marks of reverence and duty to the Biſhops of that ſee, who, on the other hand, were never wanting in their compliments and addreſſes to him.

[P] As will be ſhewn in a note.] Whoever deſires to be fully acquainted with this controverſy, may meet with a very ſuccinct account of it in Spelman's Life of Ælfred, and the very learned notes written thereupon by the laborious Mr. Hearne. There are alſo ſome curious things on this ſubject, in a diſcourſe added by Mr. Wiſe, to his edition of Aſſerius Menevenſis. But the author who has inſiſted moſt fully on this, and all other controverſies relating to Oxford, is the celebrated Anthony Wood, to whoſe account of this matter, little can be added. The ſchools erected by Ælfred at Oxford, were the Great Hall, the Leſſer Hall, and the Little Hall. In the Great Hall was taught Divinity only, and on this foundation there were twenty-ſix ſcholars: in the Leſſer Hall they taught Logic, Muſic, Arithmetic, Geometry, and Aſtronomy; on this foundation there were alſo twenty-ſix ſcholars: in the Little Hall there was nothing taught but Grammar; however, there were twenty-ſix ſcholars alſo entertained here, as well as in each of the other foundations. The firſt Divinity profeſſors were St. Neotus, and St. Grimbald. At the requeſt of the former, it is ſaid Ælfred erected theſe ſchools, and the latter he ſent for from abroad, to preſide in them. The firſt reader in Logic, Muſic, and Arithmetic, was John, a Monk of St. David's, as the reader in Geometry, and Aſtronomy, was another Monk of the ſame name, who was companion to St. Grimbald; and Aſſer, the Monk, read in Grammar, and Rhetorick (78). We have ſhewn, in the text, how theſe ſchools were endowed, not by any grant of lands, but by an annual income out of the Exchequer, which, as well out of regard to the utility of theſe foundations, as from a deep reſpect for their firſt founder, was punctually paid by all the Saxon Kings, until, as ſome ſay, Harold (79), or, as others affirm, William the Conqueror, ſtopped and took them away (80). As to the time in which theſe ſchools were founded, it is not eaſily determined.

this ſort, he was ever mindful of his ſubjects honour, as well as attentive to their eaſe. He repaired all the royal palaces, which the confuſion of the times before his reign had brought to decay, adorned the houſes of pleaſure in the country, and built many from the ground, in ſuch places as were either tempting by ſituation, or ſtood ſo as that he thought the royal Preſence might be ſometimes neceſſary thereabout (o). As he had always a very numerous court, and, above all things, took pleaſure in ſeeing his nobility about him, ſo he ſtruck out a method of doing all this without prejudice to the public; which ought not to be forgotten. He framed three different houſeholds, each under a ſeparate Lord-Chamberlain. Theſe waited in their turns, a month every quarter, ſo that in the year, each of the King's menial ſervants was four months at court, and eight at home (p). In all other reſpects, he was extremely careful to keep up both the dignity and the luſtre of his court; but whether he made uſe of an imperial crown enriched with jewels, is a point which may admit of much diſpute. To conclude his character as a King, than which there is not a brighter in the Engliſh, or perhaps in any chronicles, we ſhall take notice of the manner in which he ſettled his revenue, to which he ſtrictly and conſtantly adhered throughout his life. In the firſt place, he divided it equally, aſſigning the firſt to ſacred, the ſecond to civil uſes. The former he divided into four parts, one to be beſtowed in alms upon the poor in general, another he deſtined for the ſupport of the religious houſes of his own foundation, a third was given to the public ſchools, and the fourth employed in rebuilding or in relieving monaſteries, and other public foundations at home and abroad. The other moiety of his revenue was divided into three parts, one for the ſupport of his houſehold, another for the payment of his workmen, and a third for the entertainment and relief of ſtrangers (q).

In his private life he was the moſt worthy, the moſt induſtrious, and the moſt amiable man in his dominions, of ſo equal a temper, that after he had once taken the crown, he never ſuffered either ſadneſs, or unbecoming gaiety, to enter his mind; but appeared always of a calm, yet chearful diſpoſition, familiar to his friends, juſt, even to his enemies, kind and tender to all. And to this account we ſhould add two things, viz. A deſcription of that care with which he watched over his time, as alſo the pains he was at in dividing it, which, however, would take up too much room here (r) [Q]; and the evidences he gave of his great learning, which muſt likewiſe be referred to a note [R]. Taking all his qualifications together, remembering the many virtues he had, termined. Very probably they were not all built at once, but rather by degrees, as the King's finances would allow, according to his eſtabliſhed rule of ſo executing his new projects as not to prejudice his former deſigns. It is not however likely, that theſe ſchools were ſettled before he repaired London, and conſtituted his ſon-in-law Æthered, Earl of Mercia, becauſe Oxford lay within his territories. There have alſo been ſome queſtions ſtirred as to theſe profeſſors, the reſolution of which cannot be expected here; but the inquiſitive reader may be ſatisfied by conſulting their ſeveral articles in this Dictionary. We ſhall cloſe this note by obſerving, that Ælfred is univerſally acknowledged the founder of Univerſity College at Oxford; and there is ſtill a very ancient painting of this Prince in the maſter's lodgings, as there is a very old buſt of him in ſtone over the door of the refectory in Brazen Noſe College, in the ſame univerſity (81).

(81) There are prints of all theſe in the Reverend Mr. Wiſe's edition of Aſſerius Menevenſis.

[Q] Which, however, would take up too much room here.] We have two accounts of this matter, which at firſt ſight ſeem to differ widely, but when ſeriouſly conſidered, agree well enough. The firſt is, that of Aſſerius, who lived with the King, and wrote what he ſaw (82). He aſſerts, that the King dedicated one half of his time to the ſervice of God. Whereas, William of Malmeſbury (83) aſſerts, that dividing his time into three parts, he devoted the firſt to God, the ſecond to the affairs of his kingdom, and the third to his natural reſt and refreſhment. But as Aſſerius qualifies his account, by telling us, that the King's vow was with many neceſſary reſtrictions, it brings the matter pretty near the other calculation. This diviſion of his time, was, as we have noted, in conſequence of a vow; and that vow was made not in the time of his diſtreſs, but immediately after he had finiſhed his monaſtery at Athelney, when he was in full ſpirits, and in the flower of his age. Aſſerius gives us alſo a very ſingular account of the method he took for dividing his time, and keeping his account of it. He cauſed ſix wax candles to be made, each of twelve inches long, and of as many ounces weight. On theſe candles he cauſed the inches to be regularly marked; and having found that one of them burnt juſt four hours, he committed them to the care of the keepers of his chapel, who, from time to time, gave him notice how the hours went. But as in windy weather the candles were waſted by the impreſſion of the air on the flame; he, to remedy this inconveniency, invented lanthorns, there being then no glaſs to be met with in his dominions (84). That part of his time which he dedicated to ſacred uſes, he ſpent in hearing the public offices of the Church, reading the ſcriptures and books of devotion, in meditation, and in writing. As to the public affairs of his kingdom, he aſſiſted regularly at councils, and performed every thing that was incumbent on him to do. At his leiſure hours he conferred with men of learning, and ſuch ſtrangers as reſorted to his court, of whom there were always not a few; or elſe he went to view his buildings; or, as the ſeaſon of the year directed, to partake of thoſe innocent diverſions which were fit to recreate the mind of a man, and were at the ſame time not unworthy of a Prince, ſuch as hunting, hawking, muſic, in all which he was well ſkilled, and delighted much.

[R] Muſt likewiſe be referred to a note.] In order to give a full and perfect account of what Ælfred performed as a learned man, and a lover of learning, there would be at leaſt as much room neceſſary, as we have employed in giving the memoirs of his life. If he had not been illuſtrious as a King, he would have been famous as an author; as, on the other hand, if we had no memorials of his writings, he muſt have been ſufficiently remembered to poſterity, as a protector of the Muſes. In all probability, the firſt riſe of his love for letters, was occaſioned by his journey to Rome; for at home he could ſee little that looked this way. He tells us himſelf, in an epiſtle prefixed to the tranſlation of Gregory's Paſtoral, that in thoſe days there were very few on this ſide Humber, even amongſt the clergy, who underſtood their own ſervice, or could tranſlate out of Latin into Engliſh, ſo much as an epiſtle (85). He was himſelf twelve years old (if there be no miſtake in the MS.) before he could read his mother-tongue, and then he was allured to it by the Queen his

had, and conſidering that he had few or no vices, we need not wonder, that he died univerſally lamented by his ſubjects, as he lived admired and applauded both by them and his mother. She had a book of Saxon poems which ſhe often read to her ſons; and perceiving they were mightily pleaſed therewith, ſhe promiſed to beſtow it on him who ſhould firſt get it by heart. This taſk Ælfred undertook and performed, without inſtructor or aſſiſtant, and gave thereby an early and wonderful proof of his zeal and induſtry in acquiring knowledge (86). As his authority increaſed, he made uſe of it to increaſe his ſkill in the ſciences; for he invited to his court not only all the learned men that he could hear of in Wales, Scotland, or Ireland; but alſo ſent into France, and other countries, for perſons famous for their ſkill either in the arts or in languages. With theſe he converſed, argued, heard them interpret authors; and as Aſſerius Menevenſis, who was himſelf one of them, tells us, whenever he had a vacant hour he employed it in reading to others, or in hearing others read (87). He alſo forbad all men to execute the functions of magiſtrates, if they were not well verſed in learning; and that this might not bear hard upon poſterity, he compelled by a law ſuch as had competent fortunes, to give their children proper education (88). For the furtherance of this, he built and endowed ſchools all over the kingdom, inſpecting himſelf into the conduct as well of thoſe who taught, as of ſuch as were bred up in thoſe places. By theſe methods, before the end of his reign (as we learn from himſelf), he furniſhed every pulpit in the kingdom with a good preacher, and had as learned a ſet of Biſhops and ſuperior Clergy, as any of his predeceſſors, who yet were famous in their time for their felicity in this reſpect. We ſhall the leſs wonder at this, when we conſider the great proficiency to which the King himſelf arrived in all ſorts of learning. For he was a good Grammarian, an excellent Rhetorician, an acute Philoſopher, a judicious Hiſtorian, a ſkilful Muſician, underſtood Geometry, was an able Architect, and the Prince of the Saxon Poets (89). Of all this he left ample teſtimony to poſterity, in a multitude of admirable works and elegant tranſlations; ſome of which, and the titles of many more, are yet remaining, of which, as it becomes us, we ſhall here give a conciſe account, leſt we ſhould be thought to have been ſparing in our pains, where the fame of ſo great a man, and ſo good a Prince, was concerned. Bale (90), and Pits (91), have each of them a catalogue of this King's works, neither of which are very exact; however, the deficiencies may be ſupplied from other writers. The firſt book mentioned by Bale, is Breviarum quoddam Collectum ex Legibus Trojanorum, &c. lib. i. that is, A Breviary collected out of the Laws of the Trojans, Greeks, Britons, Saxons, and Danes, in one Book. This ſeems to be that collection of laws which is now wanting, and perhaps many who know the credit of Bale and Pits, will think this but an indifferent proof, that ever there was ſuch a work. Let us therefore produce a better authority, which is that of Leland (92), who actually ſaw the book now in queſtion, written in the Saxon tongue, at Chriſt's Church in Hampſhire. 2. Viſi-Saxonum Leges, lib. i. that is, The laws of the Weſt Saxons, in one Book. Pits cites the firſt line of it, and tells us, that it is in Bennet College library at Cambridge. It is in truth, that little ſyſtem of laws which is now extant, and of which we have already given an account (93). 3. Inſtituta Quædam, lib. i. that is, Certain Inſtitutes. This is not taken notice of in the firſt edition of Bale, but it is mentioned by Pits, who cites the beginning of it, whence it ſhould ſeem to be no other than the ſecond capitulation with Guthrum (94). 4. Contra Judices Iniquos, lib. i. that is, An Invective againſt unjuſt Judges, in one Book. That King Ælfred was very ſevere againſt ſuch offenders is certain, ſince Andrew Horne mentions the names of four, who with forty more were hanged by him in one year, for iniquitous practices in the execution of their office (95). 5. Acta Magiſtratuum ſuorum, lib. i. that is, Acts of his Magiſtrates, in one Book. This perhaps is the book of judgments mentioned by Horne, and was, in all probability, a kind of Reports intended for the uſe of ſucceeding ages. 6. Regum Fortunæ variæ, lib. i. that is, The various Fortunes of Kings, in one Book. 7. Dicta Sapientum, lib. i. that is, The Sayings of wiſe Men, in one Book. 8. Parabolæ & Sales, lib. i. that is, Parables and pleaſant Sayings, in one Book. There ſeems to be ſome doubt, whether this ought to be accounted a work of Ælfred's or not. There are various MSS. extant with this title. Part of one is publiſhed by Spelman in the life of this King (96); another fragment is to be found in a work of Dr. Hickes's (97), among Sir Kenelm Digby's MSS. there is another work of this ſort, intituled, Ælfred's Proverbs (98). 9. Collectiones Chronicorum, lib. i. that is, Collections of Chronicles, in one Book. 10. Epiſtolæ ad Wulfſigium Epiſcopum, lib. i. that is, Epiſtles to Biſhop Wulfſig, in one Book. This book is mentioned by Pits; yet, in all probability, it is no more than the epiſtle to Wulfſig, Biſhop of London, prefixed to the tranſlation of Gregory's Paſtoral, by this King (99). 11. Manualæ Meditationum, lib. i. that is, A Manual of Meditations. This was no other than a book of memoranda; and we have in another place given an account how it came into the King's head to collect them. The King called it very ſignificantly in Saxon, Hand-Book, becauſe he had it always in or at hand (100). As to his tranſlations they were theſe, 12. Dialogus D. Gregorii, that is, A Dialogue of St. Gregory's. Pits ſays that there is ſuch a book extant in Bennet college library in Cambridge, but that it appears to have been written by Werebert, Biſhop of Cheſter. Yet ſome, from a paſſage in Aſſerius Menevenſis, think it was tranſlated both by the Biſhop and by the King, for which we ſhall account hereafter. 13. Paſtorale ejuſdem Gregorii, lib. ii. that is, The Paſtoral of Gregory, which ſome aſcribed to the aforeſaid Biſhop. In the prefatory epiſtle before this work, addreſſed to the Biſhop of London, the King himſelf expreſsly ſays, That amidſt the various and arduous affairs of his kingdom, he undertook this tranſlation, which may in Engliſh be called The Herdman's Book, rendering it ſometimes word for word; at other times more freely, according as he received the ſenſe from Pledgmond his Archbiſhop, Aſſer his Biſhop, and Grimbald and John, his Maſs Prieſts (101), for they conſtrued, and the King put their ſenſe into a florid dreſs. This explains the whole affair perfectly, and we need be in no manner of doubt, how far theſe pieces belong to this Prince or to other men. 14. Hormeſtam Pauli Oroſii, lib. i. This tranſlation of Oroſius, is alſo attributed to another perſon (102). 15. Boetius de Conſolatione, lib. v. that is, Boetius's Conſolations of Philoſophy, in five Books. This ſome aſcribe to the Biſhop of Worceſter, others to Aſſerius Menevenſis. It was publiſhed from Junius's tranſcript by Chriſtopher Robinſon, Eſq; at Oxford, in 1698, in 8*vo*. Dr. Plot tells us, King Ælfred tranſlated it at Woodſtock, as he found in a MS. in the Cotton Library (103). 16. Aſſerii Sententiæ, lib. i. that is, The Sayings of Aſſerius, in one Book. 17. Martianæ Leges, lib. i. that is, The Laws of Queen Martia, Widow of Guithelinus, in one Book. 18. Malmutinæ Leges, lib. i. that is, The Laws of Malmutius, in one Book. Theſe laws were firſt tranſlated out of the Britiſh tongue, by Gildas, into Latin, and from this Latin tranſlation, King Ælfred made his verſion, as we are told by Ralph Higden (104), who alſo obſerves, that Ælfred wrote another piece on the Saxon laws, as alſo a third of Dane law, and out of theſe three collections of laws, Edward the Confeſſor framed his laws; and ſomething to the ſame purpoſe we read in Bromton (105). 19. Geſta Anglorum Bedæ, lib. v. that is, The Deeds of the Engliſh by Beda, in five Books, a copy of which is in the public library at Cambridge, with this diſtich thereupon (106).

Hiſtoricus quondam fecit me Beda Latinum,

Me Beda firſt in Roman language wrought;
Me to the Saxons firſt King Ælfred brought.

Add to this, that John Fox, who had ſeen ſome memorials of Ælfred which are not now extant, ſpeaks of his Commentaries which he compiled under the title of the Story of Ælfred (109); and ſomething to the ſame purpoſe we meet with, in the old chronicle called Brute of England.

[S] Admired both by them and by foreigners.] A bare recapitulation of what our beſt hiſtorians have ſaid, would draw this note into an extravagant length, without exhauſting the praiſes which they have beſtowed upon him. In the margin, however, we have cited a few authors, that our apology may not be altogether deſtitute of proof (110). To this we ſhall add, as the proper buſineſs of this work, ſome facts which prove what we have advanced in the text, that Ælfred in his lifetime was equally admired and applauded by his own ſubjects and foreigners. As to the former, we are to conſider that at Ælfred's acceſſion to the throne, he found them ſo dejected that they had no courage to fight, and ſo exhauſted that they had ſcarcely any thing to fight for. Yet in a few years he ſo revived their hopes, and ſo fixed their affections to his perſon, that they were ready to attend him in all ſervices, and to ſubmit to whatever laws he thought neceſſary for their government. From being a lazy and barbarous, they became an active and polite people; and, in conſequence of theſe improvements, grew a greater and more potent nation than they had ever been (111). We have ſeen in the text many inſtances of this ſort, and there is one which we have hitherto omitted, and which comes in very properly here. This King made a vow that he would ſend alms to the diſciples of St. Thomas, in the Eaſt-Indies, and he performed it (112), to the admiration not only of thoſe who were his contemporaries, and ſaw the precious ſtones, perfumes, and other valuable effects, brought back by his ſhips from thoſe Eaſtern climates, but alſo ſuch as lived in ſucceeding ages, when both the courage and the conduct neceſſary to the undertaking ſuch expeditions being wanting, the remembrance of it was the more revered. So great was the fame of this monarch for his knowledge in the art of navigation, and for his generous encouragement of all ſuch as were arrived at any proficiency therein, that Octher, a Dane or a Norman, who was excellently ſkilled both in the theory and practice of this noble art, repaired to the court of Ælfred, made him a tender of his ſervices, and was actually employed, together with Wolſtan an Engliſhman, in an attempt to diſcover the north-eaſt paſſage. Of this voyage there was formerly an authentic account, in a MS. in Sir Thomas Cotton's library (113), which probably was the original of that ſtill extant in Hackluyt's collection (114). But there is ſtill a better account in being, which was given by the King's own pen, in his verſion of Oroſius into Saxon; which account has been tranſlated into Latin, and is to be ſeen in the appendix to Sir John Spelman's life, publiſhed by Mr. Walker. The voyage of Abel, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, into Britain, as it was wholly owing to, ſo it is a moſt noble teſtimony of, the great virtues and extenſive fame of this Engliſh monarch. Neither are we in any doubt concerning the fact, ſince it is related by Aſſerius, who ſaw and converſed with him, and read his letters credential (115). As for the European Princes, they had all correſpondence with, and ſhewed a great eſteem for Ælfred, particularly the Popes who lived in his time, as appears from the Saxon Chronicle, Malmſbury's, and other authentic hiſtories.

[T] Even amongſt our beſt hiſtorians.] The Saxon Chronicle (116) places his death ſix nights before the feaſt of All Saints, or on the twenty-ſixth of October, A. D. 901. The Chronicle of Peterborough (117), which ſeems remarkably exact, places the death of this King in A. D. 901. The Chronicle of Mailroſs (118), aſſigns the fifth of the Calends of November, A. D. 961, for the day of the King's death. Simeon of Durham (119) tells us, he died the fifth of the Calends of November 899. Ralph de Diceto (120) ſays nothing of his death, but he places the acceſſion of his ſon Edward to the throne, in the year 900. Bromton (121) who takes the ſame method, ſays that Edward ſucceeded in 901. Ingulphus (122) fixes his death to the year 900. Ralph Higden (123) hath the ſame date. Alured of Beverly (124) ſeems to place his death in 899, or 900; for he ſays, that he aſcended the throne in 871, and that he reigned twenty-eight years and a half. According to William of Malmſbury (125) he died in 901. Roger Hoveden (126) informs us, that the King deceaſed on the fifth of the Calends of November, A. D. 899. Florence of Worceſter (127), and Matthew of Weſtminſter (128), agree on the twenty-eighth of October, 901. Robert of Gloceſter (129) tells us, he reigned eight and twenty years; and as he places the beginning of his reign in 872, he muſt conſequently have died in 900. Mr. Walker, who is very exact, thinks the moſt certain date to be the feaſt of St. Simon and Jude, A. D. 901, in the fifty-third year of his age.

[U] Occaſioned chiefly by accidents ſubſequent thereto.] The very hiſtory of the corpſe of Ælfred, is not without great ſingularities. One would have thought ſo great, ſo learned, ſo pious a Prince, might have found reſt in his firſt grave, but it happened otherwiſe. He was firſt buried in the cathedral at Wincheſter; but the Canons of that church having a ſpite to his memory, pretended that they were diſturbed by his ghoſt, whereupon his ſon and ſucceſſor, Edward, cauſed his body to be removed to the new monaſtery, which was left unfiniſhed at his death. This ſtory we have both in Malmſbury's (130), and in the larger hiſtory of Wincheſter (131). Here it reſted till the diſſolution of monaſteries, when the pious Dr. Richard Fox, Biſhop of Wincheſter, cauſed the bones of all our Saxon Kings to be collected, and put into cheſts of lead, with inſcriptions upon each of them, ſhewing whoſe bones it contained, all which cheſts he took care to have placed on the top of a wall of exquiſite workmanſhip, built by him to encloſe the preſbytery of the cathedral (132). Here one would have imagined they ſhould have remained out of the reach of danger, ſo long as the wall ſtood. But it ſeems we have ſince had greater Barbarians than either Danes or Normans, who, for ought we know, never attempted to diſturb the aſhes of the dead, eſpecially of Princes; whereas Sir William Waller, General of the parliament forces, after taking the city of Wincheſter, on the fourteenth of December, 1642, entered the cathedral, broke the glaſs windows, deſtroyed the fine monuments, threw down Biſhop Fox's leaden cheſts, ſcattering moſt of the bones all over the church, and carried ſome of them in triumph to other places. Of theſe as many as could be collected, were brought to Oxford, and lodged in the Repoſitory adjoining to the public library (133). Henry of Huntingdon honoured the memory of this excellent Prince, with a copy of Latin verſes (134), that comprize a juſt and elegant character of his many virtues; which induced the famous Leland to tranſcribe them into his account of Ælfred (135), and for this reaſon we doubt not of the reader's being well pleaſed to find them here.

daughter to Earl Æthelred, by whom he had two ſons and three daughters. Of theſe Edward, the eldeſt, ſucceeded him in the throne, and is by moſt of our hiſtorians called Edward the Elder, to diſtinguiſh him from the Confeſſor. His ſecond ſon was Æthelward, the youngeſt of all his children, and bred a ſcholar. His eldeſt daughter Æthelfleda, as Sir John Spelman well obſerves, was a woman of more than feminine ſpirit, and poſſeſſed ſuch a meaſure of her father's virtues, as enabled her to be very uſeful by her advice to her brother King Edward. She married Æthered, Earl of Mercia, and, together with him, had the care of Æthelſtan her nephew. Ælfred's ſecond daughter was called Æthelgeow, or Æthelgora, who was Abbeſs of her father's new foundation at Athelney. His youngeſt daughter, called by ſome Ælfreda, by others Æthelſwith, married Baldwin, Earl of Flanders (w). What care King Ælfred took in providing for theſe, and for all his relations, may be ſeen in an extract from his will, which we have placed in the notes (x) [W]. His fame and fortune conſidered, we need not wonder, that all our hiſtorians have been particularly careful in tranſmitting the memory of his great atchievements to poſterity, or that many conſiderable perſons ſhould compoſe ſpecial memoirs of his life. Amongſt theſe the firſt was Aſſerius Menevenſis, who wrote in the King's life-time, and dedicated his memoirs to Ælfred himſelf, as the reader may ſee in his article. Some would perſuade us that St. Neotus wrote alſo a life of Ælfred, the ground of which miſtake we have ſhewn in the article beforementioned (y). In later times Sir John Spelman compoſed, in Engliſh, the life of this great Prince, which he depoſited in MS. in the Bodleian library, where it remained a long time, before it was given to the public in any ſhape. At laſt it came abroad in a Latin tranſlation, by the ingenious Mr. Chriſtopher Wiſe, accompanied with a very ample comment, by the very learned and induſtrious Obadiah Walker, Maſter of Univerſity College (z). This ſerved only to raiſe a deſire of ſeeing Sir John Spelman's life, as he left it, which after much expectation was gratified, by the laborious Mr. Thomas Hearne, who embelliſhed his edition with learned and curious notes (a). Beſides theſe there is a life of Ælfred, or rather a parallel between the life of Ælfred, and that of Charles I. written by one Mr. Powell, with great ingenuity and learning (b). But after all, it would be doing this nation a very acceptable ſervice, if a perſon equal to the taſk would, from theſe, and other vaſt helps which might eaſily be met with, compoſe a new life of Ælfred, inſerting his laws and other pieces in their proper places, and illuſtrating them, as well as whatever paſſages might require it, with copious diſſertations. This would not only place one of the moſt glorious periods of our hiſtory in a proper light, but would alſo give us a very amiable view of our ancient conſtitution, which, the more it is conſidered and the better it is underſtood, will appear to have been the beſt con-

Of theſe Latin lines we have a very cloſe, and conſidering the time in which it was written, a harmonious verſion by Sir John Spelman, which, for the ſake of the Engliſh reader, we have thought proper to annex (136).

Thy true nobility of mind and blood
(O warlike Ælfred) gave thee to be good.
Goodneſs induſtrious made thee; induſtry
Got thee a name to all poſterity.
'Twixt mixed hopes and fears, 'twixt joy and grief,
Thou ever felt'ſt diſtreſs, and found relief.
Victor this day, next day thou doſt ne'rth'leſs
I' the field diſpute thy former day's ſucceſs.
O'ercome this day, next day for all the blow,
Thou giv'ſt or tak'ſt another overthrow.
Thy brows from ſweat, thy ſword from blood ne'er dry,
What 'twas to reign, ſo to us ſignify.
The world cannot produce ſo much as one
That through the like adverſities has gone,
Yet found'ſt thou not the reſt thou ſought'ſt here,
But with a crown Chriſt gives it thee elſewhere.

[W] Which we have placed in the notes.] This teſtament was firſt publiſhed by Archbiſhop Parker, and hath been ſince very correctly printed by Mr. Wiſe, at the end of Aſſerius de Rebus Geſtis Ælfredi (137). It begins thus: I Ælfred, by the divine favour, by the pains and care of Archbiſhop Æthelred, and by the aſſent and conſent of the nobility of Weſt Saxony, King of the Weſt Saxons, &c. He firſt recites the will of his father Æthelwolf, whereby the crown was entailed on his brothers Æthelbald, Æthelred, and on himſelf. He then proceeds to ſhew the treaties into which he had entered with the laſt poſſeſſor, and how the crown came to be legally his. Then he diſpoſes of his lands, which deſcended to him from his anceſtors, to his eldeſt ſon Edward. Afterwards he bequeaths many eſtates therein ſpecified to his younger ſon. He then gives diſtinct eſtates to each of his three daughters. To Athelm, his brother's ſon, he gives certain lands; and the like to Æthelwald, another brother's ſon; and to Offert, his kinſman, ſeveral townſhips. To Alfwith he gives three towns; he bequeaths each of his ſons five hundred pounds; and to Alfwith and his three daughters, four hundred pounds; that is, a hundred pounds a piece. He gives to each of his ſquires a hundred marks. The ſame ſum to each of his three relations beforementioned. To Æthelred, General of his forces, he gives a ſword, and two thouſand marks. To the Archbiſhop he gives a hundred marks. To three Biſhops, of whom one is Aſſer, Biſhop of Shireburn, a hundred marks each, to be diſtributed for himſelf and his father. He gives alſo two hundred pounds to fifty prieſts, fifty ſhillings to every religious perſon in his kingdom, fifty ſhillings to be diſtributed to the poor, and fifty ſhillings to the church where he ſhould be buried. Theſe legacies he ſays would exhauſt, in his opinion, all that he left behind him; but if it did not, he deſires that the remainder might be employed to like uſes. The latter part of his teſtament is ſpent in directing, that none ſhould preſume to hinder his grants from taking place; in entailing the ſeveral eſtates by him bequeathed, firſt to the heirs male of ſuch as he left them to, and in caſe of failure, to his own relations, according to the limitations of his father's will; and in many other things of a like nature, with many pious exhortations which conclude it. trived, trived, for promoting the glory of the Prince, and the good of the ſubject, that ever the world ſaw, or in all probability ever will ſee, unleſs ſome future Ælfred ſhould ariſe, and reform all the errors that time and accidents have brought into our ſyſtem [X].

[X] That time and accidents have brought into our ſyſtem.] [The truth of the ſtory of Ælfred's going into the camp of the Danes, in the diſguiſe of a common Minſtrel, hath been called in queſtion. 'It is, ſays Mr. Granger, extremely improbable; 'as it is not mentioned by Aſſer, Biſhop of Sher-'borne, who was cotemporary with Ælfred, and 'the moſt authentic writer of his life (138).' Mr. Pegge, in ſupport of the ſame opinion, obſerves, that it 'is a moſt notable ſtory, and Rapin might 'juſtly ſtyle it the boldeſt reſolution that ever enter-'ed into the thoughts of a Prince. But then it is 'of very doubtful authority; for the authors that 'lived in and neareſt the time, appear to know 'nothing of it. Aſſer Menevenſis,—the Saxon 'Chronicle, Fabius Ethelward, and the annals 'Aſſerii, or Chronicon Sancti Neoti, are all to-'tally ſilent about it; and yet they relate the battle 'that followed, and the ſignal victory which Ælfred 'obtained over the Danes at this time. In ſhort, 'I cannot find that any author before the Norman 'Conqueſt ever mentions this particular; not one 'that lived leſs than two hundred years after the 'fact; and, therefore, Mr. Carte is ſo prudent as 'to omit it in his hiſtory, though credulous enough 'in other caſes.' Mr. Pegge farther takes notice, that Aſſer Menevenſis does not ſay a word of Ælfred's ſkill in muſic (139). On the other hand, the credibility of the fact is maintained by two very ingenious, as well as learned Antiquaries, Mr. Thomas Warton and Dr. Percy. Mr. Warton aſſerts, that, notwithſtanding the truth of the anecdote reſpecting Ælfred has been controverted, no ſufficient argument has yet been offered for pronouncing it ſpurious, or even ſuſpicious (140). Dr. Percy has particularly conſidered the objections which have been made to the ſtory, and hath ſhewn, that it is ſupported by good evidence. Mr. Pegge had even diſputed the exiſtence of Minſtrels among the Anglo-Saxons; but his doubts upon that head have been removed by Dr. Percy, to his entire ſatisfaction, as he himſelf hath publickly acknowledged in a letter to the Doctor (141). Whether this acknowledgment includes in it the anecdote concerning Ælfred, doth not appear. The exiſtence, therefore, of Minſtrels among the Anglo-Saxons being admitted, if, at the ſame time, we conſider the reputation in which they were held, and their free acceſs to all places, it will not be deemed improbable that Ælfred ſhould aſſume the diſguiſe of one of them, in order to explore the ſituation of the Daniſh camp. The learned Editor of his Life in Latin, after having examined the ſcene of action in perſon, and weighed all the circumſtances of the event, determines, from the whole collective evidence, that Ælfred could never have gained the victory he did, if he had not with his own eyes previouſly ſeen the diſpoſition of the enemy by ſuch a ſtratagem as is deſcribed (142). A like ſtratagem (under the article Æthelſtan) is related to have been practiſed by Anlaff, a Daniſh Commander; the truth of which hath been attacked by Mr. Pegge, and ſupported by Mr. Warton and Dr. Percy, in the places before mentioned.

The proof which is brought, in the note [L], from Sir John Spelman, of Ælfred's having been the Author of Trials by Juries, is by no means deciſive; and, indeed, very oppoſite ſentiments have been entertained concerning the origin of this excellent inſtitution, and the introduction of it into our own country. Dr. Pettingal, who has found the uſe and practice of it among the ancient Greeks and Romans, and who thinks that from thence the riſe of the Engliſh Jury may probably be deduced, hath ſupported his opinion with much ingenuity and learning (143). The traces of this mode of trial in Germany have been thought to be viſible in the hundred Co-Aſſeſſors, mentioned by Tacitus, as choſen out of the Ingenui, which the lord of a territory had, when he ſat in judgment (144). 'This number, ſays Mr. Carte, prevailed undoubt-'edly among the Saxons, as it did likewiſe among 'all the Northern nations, till ſucceeding times 'gave occaſion to ſome alterations. Thus, among 'the Danes, the number of theſe Aſſeſſors was re-'ſtrained to twelve, in the time of Redner Lode-'brog, and the ſame number is ſtill kept up in 'Sweden. When it was firſt thus reduced in Eng-'land, does not appear from any paſſage in our 'old hiſtorians.' Nevertheleſs, Mr. Carte infers, that this was the eſtabliſhed number in Ælfred's time, from his hanging Cadwine for ſentencing a man to that kind of death without the aſſent of all the twelve Jurors, upon whom he had put himſelf to be tried; and from the laws which he gave to Gothurn. According to the ſame hiſtorian, it is very probable that Ælfred was the firſt author of extending to civil cauſes the trial by jury; which had been, perhaps, uſed before in criminal caſes (145). Sir William Blackſtone contends, that it is a mode of trial which hath been practiſed time out of mind in this nation; and which ſeems to have been coeval with the firſt civil government thereof. He aſſerts, that juries were certainly in uſe among the earlieſt Saxon colonies; that all the nations which adopted the feodal ſyſtem, as in Germany, France, and Italy, had a tribunal compoſed of twelve good men and true; and that in England we find actual mention of ſuch a tribunal ſo early as the laws of King Ethelred, and that not as a new invention. When Stiernhook aſcribes it to Regner, King of Sweden and Denmark, and we to the ſuperior genius of Ælfred, Sir William thinks that we act like the ancient Grecians, who attributed all great exploits to Hercules. 'The truth, he ſays, ſeems to be, 'that this tribunal was univerſally eſtabliſhed 'among all the northern nations; and ſo interwo-'ven in their very conſtitution, that the earlieſt ac-'counts of one, give us alſo ſome traces of the other '(146).' There are not wanting conſiderable names, who refer the introduction of juries into England to a much later period. Dr. Hickes, who finds the original of this inſtitution in Scandinavia, aſſerts, that it was not known to the Saxons, and that it did not take place in our own country till after the Norman Conqueſt. Mr. Barrington, in deference, as it ſhould principally ſeem, to Dr. Hickes's profound knowledge in Saxon learning, gives his ſanction to theſe ſentiments; and Dr. Henry hath advanced the ſame hypotheſis, upon the ſame authority (147). It were to be wiſhed, however, that theſe Gentlemen, inſtead of implicitly relying on the opinion of Dr. Hickes, had examined and refuted the teſtimonies to the contrary, which have been produced ſince Dr. Hickes's time, by Mr. Carte, Sir William Blackſtone, and other writers. Conſidering the ſimilarity of manners and cuſtoms among the ancient northern nations of Europe, it appears in itſelf probable, that the Anglo-Saxons were not wholly unacquainted with trials by juries. And if this method of deciſion had prevailed in Scandinavia from very remote ages, the Danes could ſcarcely be ignorant of it. We cannot, therefore, avoid agreeing with Mr. Warton, that the ſuppoſition of juries not having been introduced into England till after the invaſion of William the Norman, is a later period than is neceſſary (148): but we do not mean to enter minutely into the ſubject.

Non noſtrum inter vos tantas componere lites.

It is aſſerted, in the text of the article of Ælfred, (p. 77) that, though it be a diſputed point, whether he was the firſt who divided the kingdom into ſhires, it ſeems to admit of no diſpute, that he ſettled thoſe boundaries and leſſer diſtinctions, which remain at this day. The fact, however, hath been lately not only diſputed, but abſolutely denied in the following terms, by a very eminent Antiquary, 'The partition of the Saxon kingdom into ty-'things, hundreds, and counties, has been al-'moſt univerſally attributed to the illuſtrious Æl-'fred. Malmeſbury expreſsly aſſerts him to have 'divided his territories into hundreds and tyth-'ings. Ingulphus as expreſsly declares him to have 'modelled them into counties, tythings, and 'hundreds; and nearly the whole body of our 'modern

'modern Hiſtorians and Lawyers have religiouſly 'copied the one, and implicitly followed the other. 'But they are all miſtaken. The tything, hundred, 'and county conſtituted a part of that original 'polity which the Saxons brought with them from 'Germany. And two of them appear exiſting in 'Britain, and all three in France, even ſome ages 'before the time of Ælfred. The tything and 'ſhires are both mentioned in the laws of the Weſt-'Saxons, before the cloſe of the ſeventh century, 'and during the reign of Ina. And the tything, 'the ſhire, and the hundred are noticed among the 'Capitularies of the Franks, before the year 630, and 'the reign of Dagobert. All the three inſtitutions 'would commence originally at one and the ſame 'period, among the kindred nations of the Franks 'and Saxons; and the fact preſents us with a view 'of ſociety, the moſt remarkable that occurs in all 'the varied delineations of hiſtory. It ſhews this 'admirable eſtabliſhment to have been formed 'amid the wilds of Germany. It holds up to us a 'fine police, exiſting among a barbarous people. 'And it exhibits the moſt accurate model of do-'meſtic œconomy, reduced to practice by a military 'nation. The tything makes its appearance in 'France about the beginning, and in England about 'the concluſion of the ſeventh century (149).'

When we conſider the general ignorance of the times in which Ælfred lived, how late it was before he learned to read his own mother tongue, the bad ſtate of his health (which is often mentioned by Aſſerius), and, above all, his continual engagements in wars, and in the adminiſtration of the kingdom; nothing appears ſo extraordinary as his literary character, and his being able to compile or tranſlate ſuch a number of books. Were not the facts ſo ſtrongly atteſted, we ſhould be ready to call in queſtion the accounts which have been given of him in this reſpect. What is mentioned in the note [R], concerning the paſtoral of Gregory, may help, in ſome meaſure, to ſolve the difficulty. With regard to Gregory's paſtoral, Ælfred rendered ſome times word for word, and at other times more freely, according as he received the ſenſe from Pledgmond his Archbiſhop, Aſſer his Biſhop, and Grimbald and John, his Maſs-prieſts. This might be the whole of what he did with reſpect to other works aſcribed to him, if ſome of them were not the entire production of the learned men who attended his Court. They might dictate to the King, and he, as a greater maſter of the elegance of the Anglo-Saxon language, might put what they ſaid into a more agreeable dreſs. Let it be remembered that Aſſer, Grimbald, and John, not being of Engliſh birth, would be leſs capable than Ælfred of expreſſing themſelves with propriety in the Anglo-Saxon tongue (150). It hath, in particular, been doubted, whether this King was the tranſlator of Oroſius. But Mr. Barrington hath vindicated both his claim to the work, and his literary character in general. Mr. Barrington imagines, that ſome of the verſions made by Ælfred might be 'taſks impoſed by his 'preceptors during his youth, who ſeem to have 'made a judicious choice, as Oroſius was the beſt 'ſummary of univerſal hiſtory then known; Bede 'had given an account of the eccleſiaſtical affairs 'of the Engliſh; and Boethius's was, perhaps, the 'beſt treatiſe of moral philoſophy which was then 'read.' 'It is not impoſſible alſo, adds the ſame 'learned author, that his preceptors might have 'corrected ſome of theſe tranſlations, or the King 'himſelf afterwards improved and enlarged them '(151).' If theſe conjectures of Mr. Barrington, which are very doubtful ones, be admitted, the voyages of Ohthere and Wulfſtang, introduced in the firſt book of Oroſius, muſt have been inſerted long after the Verſion was made. By the way, ſome valuable obſervations concerning the Geography of the firſt chapter of the firſt book of Oroſius (including the narrations of Ohthere and Wulfſtang) are given by a great maſter of the ſubject, Dr. Reinhold Forſter, at the end of Mr. Barrington's tranſlation. Ælfred's literary character hath lately been diſplayed to great advantage, by two other writers, Dr. Henry (152) and Mr. Warton. With an extract from Mr. Warton, we ſhall conclude the preſent article. 'Ælfred deſerves particular notice, not only as a 'writer, but as the illuſtrious rival of Charlemagne, 'in protecting and aſſiſting the reſtoration of lite-'rature. He is ſaid to have founded the Univer-'ſity of Oxford; and it is highly probable, that, 'in imitation of Charlemagne's ſimilar inſtitutions, 'he appointed learned perſons to give public and 'gratuitous inſtructions in Theology; but princi-'pally in the faſhionable ſciences of Logic, Aſtro-'nomy, Arithmetic, and Geometry, at that place, 'which was then a conſiderable town, and con-'veniently ſituated in the neighbourhood of thoſe 'royal ſeats at which Ælfred chiefly reſided. He 'ſuffered no Prieſt that was illiterate to be ad-'vanced to any Eccleſiaſtical dignity. He invited 'his Nobility to educate their ſons in learning; 'and requeſted thoſe Lords of his Court who had 'no children, to ſend to ſchool ſuch of their 'younger ſervants as diſcovered a promiſing capa-'city, and to breed them to the clerical profeſſion. 'Ælfred, while a boy, had himſelf experienced the 'inconveniences ariſing from a want of ſcholars, 'and even of common inſtructors in his dominions; 'for he was twelve years of age, before he could 'procure in the weſtern kingdom a maſter properly 'qualified to teach him the alphabet. But, while 'yet unable to read, he could repeat from memory 'a great variety of Saxon ſongs. He was fond 'of cultivating his native tongue: and with a view 'of inviting the people in general to a love of 'reading, and to a knowledge of books which 'they could not otherwiſe have underſtood, he 'tranſlated many Latin authors into Saxon: theſe, 'among others, were; Boethius of the Conſolation of 'Philoſophy, a manuſcript of which of Ælfred's 'age ſtill remains; Oroſius's Hiſtory of the Pagans; 'Saint Gregory's Paſtoral Care; the venerable Bede's 'Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and the Soliloquies of Saint 'Auſtin. Probably Saint Auſtin was ſelected by 'Ælfred, becauſe he was the favourite author of 'Charlemagne (153).'] K.

ÆLFREDUS, ALFREDUS, ELFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, ſon to King Æthelred the Unready, by Emma his Queen, daughter to Richard I. Duke of Normandy (a). He was half brother to King Edmund, ſirnamed Ironſide, and brother of the whole blood to King Edward the Confeſſor. He muſt have been born in A. D. 1003, and was indubitably elder brother to Edward, though Speed (b), and moſt of our hiſtorians, expreſsly ſtyle him the younger ſon of King Æthelred, by Emma. His father's misfortunes falling heavy, it was judged proper to ſend the two young Princes, Ælfred and Edward, into Normandy, there to be bred up, in the court of their uncle Duke Richard. Accordingly, in 1013, thither they were ſent, under the care of Biſhop Ælfhun (c). The Norman hiſtorians take notice of this, but they tell us, that King Æthelred himſelf fled into Normandy, from the fury of King Suanus the Dane, and returning with large ſuccours, left behind him his ſons Ælfred and Edward (d). After the death of Æthelred, Queen Emma marrying King Canutus, her ſons remained ſtill in the Norman court, and were there carefully educated (e) [A]. Duke

[A] Were there carefully educated.] There were many prudential reaſons for ſending theſe young Princes into Normandy. Æthelred had by his former Queen, Elgiva, ſix ſons and four daughters; moſt of them grown up and married (1). The Danes were continually haraſſing this iſland by their invaſions; and the King, though he wanted not either courage or conduct, was ſometimes driven to hard ſhifts

(1) Speed's Chron. p. 422.

Duke Robert was as kind to them, as either his father or brother had been, and perceiving that they were now grown up and fit to govern, he made ſuch preparations for invading England, as alarmed the Daniſh Monarch, and induced him to avoid the ſtorm, by giving them a part of the kingdom of England, rather than run the hazard of letting them land with a Norman army, which might have given them all. But there followed ſmall fruit of this agreement; for their generous protector, Duke Robert, going to the Holy Land, the Dane thought no farther of his treaty (f) [B]. On the death of Canutus, however, Alfred, a brave active Prince, reſolved to venture ſomewhat for the recovery of his right (as he apprehended it) to the Engliſh crown (g). Accordingly, he embarked with a conſiderable body of Norman troops, and arriving in England, had bid fair for diſpoſſeſſing Harold, ſirnamed Harefoot, the ſon of Canutus, of the throne, if the baſeſt treachery had not prevented him. Godwin, Earl of Kent, undertook to King Harold, for his deſtruction, and effected it thus. He pretended to join him, and to aſſiſt him in his deſign; but perfidiouſly drew him and his Normans into an ambuſcade, where, after a ſlight reſiſtance, he and they were made priſoners. This was done in the neighbourhood of Guilford, where the poor Normans were decimated, and the remainder decimated again, exceſſive cruelties being uſed in putting them to death. As for Alfred, he was carried priſoner to the iſle of Ely. At Gillingham (b), his eyes were put out, by the direction either of Earl Godwin, or of Biſhop Livingus (i), then lately promoted from the Abbey of Taviſtock, to the ſee of Kirton or Crediton, in Devonſhire. This cruelty once executed, he was committed to the monks of the monaſtery at Ely, with a ſtrict charge to be watchful over him (k). He ſoon delivered himſelf and them, from all farther apprehenſions, by yielding to death, which ſome, however, ſuſpect to have been violent (l) [C]. Some place this event in 1036, others in 1037. His body was buried in the church of Ely, and his death, in the ſhifts (2). Theſe were cauſes ſufficient, to move him to ſecure his youngeſt children, as well from any unkind uſage from his offſpring by his firſt marriage, as from all hazard of their falling into the hands of the Danes. Normandy, again, was the natural retreat of theſe young men, their mother being ſtiled, by way of eulogy, The flower of Normandy (3). With the Princes, went Ælfhun, Biſhop of London, and their mother, Queen Emma, as alſo a choice guard of 140 men (4). Godwin in his book de Præſulibus, ſplits this Biſhop Ælfhun into two. In his account of the Biſhops of London, he makes Alhunus, the twenty-ninth; and all he ſays of him is, He educated the children of King Ethelred, and went with them into Normandy, A. D. 1013 (5). This is the truth, and accurate enough. But in the detail of the Biſhops of Durham, he mentions Aldwinus, and tells us of him, that he bred up the Princes Alfred and Edward, and went over with them into Normandy, in A. D. 1017 (6). Here therefore is an error in time, as well as in fact. As for Æthelred, he lay with a ſquadron of ſhips at the Iſle of Wight, till he heard of the kind reception Queen Emma met with from her brother, and then he ſailed alſo into Normandy, and remained ſome time there (7).

[B] Thought no farther of his treaty.] The Norman writers aſſure us, that Duke Robert aſſembled a very great army, embarked his forces, and put to ſea with a very gallant fleet; but being toſſed by the fury of the winds and ſeas, and perceiving that it would be impoſſible to land in England, he, with great grief of mind, put into his own ports, and relanded his forces. However, Canutus, who was a wiſe Prince, ſeeing that by this attempt Duke Robert was in earneſt, that his own ſubjects retained ſtill ſuch an affection for the old line of their Kings, as that it would be unſafe for him to bring an army into the field, reſolved to have recourſe to a negotiation, which he began, by ſending two ambaſſadors into Normandy, with the propoſals mentioned in the text. This muſt have happened ſome time before 1030, becauſe then, Duke Robert went to Jeruſalem (8). It was no difficult thing for Canute, to ſet aſide the agreement made with Prince Ælfred, and to aſſign plauſible reaſons for ſo doing. All the children of Edmund Ironſide, and their deſcendants, were before Ælfred in right, and ſo were all the ſons of Æthelred by his firſt wife, and their repreſentatives; and as to the right of conqueſt, which was the beſt title Canutus had, the ſucceſſion founded thereon, was limited by his contract with Emma, to the children of that marriage; and conſequently, belonged to Hardiknute (9). It is not impoſſible, that Queen Emma might influence her ſons after the departure of Duke Robert, and induce them to wait ſome more favourable opportunity. This, however, is conjecture only, hiſtory in this matter affording no farther light.

[C] To have been violent.] The ſtory of Ælfred's expedition, defeat, and death, is one of the moſt perplexed points in the Engliſh hiſtory. Moſt of our hiſtorians take as many circumſtances as they have met with, digeſt them into a clear order, place two or three old chronicles in the margin, and then think they have ſaved themſelves and their readers a great deal of trouble—— only at the expence of a little truth. But as truth is all we aim at, we ſhall remark, I. the variations in point of time. 1. It is placed in 1036, by all the ancient abbey chronicles, and by the celebrated hiſtorians mentioned in the margin (10). Hence, we have ventured ſo to put it in the text. Beſides, the Norman hiſtories concur in this date; and the baniſhment of Emma the next year, in which all writers agree, ſeems a full proof that it really happened in that year, ſoon after the aſſembly at Oxford, when Harold was acknowledged King (11). 2. However, William of Malmſbury ſays, that it was immediately on the death of Harold, before Hardiknute, the ſon of Canutus and Emma, had aſſumed the government, and Bromton mentions the ſame time (12). If this date were to be taken, it would fix the fact to 1039. 3. A third date mentioned is the next year 1040, under the reign of Hardiknute, his brother-in-law (13). 4. Some again, place it after his death, in 1041, when the throne was vacant (14). And this variety, obliged honeſt Robert of Glouceſter, to fix, 5. no date at all; though he tells the ſtory at large. He begins thus,

Vor Alured, hys eldore brother, was erſt aſlawe here
With treaſon in Engelond, ychylle tell in wuch mannere
Atyme, to ſpeak wid hys moder, to Engelonde he com,
An much peple of Normandye myd hym hyder he nome, &c. (15).

II. There are as great, or greater varieties in the circumſtances. For inſtance, ſome ſay Edward as well as Ælfred, came to viſit their mother, who was at Wincheſter; and that Earl Godwin, under pretence of carrying Ælfred to court, fell upon the Normans who accompanied him, and treated them cruelly (16). Others alledge, that Edward and Ælfred, were invited over by their brother Hardiknute; and that the murder was perpetrated by Godwin and Biſhop Livingus, without the King's the opinion of the people, ſeverely puniſhed by God, in the ſtrange death of Earl Godwin (m). As to the abilities of this young Prince, our hiſtorians agree, that they were very great. He had more fire, and much more grandeur of ſoul, than his brother Edward the Confeſſor, which was the true cauſe of his ruin. For Earl Godwin, having propoſed to him his daughter in marriage, he rejected the motion with ſcorn, (which his brother Edward afterwards cloſed with) and ſhewed ſuch a confidence in his Normans, as gave the crafty Earl an opportunity of repreſenting to the Engliſh nobility, that if this Prince became their ſovereign, he would be always ſurrounded by foreigners. This deſtroyed that affection which the nation bore him, and defeated the inquiries afterwards made about his death (n). As to which, ſome ſuſpicions fell upon his mother, Queen Emma. In all probability, they were ill-grounded; but it is certain, ſhe was deeply in the Daniſh intereſt; and her ſon, King Edward the Confeſſor, on that account, more readily believed whatever calumnies were raiſed againſt her (o). The reaſon why this hiſtory of Ælfred's death is ſo obſcured, and ſo diverſly related, is the partiality of contemporary writers. The Saxon chronicle, otherwiſe the moſt accurate as well as circumſtantial hiſtory of theſe times, is altogether ſilent about the matter. The reaſon is plain, becauſe Earl Godwin was ſo deeply concerned, there being manifeſtly a bias, in other places, where facts are not concealed (p). In ſome abbey chronicles, there is but one line, which juſt relates the fact (q). In others, tranſcribed probably after the conqueſt, it is ſaid, That thoſe innocent ſouls, i. e. the Norman ſoldiers, who ſuffered in his cauſe, went to receive in heaven the juſt reward of their loyalty (r). But what ſeems moſt extraordinary is, that, in the celebrated Hiſtoria Elienſis, or Hiſtory of the Monaſtery of Ely, where one might have expected the fulleſt account, there is not ſo much as a word concerning the matter; doubtleſs, becauſe the facts were no way honourable to the fraternity. Rapin's detail of this affair is pleaſant, and well contrived (s). —— But the authorities are (very prudently) omitted.

consent (17). Others affirm, that Emma herſelf had a hand in it; and that ſhe intended alſo to have poiſoned Edward, in order to ſecure all to her ſon Hardiknute (18). In oppoſition to this we are told, from an ancient book called Encomium Emmæ (19); that the traitor Godwin, to get the young Princes into his hands, cauſed forged letters to be ſent them, as from their mother, deſiring them to haſten into England, in order to prevent the uſurper Harold, from ſeating and ſettling himſelf on the throne. Our hiſtorians tranſcribe this epiſtle without ſcruple; and Alford or Griffith hath tranſlated it back into Latin, and publiſhed it in his annals (20). Without queſtion, I ought to have tranſcribed it too, had it been genuine; but doubtleſs it is not. Many circumſtances contained therein, prove this; but I ſhall quote only the title, Emma, Queen only in name, to Edward and Alfred, her ſons, ſendeth motherly greetings (21). It is apparent, that whoever forged this letter, thought Edward the eldeſt ſon, and of conſequence this trick is of a much later date than it pretends to. All the reſt of the tale, that Edward was gone into Hungary, and ſo Ælfred only came over, is of a piece; intended plainly to ſet a gloſs on the character of Queen Emma, who really deſerved it at the hand of the clergy, having been exceedingly bountiful to the church. The Norman chronicles, which could have no bias, ſtate the fact as we ſtate it in the text (22). They ſay that Edward, with a ſquadron of ſhips, and a conſiderable body of Normans on board, ſailed from Harfleur, landed at Winchelſea, and meeting there with an unexpected reſiſtance, were compelled to reimbark, and return to Normandy. Nay, we are told particularly, that Gifford Count Longueville, and many other men of quality, attended Prince Edward in this expedition, which entirely deſtroys the ſtory in the Encomium Emmæ, that Edward was gone into Hungary to ſee his couſins. We have, likewiſe, in the ſame hiſtory, the names of the Norman chiefs, who came with Prince Ælfred, viz. Jean de Harcourt, Almeric de Sez, the Count de Dreux, &c. Many of theſe made their eſcape, when the wicked Godwin ſeized the innocent Ælfred, and with him made priſoners about 1000, or 1200 men (23). Theſe he decimated, but in a new manner, for inſtead of deſtroying one out of ten, as that term naturally implies, he ſaved but one of ten; and thinking even them too many, he decimated them again (24). Nor was his putting them to death leſs cruel, for ſome he beheaded, others he flead, and of thoſe he ſaved, he ſold ſome for ſlaves; which would ſeem acts of incredible barbarity, did not ſo many authors atteſt them (25). It is far from being clear, from the accounts we have, that Ælfred was ever carried to London; and yet it is reaſonable to believe he was there ſhipped for Ely, by the command of King Harold. The induſtrious Leland, from an ancient chronicle written by a monk of Perſhor, has preſerved an account of the place where this poor Prince had his eyes torn out, viz. Gillingham (26). There are in England ſeveral places of this name (27); but the Gillingham here meant, muſt be Gillingham St. Mary, in Clavering Hundred in Norfolk (28). It ſeems thoſe who had Prince Ælfred in cuſtody, landed him at Yarmouth, conveyed him thence to Gillingham, which is nine miles, there put out his eyes, and then carried him to Ely, which is forty miles farther. The paſſage from the chronicle before mentioned, takes notice of the uſage the Prince met there, which is confirmed by a proſe note on Robert of Glouceſter, and other authority; and it was this, They took part of his gut out at his navel, nailed it to a poſt, and by pricking him forced him to run round it, till his whole bowels were extracted (29). If this were ſo, we need not wonder that the Liber Elienſis is ſilent. Yet, as his being buried there is owned, his death ought by thoſe monks to have been better accounted for. It is very remarkable, that Queen Emma, Godwin, and Livingus, then Biſhop of Worceſter, united their intereſts to ſet up Edward the Confeſſor, brother to Ælfred, who yet never loved any of them, or forgot the barbarous uſage of his brother, as may be ſeen in all our hiſtories. It is not perhaps ſo entertaining to the reader, to have facts laid before him in this broken and doubtful way, as when they are handſomely digeſted, and all difficulties thrown out. Yet that plainly turns true hiſtory into romance, and though it amuſes can never inſtruct us. Whereas, in this method, beſides the pleaſure of ſeeing truth, and not an author's fiction, we have an opportunity of making many juſt and uſeful reflections. As in the preſent caſe, 1. We may diſcern the impoſſibility of ſtifling ſuch facts as theſe, which appears by the accounts given by later writers of the murder of Ælfred, notwithſtanding the ſilence of the Saxon chronicle. 2. We gain many lights into other parts of our hiſtory, by tracing this point home. We ſee why the Normans were ſo dear to Edward the Confeſſor, why he was ſo much afraid of Earl Godwin, why he was a little ſuſpicious of his mother, &c. In ſhort, this laborious method of comparing all our ancient authors, were it thoroughly purſued, would really make moſt things clear; whereas, the utmoſt the other method can do, is to make all things ſeem ſo.

ÆTHELSTAN, ATHELSTAN, or ÆTHESTAN, the ſon of Edward, ſirnamed the Elder, the twenty-fourth King of the Weſt Saxons, and of Edgina, the daughter of a ſhepherd (a), who, merely on account of the lowneſs of her birth, is treated, by many ancient, and by moſt modern writers, as a concubine; though the reader will ſee that there are the ſtrongeſt reaſons to believe the contrary [A]. As to the year of his birth, it is not certain, but the circumſtances thereof are curious, and well atteſted. His mother Edgina, when a girl, dreamt, that the moon ſhone out of her belly ſo brightly, that it illuminated all England. This dream ſhe innocently related to an old woman, who had nurſed Prince Edward, in the court of his father, Alfred the Great. The old woman, ſtruck with the thing, as well as with the extraordinary beauty of the girl, took her home, and kept her as her own daughter. Prince Edward, coming thither one day to ſee his nurſe, took notice of the beautiful Edgina, fell in love with her, and had by her this ſon, whom, on account of his mother's dream, he named Æthelſtan, i. e. The moſt noble (b). His grandfather Alfred took extraordinary care of his education, recommending him, in his infancy, to the care of his daughter Ethelfleda; and, when he was grown a boy, to her huſband Ethered, one of the greateſt captains of the age in which he lived. When the young Æthelſtan was grown big enough to be introduced at court, he was brought thither by his tutors; and the wiſe King Alfred was ſo pleaſed with the ſpirit, countenance, and behaviour of the lad, that, to keep my author's words, He bleſſed him for King, after his ſon Edward, by a kind of prophetic ſpirit (c), and then knighted him, giving him a purple robe, a belt ſet with jewels, and a Saxon ſword, in a golden ſcabbard (d). After all this, who can think him a baſtard? It is true, his father married two other wives beſides Edgina, and had children by them both; as by Elfleda the daughter of Earl Ethelin, a ſon called Ethelward, a Prince of great hopes, in temper and countenance extremely like his grandfather Alfred, whom, many think, he would have ſucceeded to the throne, had he ſurvived. But he dying a few days after his father, and the reſt of the ſons of this King Edward the Elder, being in their infancy; Æthelſtan, according to his grandfather's prediction, quietly ſucceeded A. D. 924 [B]. He was ſolemnly crowned by Athelum, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, apud Regiam Villam, that is, At Kingſton upon Thames, which place was before called Moreford, but by reaſon of this, and ſeveral other Princes, making it their place of reſidence, which they did, that they might be nearer at hand to reſiſt the Danes, aſſumed the name of Kingſton, or King's Town (e). Æthelſtan was ſcarcely ſeated on his throne, before a dangerous conſpiracy was formed againſt him, by a certain nobleman, called Alfred, whoſe intent was to ſeize the perſon of his ſovereign at Wincheſter, and to put out his eyes: the plot being diſcovered, and its author apprehended, he ſtedfaſtly denied it, and the King, to ſhew his ſtrict regard to juſtice, ſent him to Rome, there to purge himſelf by oath, before the altar of St. Peter. When he came thither, and had by oath proteſted his innocence, he fell down in a miſerable agony, and being carried by his ſervants to the Engliſh ſchool, died there the third day in great torment. Pope John X. denied his body Chriſtian burial, until ſuch time as he had acquainted King Æthelſtan, at whoſe requeſt it was afterwards granted (f). To this domeſtick treaſon, ſucceeded a war with Inguald, a Daniſh King, and Sithric, who, after killing his brother Neil, had poſſeſſed himſelf of Davenport, in Cheſhire (g). This laſt Prince, who was King of Northumberland, being very powerful, Æthelſtan, on a negotiation, conſented to make an alliance with him, on his renouncing Paganiſm, and to give him his ſiſter Edgitha to wife, which was performed (b). In a year's time, however, Sithric died, and was ſucceeded by his ſons, Anlaff and Guthfert.

[A] There are the ſtrongeſt reaſons to believe the contrary.] Bromton, who tells at large the ſtory of Æthelſtan's birth, though he calls his mother not Edgina, but Edgiva, yet, ſpeaking of the reſt of the children of Edward the Elder, he writes thus: Et ex alia Uxore ſua genuit Edwinum, &c. And by another wife he had Edwin (1); which is a direct teſtimony, that the mother of Ethelſtan was his wife. It is true, that there are ſome other very ancient writers, who do not ſtile her ſo, particularly, Simeon of Durham, whoſe words are theſe, 'Ex 'muliere nobiliſſima Egcuninna, filium ſuum pri-'mogenitum Ethelſtanum, ex Regina autem ſua 'Edgiva filios tres, &c. i. e. By a moſt noble lady 'Egcuninna, he had his eldeſt ſon Ethelſtan, but by 'his Queen Edgiva, he had three ſons (2).' For this manner of writing it is eaſy to account, the mother of Æthelſtan was dead before his father became King; and therefore, though ſhe was Uxor, yet ſhe was not Regina, nor could ſhe be mulier nobiliſſima, any other way than by marriage, ſince her father was a ſhepherd.

[B] According to his grandfather's prediction, quietly ſucceeded.] All the ancient writers of our hiſtory agree in fixing this date, excepting only the Saxon Chronicle, which places it a year later, viz. in 925 (3). However, as there is an apparent confuſion in the MS. in the place where this paſſage occurs, we may well enough ſuppoſe there is a miſtake. In the ſame book, however, we are informed, that Ælfwerdus, the brother of Æthelſtan, died a little after his father, at Oxnaford. It is alſo ſaid, that Æthelſtan was elected King by the Mercians, which is a circumſtance not taken notice of elſewhere: yet it muſt have been true, ſince the ſubſequent conſpiracy was occaſioned by a diſpute at that election, grounded upon his birth, as Malmſbury obſerves (4); at which alſo Rapin hints, though without citing his author (5). However, this election was in conſequence of his father King Edward's laſt Will and Teſtament; and this is another proof of his being his legitimate ſon, ſince it is hard otherwiſe to aſſign a reaſon, why he ſhould ſpecially call him to the ſucceſſion, in preference to his other children, by his Queens. This circumſtance, however, reconciles all the writers on this ſubject. For thoſe who ſay he ſucceeded his father Edward, have in view this deſignation. The Saxon annals, Malmſbury and others, in ſpeaking of his election, have an eye to his confirmation in the regal dignity, by the choice of the nobles at the aſſembly at Kingſton, which choice plainly preceded his coronation.

Theſe

Theſe young men, being zealots for their old religion, immediately broke with Æthelſtan, who the next year drove them out of their dominions; whereupon, Anlaff fled into Ireland, and Guthfert to Conſtantine, King of Scots (i). This affair created him afterwards a great deal of trouble; for though he at firſt carried it with a high hand, and prepared to invade Scotland, to revenge the protection given to the fugitive Prince, yet he ſaw reaſon to accommodate this quarrel, and to make peace with Conſtantine; though a certain author tells us, that he defeated and took priſoners both that King, and Howel, King of Wales, but out of generous compaſſion ſet them at liberty, and reſtored them to their kingdoms, ſaying, there was more honour in making a King, than in being a King (k). If it was ſo, he did not get much by his generoſity: for the King of Scots, burning with a deſire of revenge, or elſe dreading the power of ſo formidable a Prince, concerted a league with many of his neighbours; though hiſtorians are not agreed in what they ſay concerning the time when, or the Kings who entered into this alliance [C]. One of the moſt noted, was Anlaff whom we mentioned before, who returned out of Ireland, and collected an army in order to reſtore himſelf to the kingdom of Northumberland; though others alledge, that this Anlaff was not the ſon of Sithric before mentioned, but another of the ſame name, King of Ireland, and of the Iſles. Whoever he was, his army conſiſted of Danes, Norwegians, Scots, Picts, &c. and he was himſelf a brave man, and a ſkilful officer. With him and Conſtantine, joined Eugenius, King of Cumberland, and ſome other petty Princes; and, after four years preparations, they drew together a great army, and marched therewith to (*) Bruneford, in Northumberland, near which place Æthelſtan had pitched his camp. While both armies lay here, Anlaff being deſirous to ſurprize his enemy in his camp, went thither in the diſguiſe of a harper, and having played from tent to tent, was at laſt, for his ſkill in muſic, brought to play before the King, which he did ſo harmoniouſly, that at his departure he had a conſiderable reward given him, which, ſcorning to take away, after he came out of the royal tent, he cut up a piece of turf with his knife, and hid the money under it, which being ſeen by a ſoldier, he obſerved him more narrowly, and diſcovered who he was. When he was gone, the ſoldier went and acquainted King Æthelſtan, who chid him for not ſpeaking ſooner. But the ſoldier excuſed himſelf, by ſaying, that he formerly ſerved in Anlaff's army, and had ſworn fidelity to him; wherefore had he betrayed him, it might have induced a ſuſpicion, that he would have betrayed alſo his preſent maſter. To prevent the bad effects of this, he adviſed the King to remove his tent, there being reaſon to believe that Anlaff would that night make ſome attempt to ſurprize his quarters. This advice was approved and followed, and, as the event ſhewed, with good reaſon; for in the midſt of the night, Anlaff, with a choſen body of forces, broke into the camp, and cut to pieces a Biſhop and his retinue, who had pitched their tents where the King's ſtood. But the confederates did not long enjoy the ſatisfaction reſulting from this ſucceſs. Æthelſtan came down with his forces divided into two bodies, the firſt commanded by himſelf, which charged Anlaff and his troops; the other by Turketul, the King's Chancellor, and near kinſman, who fell upon Conſtantine and Eugenius. The Scotch made a gallant defence until their King was ſlain, and then they were broken, which ſo intimidated Anlaff's army, that they alſo fled, and left their King to retire as well as he could (l). This is ſaid to have been one of the bloodieſt battles ever fought in this iſland: but the circumſtances relating to the loſs of the allies are ſo various, that, to avoid perplexing the text, we have thrown them into a note [D]. To perfect his favourite deſign, of making himſelf Supreme Lord of the iſland,

[C] The Kings who entered into this alliance.] As to the wars of King Æthelſtan, eſpecially againſt the Scots, it cannot be denied that there is a great deal of confuſion, in what the ancient writers tell us about them. Simeon of Durham places the reduction of the Reguli, or little Kings, in 926, or the third year of this King's reign (6); whereas Bromton places both that and the viſion of St. John of Beverley, of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, a year after (7). This is the reaſon that we have expreſſed ourſelves ſo generally in the text. But there ſeems to be greater certainty, with reſpect to the invaſion of Scotland by this Prince in 934, or the eleventh year of his reign. For with regard to this, the Saxon chronicle and the beſt hiſtorians exactly agree (8). In this expedition the King meeting on the road with many pilgrims who had been at the ſhrine of St. John of Beverley, and had there, as they ſaid, been cured of lameneſs, blindneſs, and other diſeaſes, he thereupon ordering the army to march on, went himſelf in pilgrimage to the ſame ſhrine; and having beſought the ſaint to afford him his aſſiſtance in the war which he had undertaken, he left his knife as a pawn for the due performance of the vows he there made. Some time afterwards, St. John appeared to him in a viſion, promiſed his aſſiſtance, and greatly encouraged the King, who, having totally defeated the Scots, and obliged Conſtantine their King to ſubmit to him, thereupon put up another petition to the ſaint, viz. That he would ſhew ſome ſign that might convince the Scots their kingdom depended, jure divino, on that of England. In conſequence of this prayer, he, with his ſword, cut an ell deep into a rock near to his camp at Dunbar, and left that chaſm as an indubitable mark of his ſovereignty over the country (9). Rapin ſays, that theſe things are unworthy of repetition (10). But however abſurd the ſtory may be, it ought not to be forgotten, ſince the ſtone at Dunbar is gravely inſiſted on by King Edward I. in his letter to Pope Boniface, wherein he ſtates his right over the King and kingdom of Scotland (11). If at this time we ſuppoſe he reſtored, under certain conditions, the crown to Conſtantine, King of Scots, then the reſt of the hiſtory will run ſmoothly enough, ſince the great invaſion made by Conſtantine, in conjunction with Anlaff, King of Ireland, happened exactly four years after this; nor can there be a more probable cauſe aſſigned than this attempt of Ethelſtan, to ſet up a divine right to other people's countries, for ſo many princes entering into a league againſt him.

[D] We have thrown them into a note.] This great battle is the moſt remarkable thing which happened in King Æthelſtan's reign, and indeed it is of the utmoſt conſequence to the clearing of our hiſtory, to ſet this whole war in a proper light. In the firſt iſland, and to attain the ſole dominion over, not only the Saxon, but all the other nations alſo inhabiting therein; Æthelſtan, with his victorious army, after this glorious victory, prepared to go immediately againſt the Welſh, or rather the ancient Britons. In the mean time, however, the fame of his great exploits, induced Henry ſirnamed the Fowler, then Emperor, to demand one of his ſiſters in marriage for his ſon Otho; Hugo, King of the Franks, alſo deſired another for his ſon; and Lewis, Prince of Aquitain, ſent an embaſſy to deſire a third for himſelf. On this occaſion, greater preſents were ſent into England, than had ever been ſeen before, and the glory of Æthelſtan's court far exceeded that of any of his predeceſſors (m). He was no leſs ſucceſsful in his expedition againſt the Welſh; for having beaten them in the field, he cauſed Ludwal, King of Wales, with all his petty Princes, to meet him at Hereford, where they did him homage, and promiſed to pay him a yearly tribute, of twenty pounds of gold, three hundred pounds of ſilver, and twenty-five thouſand beeves, with as many hawks and hounds as he ſhould demand. He likewiſe expelled the Britons, who had hitherto dwelt together with the Engliſh in Exceſter (Exeter), and forced them to retire into Cornwall, making the river Tamara the boundary of his dominions on this ſide, as he had fixed the Vaga on the other (n). He governed henceforward in peace and glory, made many wiſe laws for the benefit of his ſubjects [E], and rendered himſelf the moſt admired Prince of the age in which he lived, on account of his wiſdom, wealth, and the great extent of his dominions, which were much wider than thoſe of Ælfred his grandfather (o) [F]. The only blemiſh on his reign, is the ſuppoſed murder, or putting wrongfully to death, of his brother Edwin, which is in itſelf ſo improbable, and all things place then, we will unravel the difficulty about Anlaff, whom ſome make King of Northumberland (12), moſt hiſtorians King of Ireland (13); and Buchanan, without naming him, King of the Danes (14). That he was a great and powerful Prince, may be inferred, not only from the great army he led againſt the Saxons on this occaſion, but alſo from his coins which are ſtill remaining (15), and of which we had a fight whilſt we were writing this note. That he was not King of Denmark we are ſatisfied, by inſpecting the catalogue of their Kings, wherein we find that Harold was at this time Monarch of that country (16). From the Iriſh hiſtorians it is clear, that he was no Prince of theirs (17); yet the authors who ſpeak of him, are not however ſo much miſtaken as at firſt ſight they may ſeem. Sithric, his father, was not only King of Northumberland, but held alſo, by conqueſt, part of Ireland, and many of the iſlands between it and Scotland (18), which dominions came alſo to his ſon, who came now with the forces he had raiſed in Ireland and the Iſles, to aſſert his right to Northumberland, which had been yielded by Alfred the Great, to his anceſtors (19). On the whole therefore, Anlaff was King of the Danes in Ireland, and came from thence with his fleet into the Humber, where he debarked his army, and afterwards joined Conſtantine, King of Scots, the King of Cumberland, and his other allies, with whom he offered Ethelſtan battle (20). Simeon of Durham places this battle in 937 (21), but the Saxon Chronicle (22), Bromton (23), and the beſt hiſtorians in 938 (24). There is a long elaborate deſcription of this fight, in the Chronicle before mentioned, as well as many other ancient authors, all of whom agree that it was fought from morning till night, and that it was one of the moſt bloody that ever happened in England. They alſo agree, that five Kings and ſeven Dukes were here ſlain; but the Saxon Annals admit, that Conſtantine eſcaped, though he loſt his eldeſt ſon (25); and Bromton ſays expreſsly, that both Anlaff and Conſtantine eſcaped (26). Buchanan's account of this battle is equally obſcure and abſurd, for he does not allow that Conſtantine was preſent, and yet admits that diſcontent for his loſs induced him to reſign the crown (27). If we may credit the Monks, another miracle was wrought in this battle in favour of Æthelſtan, who dropping his ſword in the field of battle, another fell from heaven into his ſcabbard, at the prayer of Otho, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, which drawing from thence, he fought with the reſt of the day (28).

[E] Many wiſe laws for the benefit of his ſubjects.] The great fame of our Æthelſtan aroſe from his laws, of which we have two editions; one by Lambard, amongſt the reſt of the laws made by the Saxon Kings, and the other by Abbot Bromton in Latin (29). It would take up too much room to give even the heads of theſe laws, for they are very many, and very curious. Mr. Selden ſpeaks of them very reſpectfully (30), and indeed the peruſal of them lets us into the knowledge of the Saxon antiquities, and thereby renders the hiſtory not only of thoſe times, but alſo the grounds of our conſtitution as it ſtill ſtands, clear and eaſy. Such as are not very well verſed in the matter, or who find it difficult to underſtand the Latin of Bromton, which is indeed not over claſſical, may have recourſe to Dr. Howel, who in this, as in all other things, hath treated the Engliſh hiſtory with great ſkill and impartiality (31). On account of theſe laws, this King is mentioned by all the authors who have written expreſsly of Engliſh writers; and to ſay the truth, Bale is more exact than uſual, in the account he gives us of his writings. He wrote, ſays he, one book of ancient laws corrected, another of new ones, and a third of conſtitutions for the government of the clergy. He likewiſe mentions his cauſing the Bible to be tranſlated out of the Hebrew into the Saxon tongue, which Bale ſuppoſes to have been done by certain Jews, converted to the Chriſtian faith (32). All the writers of his life, and indeed all the Monks who have written the lives of Biſhops under his reign, commend Æthelſtan not only as a moſt religious, but as a moſt wiſe and learned Prince, favoured by, and a friend to, the muſes. Leland particularly tells us, that he found in the library of the monaſtery at Bath, ſome books which had been given by this Prince to the Monks. One of which, a treatiſe De ſynodis Pontificiis, he brought from thence, and placed in the library of King Henry VIII. with this inſcription (33):

things conſidered, ſo ſlenderly atteſted, that it does not, as we apprehend, deſerve a place in the text of this life, though for the thorough underſtanding of it, we have placed an ample account thereof below (p) [G]. As to his perſon, we are told that he was of the ordinary ſize, of a merry countenance, his hair of a bright yellow, ſtooping a little in the ſhoulders. He was extremely brave, conſtant in his reſolutions, ſecret in

'part of Albion, Britain, over which the Britons 'ruled, viz. within the wall of Adrian, or when 'they ſtretch their dominions fartheſt, within the 'wall of Severus, ſo that the Scots and Picts are 'treated by them as foreigners, and people out of 'Britain. When therefore the Engliſh hiſtorians 'read in their old writers, that the Engliſh reigned 'over all Britain, they underſtand theſe authors ſo 'as if they included Albion; whereas they, as I 'ſaid before, circumſcribe Britain within narrower 'limits (34).' It muſt be allowed, that this author gives a very graceful colouring to his own opinion, if indeed it was his opinion, after reading what the old Engliſh Hiſtorians ſay, ſince nothing is clearer than that the old authors he mentions, eſpecially Jeffrey of Monmouth (35), expreſsly ſay, that the Scottiſh princes, whom they call Kings of Albania, were ſubject to the Britiſh monarchs. As to King Æthelſtan, all the writers of his reign ſpeak of his ſubduing Scotland as far as Dunbar. But Simeon of Durham tells us, that in the year 934, which is the ſame year wherein he made that expedition with a land army, he, with his fleet, waſted all the coaſts as far as Caithneſs (36); ſo that the Engliſh writers were not ſo wretchedly ignorant of the bounds of Albion, as Buchanan would repreſent them. With reſpect to the ſtile of Æthelſtan, it was this: King of the Engliſh, Scots, Cumberlanders, Danes, and Britons, and if we may give credit to charters (37), as well as to what our ancient hiſtorians ſay, he was not nominally only, but effectually ſo. Beſides, what was it that Conſtantine ſtruggled for, ſo long and ſo obſtinately? Buchanan himſelf admits, that Æthelſtan formed no pretenſions on his dominions. He fought therefore to avoid owning him for his Sovereign, and the true reaſon for his reſigning the kingdom, and retiring amongſt the Culdees, was probably this, that his reſignation might make void his ſubmiſſion to Æthelſtan, which is the more likely, conſidering he did it with the conſent, perhaps from the direction, of the ſtates, who aſſembled for this purpoſe at Abernethy (38). The impartial reader will obſerve, that we do not pretend to determine any thing as to the rights of the Britiſh or Saxon Kings over thoſe of Scotland. We only endeavour to ſet ſuch paſſages of hiſtory as have been wilfully obſcured, in their true and natural light, to illuſtrate what is dark in one author, by what is more plainly ſaid in another, and thereby to diſcover truth with certainty. We have ſaid in the text, that the dominions of Æthelſtan were much wider than thoſe of his grandfather Ælfred. It is neceſſary that we ſhould eſtabliſh this fact. In the firſt place then, the Scots and Welſh, who were but homagers to Ælfred, were tributaries to Æthelſtan. Secondly, he diſpoſſeſſed the Welſh, or Britons, of conſiderable tracts, which they ſtill held in the Weſt. Thirdly, he recovered Northumberland, which had been yielded to the Danes. And fourthly, he was in full and peaceable poſſeſſion of all theſe acquired advantages, at the time of his deceaſe, and tranſmitted not the ſame only, but the poſſeſſion, to his brother and ſucceſſor, Edmund.

[G] We have placed an ample account thereof below.] The buſineſs of Edwin's death, is a point the moſt obſcure in the ſtory of this King; and, to ſay the truth, not one even of our beſt hiſtorians hath written clearly, or with due attention concerning it. The fact, as commonly received, is this. The King, ſuſpecting his younger brother Edwin, of deſigning to deprive him of his crown, cauſed him, notwithſtanding his proteſtations of innocency, to be put on board a leaky ſhip, with his armour-bearer and page. The young Prince, unable to bear the ſeverity of the weather, and want of food, deſperately drowned himſelf. Some time after, the King's cup-bearer, who had been the chief cauſer of this act of cruelty, happened, as he was ſerving the King at table, to trip with one foot; but recovering himſelf with the other, See, ſaid he pleaſantly, how brothers afford each other help; which ſtriking the King with the remembrance of what himſelf had done, in taking off Edwin, who might have helped him in his wars, he cauſed that buſineſs to be more thoroughly examined; and finding his brother had been falſely accuſed, cauſed his cup-bearer to be put to a cruel death, endured himſelf ſeven years ſharp penance, and built the two monaſteries of Middleton and Michelneſs, to atone for this baſe and bloody fact (39). Dr. Howel, ſpeaking of this ſtory, treats it as if very indifferently founded; and on that account unworthy of credit (40). Yet it muſt be owned, that all the ancient writers almoſt ſpeak of it as a thing certain. Simeon of Durham writes, that in the year 933, King Ethelſtan commanded, that his brother Edwin ſhould be drowned in the ſea (41). Abbot Bromton tells the ſtory at large (42), and after him moſt of the later writers as uſual; that is, with an addition of various circumſtances, ſo that it cannot be ſaid, this ſtory is without foundation. Buchanan hath improved it very happily. Thus it runs in his writings: 'They, 'that is the Engliſh writers, make this Æthelſtan 'guilty of parricide, in killing his father and 'his two brothers, Edred and Edwin, whoſe 'right it was to ſucceed their father in his king-'dom. Fame increaſes the ſuſpicion, that Ed-'ward was violently put to death, becauſe it attri-'butes to him the title of martyr (43).' Buchanan cites no authority whatſoever for this, becauſe indeed there could be no authority cited. Whatever he did by Edwin, moſt certainly Ethelſtan did not murder Edred, ſince he not only ſurvived, but ſucceeded him in the kingdom. As for the murder of his father, that is the pure effect of Buchanan's ignorance. He miſtook Edward the Elder, who was really the father of Æthelſtan; for Edward the Martyr, who began his reign in 975; that is, five and thirty years after Æthelſtan was in his grave. Such is the accuracy of this writer. In like manner Rapin gives us this ſtory, without the leaſt mark of doubt or heſitation (44); and yet we preſume there are ſome ſtrong reaſons againſt the credit of this whole ſtory, and ſtill ſtronger againſt that part of it, which alledges Edwin to have been unjuſtly put to death. Simeon of Durham, and the Saxon Chronicle, ſay no more, than that Edwin was drowned by his brother's command, in the year 933 (45). Bromton places it in the firſt, or at fartheſt, in the ſecond year of his reign; and he tells us the ſtory of the rotten ſhip, and of his puniſhing the cup-bearer (46). William of Malmſbury, who is very circumſtantial, ſays he only tells us what he has heard (47); but Matthew the Flower-gatherer (48), ſtamps the whole down as an indubitable truth. Yet theſe diſcordant dates are not to be accounted for. If he was drowned in the ſecond, he could not be alive in the tenth year of the King. The firſt is the more probable date, becauſe about that time there certainly was a conſpiracy againſt King Athelſtan, in order to dethrone him, and put out his eyes; yet he did not put the author of it to death: is it likely then that he ſhould order his brother to be thrown into the ſea upon bare ſuſpicion? But the reader muſt remember, that we cite the ſame hiſtorians who have told us this ſtory, to prove that Æthelſtan was unanimouſly acknowledged King, his brethren being too young to govern; one would think then, they could not be old enough to conſpire. If we take the ſecond date, the whole ſtory is deſtroyed. The King could not do ſeven years penance, for he did not live ſo long; and as for the tale of the cup-bearer, and his ſtumbling at the King's table, the ſame ſtory is told of Earl Godwin who murdered the brother of Edward the Confeſſor. Laſtly, nothing is clearer from hiſtory, than that Æthelſtan was remarkably kind to his brethren and ſiſters, for whoſe ſakes he lived ſingle, and therefore one would think his brother had leſs temptation to conſpire againſt him.

his councils, and courteous to all men, a great encourager of learning, and, if we credit Tindal (q), ordered the Bible to be tranſlated into the Saxon tongue, for the uſe of his ſubjects. It does not appear that he was ever married; and as to the years of his reign, there is ſome diſpute. For on the one hand we are told that he reigned fifteen years and upwards, and that he died at Glouceſter, the twenty-ſeventh of October 940 (r); and on the other, that he reigned ſixteen years, and deceaſed in 942 (s): though it muſt be allowed, that theſe different accounts may be in ſome meaſure reconciled [H]. [H] May be in ſome meaſure reconciled.] As to the death of this King, the Saxon Chronicle tells us, that he died on the twenty ſeventh of October, 941 (49), and that he had then reigned fourteen years and ten weeks, which reckoning muſt neceſſarily place the beginning of his reign, in the month of July 927, which is inconſiſtent with the account given in theſe Annals themſelves, wherein it is placed in 925 (50); wherefore in this caſe their authority is of no weight. Simeon of Durham tells us, that he died on the twenty-ſeventh of October, anno 940, in the ſixteenth year of his reign, at Glouceſter, and was buried at Malmſbury (51): with this account agrees that of Florence of Worceſter, and of the beſt hiſtorians (52), yet Abbot Bromton tells us, he reigned eighteen years (53), if there be not a miſtake either in the MS. or printed copy, which ought the rather to be ſuſpected, becauſe this is utterly inconſiſtent with his other dates. For he places the acceſſion of Æthelſtan in 924, the acceſſion of his brother Edred in 947; he ſays that Edmund reigned after Æthelſtan ſeven years, which plainly ſhews, that Æthelſtan died in 940, and in the ſixteenth year of his reign, as the other hiſtorians ſay. So that theſe diſcordances are moſt certainly owing to errors committed by tranſcribers, and not to the authors themſelves. C.

AGARD (ARTHUR) a learned and induſtrious Antiquary (a), was the ſon of Clement Agard, of Toſton in Derbyſhire, by Eleanor, the daughter of Thomas Middleborough, of Egbaſton in Warwickſhire (b). He was born A. D. 1540, and educated in ſuch a manner as to fit him for the practice of the Law, though it does not appear he was at either of our univerſities (c). In proceſs of time he became a clerk in the Exchequer-Office, and in 1570 attained the office of Deputy-Chamberlain of the Exchequer, under Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Knt. which place, under many Chamberlains, he held forty-five years (d) [A]. The great love he had for Engliſh antiquities led him to make large and laborious collections, and his office gave him an opportunity to acquire much ſkill in thoſe branches of an Antiquary's ſtudy, which are moſt intricate, and attended with the greateſt want of materials (e). A conformity of ſtudies brought him to an acquaintance with the celebrated Sir Robert Cotton (f), with whom he held the ſtricteſt intercourſe of friendſhip as long as he lived. Anthony Wood indeed tells us, that (g) while Mr. Agard held his place in the Exchequer, he learned and received all his knowledge and learning in antiquities, from his faithful and dear friend Sir Robert Cotton. Which, however, is not over probable, becauſe Mr. Agard came into his office the ſame year, preciſely, that Sir Robert Cotton was born (h). Such ſometimes are the Oxford Antiquary's aſſertions! Beſides Sir Robert Cotton, we find that Mr. Agard had the moſt eminent and learned men in the kingdom for his friends and acquaintance. There was in his days, though the time when it was erected is not clearly ſtated, a moſt illuſtrious aſſembly of learned and able perſons (i) ſet on foot, who ſtyled themſelves a Society of Antiquaries; and Mr. Agard was one of its moſt conſpicuous members, as appears from diſcourſes read therein, and ſince printed. We owe the publication of theſe very valuable eſſays, to the induſtrious Mr. Hearne, who yet has given a very indifferent account of them and their authors in the preface (k), as we ſhall ſhew in the notes [B]. [A] Under many Chamberlains he held forty-five years.] When he came into it, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was Chamberlain, viz. in 1570, from whence one may conjecture, this gentleman was raiſed thereto by his favour, which is the more likely, ſince Sir Nicholas was a man of great abilities himſelf, and loved to diſtinguiſh merit. He died on the 12th of February 1571 (1), and was ſucceeded by Sir Thomas Randolph, another learned and worthy Knight, who deceaſed on the eighth of June 1590 (2). After him Sir Thomas Weſt was Chamberlain. His ſucceſſor, George Young, Eſq. After him Sir Walter Cope, Knt. who had for his ſucceſſor Sir William Killigrew, Knt. in whoſe place came Sir John Poyntz, to whom our author was Deputy, at the time of his demiſe (3). Wood obſerves, that formerly this was a place of great honour and worth. I find that the fee was fifty-two pounds three ſhillings and four-pence, and thirteen pounds (4) for a livery, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and there were two Chamberlains. This place ſtill keeps its credit. Indeed ſo does the Deputy's place, having the cuſtody of many valuable records at this day, thoſe particularly which Mr. Agard ſpent ſo much pains about, for which his memory is ſtill had in great honour there (5).

[B] As we ſhall ſhew in the notes.] Mr. Hearne publiſhed this book in 1720, under the title of A Collection of curious Diſcourſes, written by eminent Antiquaries, upon ſeveral heads in our Engliſh Antiquities. Before it is a preface containing 134 pages, dated from Edmund-Hall, Oxon, March 26, 1720. In this preface, after a long account what ſort of an aſſembly a Society of Antiquaries ought to be, he proceeds thus (6): In the time of Queen Elizabeth, and King James I. there was ſuch a Society, made up of right learned Antiquaries, that uſed to meet together, and as they undertook great matters, ſo their performances were anſwerable to their undertakings; and had they went on, there is no doubt but by this time we had had a complete account publiſhed, of the moſt material things in our hiſtory and antiquities. But it being ſuggeſted that the ſaid Society would be prejudicial to certain great and learned bodies; for that reaſon, the members thought fit to break it off. Nor were there wanting very powerful men that proved enemies to them; and, among other things, they were pleaſed to alledge, that ſome of the Society were not only diſaffected to, five discourses in that collection, and another of a much older date (l); it is not known that our author Agard hath more in print, though these are sufficient to justify what we have said of him, and to shew that in English antiquities he had few equals, and perhaps no superior [C]. In the particular business of his office, he was not only expert, but understood it to the bottom, as is clear from his discovering Richardus filius Nigelli, to be the author of Dialogus de Negotiis Scaccarii, which generally goes under the name of

to, but really of a quite different persuasion from, the Church of England. The reader sees, that here are facts, but no dates or authorities. The discourses Mr. Hearne published, were bequeathed to him by the very learned Dr. Thomas Smith, who died May 11, 1710, and who himself intended to have published them (7). This worthy person, in his life of Sir Robert Cotton, had long before given the public a clear and distinct account of them (8). He fixes the rise of this Society of Antiquaries about 1590. He tells us, that the main point they aimed at, was to collect and bring into one place all the MSS. coins, seals, &c. which were scattered through the kingdom; that the study of antiquity might not be the work (as it is) of a man's whole life; and then to get themselves incorporated by charter. It was proposed that a college or public building should be erected at the expence of the friends to this undertaking, in which all the remains of the plundered libraries of old monasteries, &c. should be deposited: that the society should be honoured with the Queen's name; consist of a president, and a certain number of fellows, who should reside in lodgings, adjoining to the intended college; and out of whom two should be annually chosen curators of the library, &c. that they should be subject to a quinquennial visitation, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Chancellor, the High Treasurer, the Lord High Admiral, the Lord Chamberlain, the Principal Secretary of State, and Chief Justice of England. It was this scheme, largely set forth by Dr. Smith, as having been warmly (though vainly) solicited by Sir R. Cotton, both in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, that alarmed, though without reason, the universities; and without knowing this, we must have framed a false notion of the thing. But, notwithstanding this disappointment, the society still continued. They met in term-time only, sometimes at the lodgings of Mr. Dethick, in the College of Arms, and at others in some of the members houses. Their method was to state the question to be canvassed, then to summon the members to a place mentioned in the summons, and to collect from such as gave their opinions, their reasons, and authorities in writing. Of such discourses, but whether of the respective authors penning, or collected by the member who officiated as secretary, is, I think, uncertain, Mr. Hearne's collection consists. Of such amongst these, as were composed by Mr. Agard, we shall treat in the next note; at present, let us conclude our account of this society. Under a Prince so fond of learning as King James, and who besides professed a personal respect for Sir Robert Cotton, one might have reasonably supposed this learned assembly should have met with encouragement, or at least protection. Yet, so it was, that their canvassing certain questions relating to the state and government, gave such umbrage to this monarch and his council, that upon signification thereof to the society, they dissolved, or to speak with greater propriety, discontinued their assemblies, about 1614 (9). What induced us to treat of this matter here, was, that Mr. Agard's name stands first in the list of members, as given us by Dr. Smith; and as there is abundant matter for Sir Robert Cotton's life, without introducing therein an account of this society, it could no where, in this work, come in more naturally. For though Sir R. Cotton was the more considerable man, yet Mr. Agard must have had a greater share in the erection of this useful assembly, since, at the time fixed by Dr. Smith, Sir Robert Cotton was scarcely twenty, and was of course a lover of antiquities, rather than an antiquary. It remains, that we add here, a list of the members of this society; which, from Dr. Smith, Mr. Hearne, and the assistance of a learned person, who desires to be concealed, we are able to render more ample, and more accurate than any hitherto published.

Whoever considers this list attentively, will need not many words to convince him that scarcely any other can be produced so honourable for this nation, or for the commonwealth of letters. Let us compare this society in 1590 with the French academy, which pretends to no higher antiquity than 1629 (10). Let us examine the design of each, and let us compare the figure made by the respective members of each body, and we shall know what to think of the state of learning in France, and in Britain, at that period. We may thence also borrow another piece of useful knowledge, how much we of this age stand indebted to these industrious inquirers; but for whom our antiquities had been, by this time, rubbish, not worth the raking into.

[C] He had few equals, perhaps no superior.] In order to support this, we shall add to what is said in the text, the titles of Mr. Agard's discourses which have been printed. 1. Opinion touching the antiquity, power, order, state, manner, persons, and proceedings of the high court of parliament in England. Published with the like essays of Sir John Dodderidge, Joseph Holland, Francis Tate, and William Camden, all members of the society before mentioned (11). But since Wood informs us, that Bishop Barlow doubted whether this work was genuine, we will say no more of it (12). 2. On this question (13), Of what antiquity shires were in England? In this discourse, various ancient MSS. are cited, and Mr. Agard inclines to think King Alfred was the author of this division, because it plainly appears the lesser divisions were made by that Prince. This discourse was delivered in Easter Term 33 Eliz. 1591. 3. On the Dimensions of the Lands of England (14). In which our author, with great judgment and learning, settles the meaning of these words, Solin, Hida, Carucata, Jugum, Virgata, Ferlingata, Ferlinges, from ancient MSS. and the authentic records in the Exchequer. This discourse was read on November 24, 1599. 4. Of the authority, office, and privileges, of Heraults (Heralds) in England (15). He gives it as his opinion, that this office is of the same antiquity with the institution of the Garter. In this discourse also he observes, that John, Earl of Bedford, caused a herald from certain rebels in Cornwall to be hanged, because rebels are not entitled to the law of arms. 5. Of the antiquity and privileges of the houses or inns of court, and of chancery (16). In this very short discourse, our author observes, that in the more ancient times, i. e. before the making of Magna Charta, our lawyers and judges were of the clergy: that in the time of Edward I. the law came to receive its proper form; and that in of Gervaſius Tilburienſis (m), on which, (each ſuppoſing it his own) two modern antiquaries would have raiſed ſome reputation. But Mr. Madox, who had been charged with borrowing it from Mr. Anſtis, profeſſed his innocence, and owned, that the ſecret they contended about, had been long before known to our author, Agard, who communicated it to the famous Selden (n). The Dooms-Day Book, our author had made his chief and peculiar ſtudy; and that his labours might be uſeful to poſterity, he compoſed a large and learned work, on purpoſe to explain it (o), under the title of Tractatus de uſu & obſcurioribus verbis libri de Domeſday, i. e. A Treatiſe of the uſe and of the true meaning of the obſcure words in the Domes-Day Book. Which was preſerved in the Cotton library, under Vitellius, No. 9. He likewiſe beſtowed three years hard labour in compiling a book for the eaſe of his ſucceſſors, and which was alſo for the conveniency of the public. It conſiſted of two parts, the firſt, A catalogue of all ſuch records as were in the four treaſuries belonging to his Majeſty; and the ſecond, An account of all leagues, and treaties of peace, intercourſes, and marriages, with foreign nations. Of this treatiſe he took ſuch care, as ſhewed at once his prudence, and public ſpirit. He depoſited it with the officers of his Majeſty's Receipt, and took order, that the ſame ſhould paſs by inventory, as being for the good of the ſubject; and a proper index for ſucceeding officers (p). He, likewiſe, directed by his Will, that eleven other MS. treatiſes of his relating to Exchequer matters, ſhould, for a ſmall reward paid to his executor, be delivered up to the office. All the reſt of his moſt valuable treaſure of collections, containing at leaſt twenty volumes, he bequeathed to his old friend, Sir Robert Cotton, in whoſe library, as many as remain, are yet to be found (q). For, notwithſtanding his great induſtry, and his making ſo much uſe of his pen, his modeſty would not allow him to publiſh any thing. After having thus ſpent his days in honour, and a learned tranquility, he thought of death before it came, and cauſed a monument to be erected for himſelf and his wife, near the chapter door in the cloiſter of Weſtminſter Abbey, in which, dying on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt 1615, he was, ſome time in the ſame month, interred. Mr. Camden (r), to whom we owe this date, ſtyles him, Antiquarius inſignis, i. e. A moſt excellent antiquary, which is ſufficient to eſtabliſh his general character. The famous Mr. Selden, in the index to his Titles of Honour, publiſhed the year before our author died, viz. 1614 (s), ſpeaking of the author of Dialogus de Negotiis Scaccarii, ſays, I confeſs it was obſerved to me by Mr. Agard, a man known to be moſt painful, induſtrious, and ſufficient, in things of this nature. This is mentioned as an inſtance of his abilities in his profeſſion, and, taking theſe teſtimonies together, we can hardly conceive too highly of Mr. Agard's merit [D].

[D] We can hardly conceive too highly of Mr. Agard's merit.] [In the preface to the Archæologia, an account is given of the Antiquarian Society of Queen Elizabeth's and King James the Firſt's reigns, which is ſomewhat different from that we have in the note [C]. According to the Archæologia, the foundation of the ſociety may be fixed to 1572, and the honour of it is entirely due to that munificent patron of letters and learned men, Archbiſhop Parker. The members met near twenty years at the houſe of Sir Robert Cotton; and in 1589, reſolved to apply to the Queen for a Charter of Incorporation, and for ſome public building, where they might aſſemble and have a library. A petition for this purpoſe, a plan of the inſtitution, and the reaſons upon which it was founded were ſigned by Sir Robert Cotton, Sir John Dodderidge, and Sir James Lee. Whether the petition was preſented, and what was its ſucceſs, does not appear. The author of Mr. Carew's life ſays, that their hopes were fruſtrated by the Queen's death. There is a tradition ſubſiſting, that ſome grant had been obtained, which was forfeited by the diſcontinuance of the ſociety. However, the learned perſons thus aſſociated were probably countenanced by her Majeſty. They continued to meet till her death; and, under the auſpices of the Archbiſhops, the ſociety flouriſhed and increaſed exceedingly. It is certain, that the Archbiſhops Parker and Whitgift were its preſidents. When the ſociety became more reſpectable for the number of its members, its meetings were held at the apartments of Sir William Dethicke, Garter King at Arms, in the Heralds Office, eſtabliſhed in 1555. More than one perſon wrote, or ſpoke, on each ſubject propoſed. None but members were admitted to the meetings; and the queſtions propoſed were referred to the conſideration of ſuch members as were thought beſt qualified. The liſt of the members for the thirty years during which the ſociety ſubſiſted, as given in the Archæologia, differs from that already inſerted in this article, by adding the names of Richard Broughton, Lord William Compton, William Lambart, and Robert Weſton; and by leaving out thoſe of Richard St. George, and John Selden. The ſociety ſubſiſted till James the firſt, alarmed for the Arcana of Government, and, as ſome think, for the eſtabliſhed church, thought fit to diſſolve it. Members were admitted into it to the end of the year 1604. About 1617, a propoſal was made to the Marquis of Buckingham for its revival, but without ſucceſs (18)] K.

his way thither, as he paſſed through Pavia, he purchaſed, for an hundred talents of ſilver, and one of gold, St. Auguſtin's arm, which was kept there as a relic, and ſent it over to England, as a preſent to Leofric Earl of Coventry (b). Upon his return, he is ſaid to have raiſed the ſee of Canterbury to its former luſtre. He was much in favour with King Canute, and employed his intereſt with that Monarch to good purpoſes. It was by his advice the King ſent over large ſums of money for the ſupport of the foreign churches; and Malmſbury obſerves (c), that this Prince was prompted to acts of piety, and reſtrained from exceſſes, by the regard he had for the Archbiſhop. King Canute being dead, Agelnoth refuſed to crown his ſon Harold [A], alleging that the late King had enjoined him to ſet the crown upon none but the iſſue of Queen Emma (d); that he had given the King a promiſe upon this head, and that he was reſolved to be true to his engagement. Having declared himſelf with this freedom, he laid the crown upon the altar, with an imprecation againſt thoſe Biſhops who ſhould venture to perform the ceremony. Harold, who was greatly chagrined at this diſappointment, endeavoured, both by menaces and large offers, to prevail upon the Archbiſhop, but in vain; and whether he was afterwards crowned by any other perſon, is altogether uncertain. Agelnoth, after he had ſitten ſeventeen years in the See of Canterbury, departed this life, the 29th of October 1038, and was ſucceeded by Eadſius King Harold's Chaplain (e). At this time (as an hiſtorian obſerves) the Monks of the church of Canterbury lived with the latitude of Prebendaries [B]. This Archbiſhop was an author, having written; 1. A Panegyric on the bleſſed Virgin Mary. 2. A Letter to Earl Leofric concerning St. Auguſtin. 3. Letters to ſeveral perſons (f).

[A] Agelnoth refuſed to crown King Harold.] After the deceaſe of Canute, who died at Shaftſbury, and was buried at Wincheſter, the kingdom was divided about the ſucceſſion. The Daniſh intereſt at London, and elſewhere, declared for Harold Harefoot, ſon of Canute and Elgiva of Northampton. The Engliſh diſapproved this choice, and were inclined to ſet up Edward ſon of King Ethelred; or, if that point could not be carried, they deſired that Hardicanute, ſon of Canute by Queen Emma, might be the perſon. Edward's party was quickly found too weak to continue the competition. At laſt the two Daniſh brothers agreed to the expedient of a compoſition. Hardicanute had all the counties which lay ſouth of the Thames, and Harold the reſt. This conteſt being finiſhed, Hardicanute ſet ſail for Denmark; where ſpending too much time, and not returning at the invitation of the Engliſh, his ſubjects thought themſelves diſengaged, and ſuffered Harold to ſeize the whole kingdom. Queen Emma, Hardicanute's mother was baniſhed, and forced to retire into Flanders, where ſhe was honourably entertained by Earl Baldwin (1).

[B] The Monks of Canterbury lived with the latitude of Prebendaries.] The Danes having beſieged Canterbury, and maſſacred all the Monks, excepting four; the clergy who were taken in to fill up the vacancy, continued partly to live as before, refuſing to be wholly tied up to the reſtraints of a monaſtery. They wore indeed the religious habit, but with very little obſervance of the rule. They called their ſuperior a Dean; who afterwards, from Archbiſhop Lanfranc's time, had the title of Prior (2). B.

AGLIONBY (John) an eminent divine, was born of a genteel family in Cumberland, and admitted a ſtudent of Queen's College in Oxford, in the year 1583. Being elected Fellow, he thereupon went into Holy Orders, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a polite and learned preacher. Afterwards he travelled abroad, and was introduced to the acquaintance of the famous Cardinal Bellarmin [A]. After his return, he was made Chaplain in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth, and, in 1600, took the degree of Doctor of Divinity. About that time he obtained the rectory of Iſlip, near Oxford, and ſoon after was elected Principal of St. Edmund's Hall. He was likewiſe Chaplain in ordinary to King James I.; and is ſaid to have had a conſiderable ſhare in the tranſlation of the New Teſtament appointed by that King in 1604 [B]. He died at Iſlip, the 6th of February 1609-10, aged forty-three, and was buried in the chancel of the pariſh church. He was well accompliſhed in moſt kinds of learning, profoundly read in the Fathers and School-Divinity, and a great critic in the languages (a).

[A] He was introduced to the acquaintance of Cardinal Bellarmin.] Mr. Wood tells us, that the Cardinal, one day pointing to the picture of Dr. William Whitaker, of Cambridge, which hung up in his library, ſaid to Mr. Aglionby, that he was the moſt learned Heretic that he ever read (1). This Dr. Whitaker had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his controverſial writings againſt the Papiſts.

It is not unlikely that he might be aſſiſting in the tranſlation, purſuant to the rules agreed upon by the tranſlators; one of which was, that letters be ſent from every Biſhop to the reſt of his clergy, putting them in mind of the tranſlation in hand; and charging thoſe, who have ſkill in the languages, and have bent their ſtudies that way, to ſend their obſervations to the committees, either at Weſtminſter, Cambridge, or Oxford. B.

AIDAN, or AIDANUS, was the ſon of Goran, or Goranus, King of Scotland [A]. He was very young at the time his father was murdered by conſpirators, of whom Donald of Athol was the chief. This happened in the year 535. Eugenius, the

In the hiſtories of Boethius and Buchanan, he is called Aidanus (1), but Bede calls him Ædan (2); in the Saxon annals, his name is written Ægthan (3), Jeffery of Monmouth call him Adan (4). But theſe are trivial differences. As to the facts, and even as to the dates, all the old hiſtorians agree perfectly well. It was, therefore, thought proper to inſert this life in this dictionary, in order to ſhew that our ancient the nephew of the laſt King, and the couſin of Aidanus, ſucceeded in the throne (a). He had ſerved long under the celebrated Arthur King of the Britons, and as he was a good officer, ſo he was alſo a wiſe Prince, but withal a man of great art, inſomuch that he diſſembled all concern for his uncle's murder, and even took into his favour Donald of Athol, who was the prime author of it (b). This ſo much alarmed the Queen Dowager, that notwithſtanding he made a great ſhew of friendſhip towards her and her family, yet ſhe took the firſt opportunity of retiring with her two ſons, Reginan and Aidan, then about ſeven years old, into Ireland, where they were very kindly received by Tuathalius, the reigning King (c). There the Queen and her eldeſt ſon died; but Aidanus continued there, not only during the long reign of Eugenius, but alſo during that of his brother Congallus, that is, throughout the ſpace of forty-eight years. But this laſt mentioned King, conſidering the wrong done to the right heir of the crown, directed the famous St. Columb to bring him home, which that good man performed. But when they arrived in Scotland, they underſtood that the King was dead, and that the Scots had ſet his brother Kennatillus upon the throne. Columb, however, having firſt aſſiſted at the burial of the deceaſed Prince, went afterwards with Aidan to court, where, to the ſurpriſe of all men, the new raiſed King received them with much civility and kindneſs, telling Aidanus, he ſhould for the preſent aſſiſt him in governing the kingdom, which would ſhortly become his, to whom of right it pertained (d). This fell out accordingly; for the King being old and infirm died, as he had foreſeen, and our Aidan ſucceeded in his ſtead, according to Hector Boetius, in the year 578. He was crowned King of Scotland in the Marble Chair, by the hand of St. Columb, who made a noble oration on that occaſion, exciting the Prince to juſtice, and the people to obedience. Immediately after his coronation, Aidan went into Galloway, where he reduced certain robbers, who had done great miſchief. He then inſtituted annual aſſizes in Galloway, Lochabar, and Caithneſs (e). But theſe works of peace were ſuddenly interrupted. Some of the young nobility quarrelled at a hunting match, and bloodſhed following, thoſe who were moſt guilty, or at leaſt moſt afraid, retired into the dominions of Brudeus, King of the Picts. Aidan, in virtue of a treaty with that Prince, often demanded them, and was as often refuſed. At length he entered his country, and carried off a great number of priſoners, with abundance of cattle. The Pictiſh Prince reſenting this, made alſo an inroad, and did great miſchief in Galloway. In the end, a general engagement happened, wherein the Picts were routed with great ſlaughter, the Scots alſo loſing many men, and amongſt them, the King's ſon Arthur. This battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Dunkell. St. Columb hearing of this war, came to the King, and upbraided him with his too great readineſs to ſhed blood, which made that Prince ſo uneaſy, that he would not part with that excellent man, till he had promiſed him to negociate a peace, which he did with ſucceſs (f). The Saxons were now poſſeſſed of England, having driven the Britons into Wales. Ethelfrid who reigned then in Northumberland, was a moſt crafty, and withal a moſt ambitious Prince. He projected the conqueſt of the Pictiſh kingdom, but perceiving himſelf too weak to effect it, he excited Brudeus to break the peace with the Scots, hoping by this means to weaken him, and thereby obtain a more eaſy prey. Aidan, being informed of theſe negociations, concluded a league offenſive and defenſive, with Maelgwyn, King of the Britons (g). The Saxons, as ſoon as they were acquainted with this, determined to invade the Britiſh territories, that thereby they might draw the Scots out of their own country, and have them at the greater diſadvantage. This policy of theirs ſucceeded, for Aidan, like a juſt Prince, marched inſtantly to the aſſiſtance of his allies, and joining the Britiſh army, offered Ethelfrid and Brudeus battle, which, however, they declined for two reaſons. One was, that they might the more weary the Scots; the other, that they might give time to Ceuline, King of the Weſt Saxons, to join them. Aidan and his confederates being aware of their intention, reſolved to attack Ceuline, before his junction ſhould render them too powerful: this they performed with great bravery, and having forced their camp, cut to pieces a very conſiderable number of their enemies, amongſt whom was Cutha, the King of the Weſt Saxons ſon. This, however, did not hinder the remainder from joining their friends, and offering Aidan battle a ſecond time. In this engagement, though he behaved gallantly, yet he was very unfortunate, for he loſt his ſon Griffin, and his ancient hiſtory is not ſo uncouth, ſo uncertain, or ſo inconſiſtent, as ſome would perſuade us. It is indeed a little ſtrange, that we admit without ſcruple, ſuch hiſtorical fragments, as yet remain of the ancient Kings of Attica, and take pains to ſettle the ſucceſſion of the firſt Kings of Macedon; though neither of their kingdoms in thoſe times could exceed the bounds of one of our counties (5); and yet give up our own hiſtory as dark and fabulous, though at the diſtance of many ages from thoſe times, and infinitely clearer, more rational, and better ſupported, than either the Greek hiſtory before the Peloponneſian war, or that of Rome before the expulſion of her Kings. He muſt certainly be a critical and ſharp-ſighted reader, who in this hiſtory of Aidan, wherein is touched the ſtate of every one of the nations then ſettled in the Britiſh iſlands, can diſcern any thing of abſurdity or of fable. And why we ſhould give up the actions of all our anceſtors to oblivion, in order to find leiſure to decypher the antiquities of other people, is a thing for which no good reaſon can be aſſigned. It muſt be granted, that before the publication of our ancient hiſtories, tranſactions of ſuch antiquity might appear very dubious; but they cannot be thought ſo now, when confirmed by ſo many different authorities, and ſuch a variety of facts.

nephew Brennius, who was Thane or Earl of Man. But this was far from being a bloodleſs victory to the Saxons and Picts, who, beſides a great number of private men killed, had both their Princes wounded, Ethelfrid loſing one of his eyes, and Brudeus receiving a deep cut in his hip (b). The next ſummer, Ethelfrid joined the Picts early, and with a numerous army invaded Galloway. Aidan was more ready to receive them than they expected, and taking advantage of their ſtraggling about the country, he cut off ſeveral of their parties, and perceiving that theſe loſſes made them keep cloſe in their camp, he marched ſilently by it in a dark night, and joined the Britons. After this, they encamped in a narrow valley in Anandale. There the Saxons and Picts ſurrounded them with a great army, and, ſeizing all the paſſages, perſuaded themſelves they ſhould eaſily and totally rout their enemies. Aidan conſulting, as well with Conſtantine and Menrein, the Britiſh Generals, as with Callan and Murdach, his own Generals, they made a ſhew of ſtrongly fortifying their camp, as if therein they meant to wait for their attack, and when they had ſo done, lighting up a multitude of fires, they decamped in the night, and, paſſing certain rivers the Saxons deemed not fordable, ſuddenly entered Northumberland, and deſtroyed all the country with fire and ſword. This compelled the Saxons and Picts to follow them, and, ſoon after their arrival in the ſame country, a pitched battle enſued, wherein, after an obſtinate engagement, the Saxons and Picts were totally routed with prodigious ſlaughter, Ceuline, King of the Weſt Saxons, being killed upon the ſpot, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. After this great victory, King Aidan cauſed all the ſpoil, which they had brought out of Galloway, and which now fell into his hands, to be reſtored to the right owners. This done, he gave a tenth of the remaining booty to be diſtributed in alms: the reſt was equally divided amongſt the Scottiſh and Britiſh ſoldiers. All the trophies of this conqueſt, he cauſed to be tranſported to the iſland of Colmkill, to St. Columb, there to remain in his abbey (i). After this, he governed his kingdom in peace about eleven years, and then Ethelfrid prevailed on the Picts to renew the war. Aidan, though he was very old, marched to the place where the Britiſh army ſhould have joined him; but his allies failing him, gave his enemies a great advantage over him, ſo that attacking him with a ſuperior army, they cut the greateſt part of his forces to pieces, the King himſelf narrowly eſcaping. In this battle fell Theobald, King Ethelfrid's brother, which ſhews that it was no eaſy victory. However, its conſequences were ſo fatal, that the thoughts of them, and the news of St. Columb's death, brought the good old King in ſorrow to his grave, in the year 606, when he had reigned thirty-two years, and lived ſeventy-eight (k). There are certain circumſtances in this King's hiſtory [B], which, becauſe they are not mentioned either by the Scotch or Engliſh hiſtorians, we have thought proper to inſert in the notes, being unwilling to place any thing in the text, which is not perfectly clear and certain.

[B] Certain circumſtances in this King's hiſtory.] St. Adamnanus, in his life of St. Columbanus, or Columb, tells us, how prophetically he marked out to the King Aidan, which of his ſons ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdom. This ſtory is preſerved in the hiſtory of Scotland, printed in the firſt volume of Hollingſhed's collection, but very imperfectly, becauſe of his abſolute want of ſkill in the ancient Scottiſh language (6). The fact in few words ſtands thus. About the year 584, King Aidan was in the Iſle of Man, and there preſented his ſons to St. Columb. They were in number eight, viz. Arthur, Eochod Finn, i. e. the White, Domangard, Eochod Buidhe, i. e. Yellow (Hollingſhed calls him Eugenius, and tells us he was alſo called Brudus); Tuathalius, Boetan, Conang, and Gartnad. St. Columb paſſing by the three eldeſt, laid his hand on Eochod Buidhe, or Eugenius the Yellow. This ſon, ſaid he, and his heirs, ſhall be heirs of your kingdom, for the other three ſhall fall in battle againſt your enemies; which came accordingly to paſs (7). The Iriſh chronicles take notice, that in 590, King Aidan paſſed over into that country, and was preſent at a council held there, which is very probable, ſince he had lived ſo many years in Ireland, and it is very likely married there (8). Bede gives a very circumſtantial account of the great defeat King Aidan received from Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, which he tells us happened in the year 603, at a place called Degſaſtane; the defeat being ſo total, that to this day, ſays he, that is, to the year 731, the Scots have never dared to enter Britain, or offer battle to the Engliſh; which circumſtance is alſo taken notice of in the Saxon Annals, where this battle is placed in the ſame year (9). C.

[What our ingenious predeceſſor hath here remarked is worthy of attention. It is certainly right to inquire into our ancient hiſtory, to gain as exact a knowledge of it as we can; and to ſeparate, if poſſible, truth from fable. But, after all, we are afraid that the accounts given of Aidan are not entirely free from doubt and difficulty. And we are the more confirmed in this opinion, when we reflect that ſo perfect a maſter of the Scottiſh hiſtory, as Sir David Dalrymple, hath begun his Annals of Scotland with the acceſſion of Malcolm III. in the year 1057; becauſe the hiſtory of Scotland, previous to that period, is involved in obſcurity and fable.] K.

berland [B], to inſtruct that Prince's ſubjects in the knowledge of the Chriſtian religion [C]. At his coming to Oſwald's court, he prevailed upon the King to remove the epiſcopal ſee from York, where it had been ſettled by Gregory the Great, to Lindisfarne, or Holy Iſland [D]. He was very ſucceſsful in his preaching; in which he was not a little aſſiſted by the pious zeal of the King, who having lived a conſiderable time in Scotland, and acquired a ſufficient knowledge of the language, was himſelf Aidan's interpreter, and explained his diſcourſes to the nobility, and the reſt of his court (b). After the death of Oſwald, who was ſlain in battle, Aidan continued to govern the Church of Northumberland, under his ſucceſſors Oſwin and Oſwi, who reigned jointly; the former in the province of Deira, the latter in that of Bernicia. Bede tells us a remarkable ſtory concerning King Oſwin and Biſhop Aidan [E]. This holy Biſhop, having foretold that Prince's untimely death, was ſo afflicted for his loſs, that

The iſland itſelf was ſubject to Britain, from which it was ſeparated only by a ſmall arm of the ſea: but by donation of the Picts, who inhabit thoſe parts of Britain, it had been given to the Monks of Scotland, as an acknowledgment of their converſion by the preaching of the latter.*'

[B] He came into England at the requeſt of Oſwald King of Northumberland.] This Prince, being ſenſibly affected with the advantages of Chriſtianity, and deſirous that his ſubjects ſhould partake of the ſame privilege, had ſent into Scotland for ſome perſon of learning and character to inſtruct them. The Scotch clergy immediately diſpatched away a Miſſionary (2) for that purpoſe. But this eccleſiaſtic, being of a rugged and ſevere diſpoſition, was greatly diſliked by the Engliſh; inſomuch that, finding himſelf unſucceſsful in his miſſion, he returned home, and reported to his countrymen, that the Engliſh were an untractable people, bigotted to Paganiſm; and that it was impoſſible to convert them. Aidan, who was preſent, turning himſelf to the Prieſt, ſaid: 'Your want of ſucceſs, brother, 'ſeems to me to be owing to your want of conde'ſcenſion to the weakneſs of your unlearned hearers; 'whom, according to the apoſtolical rule, you 'ſhould firſt have fed with the milk of a milder 'and leſs rigid doctrine, till, being nouriſhed by 'degrees with the word of God, they were become 'capable of reliſhing the more perfect and ſublime 'precepts of the Goſpel.' Videtur mihi, frater, quia durior juſto indoctis auditoribus fuiſti, & non eis juxta apoſtolicam diſciplinam primo lac doctrinæ mollioris porrexiſti, donec paulatim enutriti verbo Dei, ad capienda perfectiora & ad facienda ſublimiora Dei præcepta ſufficerent (3). This diſcrete and judicious ſpeech was highly applauded by the aſſembly, and it was unanimouſly reſolved that Aidan deſerved the honour of the epiſcopal character, and was the beſt qualified to convert the Engliſh. Whereupon he was preſently conſecrated, and ſent upon that employment (4). It may be thought ſtrange, perhaps, that King Oſwald ſhould ſend into Scotland for a miſſionary to inſtruct his ſubjects in the Chriſtian religion; and that he did not rather re-call Paulinus, who had been driven from the ſee of York (5), or employ the miniſtry of James, whom Paulinus had left in Northumberland. But it muſt be conſidered, that Oſwald had been inſtructed in religion by the Scotch; and had imbibed an averſion for the miſſionaries ſent from Rome, on account of the diverſity of ſentiments between the Scotch and the Romaniſts, in relation to the celebration of Eaſter (6), and the tonſure of prieſts.

[C] —— to inſtruct the Northumbrians in the knowledge of the Chriſtian religion.] The kingdom of Northumberland had received the Chriſtian faith by the preaching of Paulinus, Archbiſhop of York, in the reign of King Edwin, who died in 633. But that Prince being ſlain in battle, and the deſolation, to which Northumberland was expoſed, having obliged Paulinus to quit the kingdom, the Northumbrians returned in crowds to idolatry. Anfrid and Oſric, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, followed the example of their ſubjects, though they had embraced the Chriſtian religion in Scotland. And thus the knowledge of the true religion was almoſt extinguiſhed in that country; and this wretched ſtate continued nearly two years, till Oſwald mounted the throne in 634 (7).

(7) Vide Hiſtor. Angl. ſub annis, 633, &c.

[D] He prevailed with the King to remove the epiſcopal ſee from York —— to Lindisfarne or Holy Iſland.] Bede tell us, Lindisfarne is not really an iſland, but part of the main land; and that, by the flux and reflux of the ſea, it is twice a day ſurrounded with water in the manner of an iſland, and as often left dry. Qui videlicet locus accedente & recedente reumate bis quotidie inſtar inſulæ maris circumluitur undis, bis renudato littore contiguus terræ redditur (8). It is a peninſula, joined to the coaſt of Northumberland by a very narrow neck of land, and called Holy Iſland from its being inhabited chiefly by Monks (9). But though the epiſcopal ſee was ſmall, its juriſdiction was very extenſive: for the Biſhops of Lindisfarne preſided over the whole kingdom of Northumberland, according to the received diſcipline of the antient Engliſh Church, in which there was but one Biſhop to each kingdom. Quantumvis autem arcta fuerat Sedes, Diœceſis erat latiſſima: toti ſiquidem Northumbrorum regno epiſcopi Lindisfarnenſes præfuerunt, juxta diſciplinam apud antiquos uſque ad Theodori archiepiſcopi tempora receptam, qua ſingulis regnis ſinguli epiſcopi præſidebant (10). The author now cited, tells us, that Aidan and his ſucceſſors, as far as Wilfrid, neither knew nor affected the metropolitical dignity, though they ſucceeded to the rights of Paulinus, Archbiſhop of York, who had received the pall, and obtained the title of Metropolitan. Nor had they any intercourſe with the Roman Pontiff: for, beſides that they acknowledged no foreign Biſhops ſuperior to themſelves, they celebrated Eaſter (*) in a manner different from the Church of Rome. *Paulino itaque in ditione ſucceſſerunt, neutiquam tamen in dignitate. [E] A remarkable ſtory concerning King Oſwin and Biſhop Aidan.] King Oſwin had given Biſhop Aidan a fine horſe. Some time after, the Biſhop happening to meet a poor man upon the road, who begged his charity, diſmounted and gave him the horſe with its rich houſings. The King hearing this was diſpleaſed, and, the next time the Biſhop came to dine with him, accoſted him in the following manner: My Lord, why were you ſo prodigal of my favour, as to give away my pad to a beggar? If there was a neceſſity of ſetting him on horſeback, could you not have furniſhed him with one of leſs value; or if he wanted any other relief, you might have ſupplied him another way, and not have parted ſo eaſily with the preſent I made you. To which the Biſhop replied; Your Majeſty ſeems not fully to have conſidered the matter: for otherwiſe you would not ſet a greater value on the ſon of a mare than on a ſon of God (12). Upon this no more paſſed, and they ſat down to dinner. Not long after, the King coming from hunting when the Biſhop was at court, and remembring what had paſſed between them, laid by his ſword, and, falling at the Biſhop's feet, deſired he would not take amiſs what he had formerly ſaid about the pad. The Biſhop, being diſturbed to ſee the King in that poſture, raiſed him up, and deſired him that he ſurvived him but twelve days, and died in Auguſt 651, after having ſat ſixteen years (c). Bede gives him an extraordinary character [F]; but at the ſame time takes notice, that he was not altogether orthodox in keeping of Eaſter [G], in which he followed the cuſtom of the Scots, Picts, and Britons (d). The ſame hiſtorian aſcribes three miracles to Biſhop Aidan [H]; two of them performed in his life-time, and the other after his death (e). He was buried in his church of Lindisfarne, and part of his relicks were carried into Scotland by his ſucceſſor Colman in 664.

him not to trouble himſelf about that matter. And now the Biſhop appeared with a melancholy air, and wept very much; and being aſked the cauſe of his tears by one of his Prieſts, he told him, he foreſaw that Oſwin's life was but ſhort; for in my life (ſays he) I never ſaw ſo humble a Prince before. His temper is too heavenly to dwell long among us; and indeed the nation does not deſerve the bleſſing of ſuch a governor. The Biſhop proved a true Prophet: for the King was ſoon after treacherouſly ſlain; and, about a fortnight after, Aidan himſelf died; and, as Bede expreſſed it, received the reward of his pious labours in Heaven. De ſæculo ablatus, perpetua laborum ſuorum a Domino præmia recepit (13).

[H] Bede aſcribes three miracles to Biſhop Aidan.] I. A certain Prieſt, named Utta, was ſent by King Oſwi to Canterbury, to conduct into Northumberland his betrothed wife, the Princeſs Eanfleda, daughter to King Edwin. This Prieſt, who was to go thither by land, but to return by ſea, addreſſed himſelf to Biſhop Aidan, deſiring his prayers for the ſucceſs of his voyage. The good prelate having bleſſed him, and commended him to God, told him, he foreſaw there would ariſe a violent ſtorm, whereby his veſſel would be in great danger; and at the ſame time gave him a viol of holy oil; bidding him, when occaſion ſhould require, to pour it into the ſea, which would thereby be preſently rendered calm. Utta followed the good Biſhop's directions, and by that means ſaved himſelf, and all that were in the ſhip with him, from impending deſtruction. Bede ſays, the truth of this miracle was confirmed to him by a prieſt named Cynimund, who had the ſtory from Utta's own mouth (17). II. The army of the Mercians, commanded by Penda, having committed great devaſtations in Northumberland, and penetrated as far as the royal city of Bebbanburg, began to ſet it on fire: at which time Biſhop Aidan, being in the iſland Farne, about two miles diſtant from the city; and ſeeing the flakes of fire brought by the wind, and the ſmoke riſing above the walls, immediately lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, and with tears ſaid, Behold, Lord, what miſchief Penda does! Whereupon, the wind preſently changing, the flames were driven from the city upon the incendiaries, many of whom periſhed, and the reſt were glad to retreat from a city, which they ſaw to be thus miraculouſly defended (18). III. This good Biſhop being in one of the royal villas, not far from the abovementioned city, and finding himſelf near his death, ordered a tent to be pitched for him cloſe to one of the walls of the church: which being done, he retired thither, and there gave up his laſt breath. It happened ſome years after, that Penda, King of the Mercians, having ſet fire to this church, it was entirely conſumed, all but a wooden buttreſs or beam, cloſe to which Aidan's tent had been placed. This miracle being greatly celebrated, the church was rebuilt, and the ſame piece of timber employed as a buttreſs to the new fabric. But ſome time after, this church, through negligence, was again deſtroyed by fire; and being once more rebuilt, the miraculous beam was no longer placed on the outſide of the church, but was laid up within it; where it became an object of the people's veneration, and was inſtrumental in curing many diſeaſes and infirmities (19). [One might be ready to imagine, from the firſt miracle here aſcribed to Aidan, that the good Biſhop had ſome acquaintance with the property (lately brought to light by Dr. Benjamin Franklin) which oil has of ſtilling waves. Pliny mentions this property of oil, and it ſhould ſeem, that it hath been more or leſs obſerved, and even taken advantage of, in ſeveral diſtant parts of the world, down to the preſent preſent times; though it hath been treated as a vulgar error, till confirmed by the late experiments. There can be no doubt but that, in ages of ignorance and credulity, the prieſts availed themſelves of their ſuperior knowledge, by giving a miraculous turn to events which were effected by natural means (20).] K.

AILMER, or ÆTHELMARE, Earl of Cornwall and Devonſhire, in the reign of King Edgar (a): it is not known of what family he was. His authority and riches were great, and ſo alſo in appearance was his piety. He founded the abbey of Cerne, in Dorſetſhire; and had ſo great a veneration for Eadwald, the brother of St. Edmund the Martyr, who had lived a hermit in that country, near the ſilver well, as they called it, that, with the aſſiſtance of Archbiſhop Dunſtan, he tranſlated his relicks to the old Church of Cernel (b). In 1005, he founded the abbey of Eyneſham in Oxfordſhire, as alſo the priory of Bruton in Somerſetſhire, both for Monks of the Benedictine order (c). In 1013, when Suane, King of Denmark, over-ran the greateſt part of England, and forced King Æthelred to ſhut himſelf up in Wincheſter, Earl Ailmer thought fit to ſubmit himſelf [A], and to make terms with the conqueror, to whom he gave hoſtages (d) In 1016, when Canute, the ſon of Suane, invaded England, and found himſelf ſtoutly oppoſed by that valiant Saxon Prince, Edmund Ironſide, the ſon of Æthelred, this Earl Ailmer [B], with that arch traitor, Eadric Streone, Earl of Mercia, and Earl Algar, joined the Dane againſt their natural Prince, which was one great cauſe of the Saxons ruin (e). He did not long ſurvive this; and we find mentioned in hiſtory only one ſon of his, whoſe name was Æthelward, Earl of Cornwall, who followed his father's maxims, and was properly rewarded for it. For in 1018, Canute reaping the benefit of their treaſons, and perceiving that the traitors were no longer uſeful, he cauſed the infamous Eadric Streone, and this Earl Æthelward, to be both put to death (f).

[A] Thought fit to ſubmit himſelf.] In the Saxon Chronicle we are told, that in the year 1013, in the month of July, King Suane came with his navy to Sandwich; thence he ſailed along the coaſt to the mouth of the Humber, and afterwards by the Trent to Gainſborough; there he landed with his ſon Canute, and a very numerous army. The neighbouring country being reduced, he divided his forces: part he left under the command of his ſon to guard his ſhips, and the hoſtages he had received; and with the reſt he marched ſouthward. The city of Oxford, on his approach, ſurrendered, ſo did Wincheſter; which encouraged him to march eaſtward, in hopes of taking the city of London. In this he miſcarried, King Æthelred being there in perſon, who had the better of the Danes in a very bloody engagement. Upon this Suane retired to Wallingford; from thence croſſing the Thames, he marched to Bath, where this Æthelmare, and many other Lords of his party, met him, gave hoſtages for their fidelity, and aſſiſted him in carrying his ſpoil to his ſhips (1). This rivetted the chains of the nation; and for this horrid treachery, which however ſhewed his exceſſive power, he obtained the ſirname of Great. The ſame Chronicle places the death of his ſon Ethelward in the year 1017, and calls him expreſsly the ſon of Æthelmare the Great (2).

(1) Chron. Sax. p. 143.

[B] This Earl Ailmer.] Some Antiquaries would have us believe, that the Aylmers of Aylmer-hall, in the county of Norfolk, are deſcended from this Æthelmare, becauſe they bear in their arms four choughs; and for their creſt, on a ducal coronet, a Corniſh chough's head and neck, wings diſplayed (3). This notion, however, ſeems a little unreaſonable, Æthelmare being apparently no ſirname; and Duke again, a title unknown to the Saxons. There was a Saxon Biſhop of the ſame name, which ſhews that it was common; and conſequently, that there is no referring the ſirname of Aylmer to this or that particular man amongſt the Saxons, who bore this name; neither in this caſe is there the leaſt reaſon for it. The Aylmers of Norfolk, being certainly a very ancient and honourable family, ſtand in no want of theſe fabulous pretenſions, as will be ſhewn in a proper place. C.

Upon his return into England, he took the habit in the Ciſtertian monaſtery of Reveſby aforeſaid; where his extraordinary piety and learning ſoon raiſed him to the dignity of Abbot [A]. His great love of retirement, and a life of contemplation and ſtudy, induced him to decline all offers of eccleſiaſtical preferment, and even to refuſe a Biſhopric. He was particularly fond of reading St. Auſtin's works, eſpecially that author's confeſſions; and he was a ſtrict imitator of St. Bernard in his writings, words, and actions (f). AINSWORTH (Henry) an eminent Nonconformist Divine, who flourished in the latter end of the XVIth, and the beginning of the XVIIth century. It is very much to be regretted, that we are able to say very little of so great a man; for we know not so much as where or when he was born, or any thing more of him than this, that about the year 1590 he distinguished himself amongst the Brownists, to whom he adhered, and on that account endured a share in their persecutions (a). His great skill in Hebrew learning, and his excellent commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, which are still highly and justly esteemed [A], gained him a vast reputation (b). However, the discredit his sect were then in, drew upon him such dangers and troubles, that after struggling with them for some years, he at length quitted his country, and retired into Holland, where most of the eminent Nonconformists, who had incurred the displeasure of Queen Elizabeth's government, had taken refuge before. At Amsterdam Mr. Johnson and he erected a church, of which our Ainsworth was the Doctor or Teacher (c). In conjunction with Johnson, he published a confession of faith of the people called Brownists, in the year 1602, not much different in doctrine from the harmony of confessions; but being men of warm spirits, they split into parties about some points of discipline. Johnson excommunicated his own father and brother for trifling matters, after having rejected the mediation of the Presbytery of Amsterdam. This divided the congregation, insomuch that Mr. Ainsworth and half the congregation excommunicated Johnson, who, after some time, returned the same compliment to Ainsworth. At length the contest grew so hot, that Amsterdam could not hold them. Johnson and his followers removed to Embden, where soon after he died, and his congregation dissolved (d). Nor did Mr. Ainsworth and his followers live long in peace; for soon after, he left them and retired to Ireland, where he continued some time; but when the spirits of his people were quieted, he returned to Amsterdam, and continued with them to his death (e). If we may believe Dr. Heylyn, the contentions at Amsterdam were some of them of an odd nature, and which sufficiently shew how great obedience some men expect, who yet are not much inclined to pay it, either to the Church or to the State (f) [B]. His learned writings were received with respect, even by his adversaries, who while they refuted his singularities, paid a proper regard to his abilities, particularly

[A] Which are still highly and justly esteemed.] His annotations on several books of the Bible were printed at several times, and in several sizes. Those on the Psalms in quarto, in 1612; those on the five books of Moses, in two volumes in quarto, in 1621; all these together, bound in three quarto volumes. At length, 1627, his annotations were printed in one volume in folio, and again in 1639, which edition is become so very rare, as to be inserted in all the catalogues of scarce books (1). It will not therefore be amiss to give an account of its contents. Its title runs thus: 'Annotations upon the five books 'of Moses, the book of the Psalms, and the Song of 'Songs, or Canticles. Wherein the Hebrew words 'and sentences are compared with, and explained 'by, the ancient Greek and Chaldee versions, and 'other records and monuments of the Hebrews; 'but chiefly, by conference with the holy scriptures. Moses his words, laws, and ordinances, the 'sacrifices, and other legal ceremonies heretofore 'commanded by God to the Church of Israel, are 'explained; with an advertisement touching some 'objections made against the sincerity of the Hebrew text, and allegation of the Rabbins in these 'annotations; as also tables, directing unto such 'principal things as are observed in the annotations 'upon each several book. By Henry Ainsworth. 'London, printed by M. Parsons, for John Bellamy, '1639.' In this edition, the first thing that occurs is a preface or discourse, on the life and writings of Moses, which is subscribed by the author; then follow the five books of Moses, translated literally from the Hebrew, with annotations chiefly from Rabbinical writers; and by comparison of texts. At the end of the Pentateuch, there is a little treatise, intituled, An advertisement touching some objections made against the sincerity of the Hebrew text, and allegation of the Rabbins in the former annotations; to which are added some other short dissertations. Then follow, annotations upon the book of Psalms; to which is prefixed, an excellent life of David, extracted from, and in the words of scripture. Lastly, we have the Song of Solomon, with a literal translation from the Hebrew in prose, and another in verse, as also annotations. This learned work was translated into Dutch, as the reader will see in the margin; and his commentary on the Song of Solomon, into German verse. All the modern writers on the scriptures, cite him frequently; and the authors of Moreri's dictionary are pleased to leave it doubtful, whether the learned Lightfoot did not borrow much of what he has written on the scriptures from this excellent work (2).

[B] Either to the church, or to the state.] We cannot have the differences at Amsterdam set in a clearer, though perhaps they may be placed in a little particularly that worthy Biſhop of Exeter, Dr. Hall, who wrote with great ſtrength of reaſon againſt the Browniſts (g). But nothing it ſeems could reclaim him, or incline him to return home; but as he lived, ſo he died in exile, though with ſome remarkable circumſtances, which have been remembered by ſeveral authors, notwithſtanding the year in which they happened is not recorded. His demiſe was ſudden, and not without ſuſpicion of violence; for it is reported, that having found a diamond of very great value in the ſtreets of Amſterdam, he advertiſed it in print; and when the owner, who was a Jew, came to demand it, he offered him any acknowledgment he would deſire. Ainſworth, however, though poor, would accept of nothing but a conference with ſome of his Rabbies, upon the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, relating to the Meſſias, which the other promiſed; but not having intereſt enough to obtain it, it is thought he was poiſoned (b). It was certainly a great misfortune, that the obſtinacy of his own ſpirit, and the rigorous adminiſtration in the Church, ſhut out ſo able a man from the public exerciſe of his miniſtry; for he was indiſputably a perſon of profound learning, exquiſitely verſed in the Scriptures, and deeply read in the works of the Rabbins. Beſides, he had a ſtrong underſtanding, quick penetration, and wonderful diligence. It is true that theſe excellent qualities were ſomewhat allayed by the haſtineſs of his temper, his contempt for eccleſiaſtical governments, his proneneſs to maintain diſputes about ſmall things, and his raſhneſs in ſeparating, not only from the Church, but his own Nonconformiſt brethren in Holland. This was a grievous prejudice to the Proteſtant cauſe in general; and gave a ſignal advantage to the enemies of the Puritans here in England in particular. Though our author was much conſidered in his life-time [C], in his own country, and ſeveral of his books were more than once reprinted after his death, little too ſtrong a light, than by Dr. Heylyn; whoſe diſtaſte to all ſectaries ſharpened his manner of writing concerning them, for which the judicious reader will make allowances: 'Worſe fared it with 'the brethren of the ſeparation, who had retired 'themſelves unto Amſterdam in the former reign, 'than with their firſt founders and forefathers in the 'Church of England; for having broken in ſunder 'the bond of peace, they found no poſſibility of 'preſerving the ſpirit of unity; one ſeparation grow-'ing continually on the neck of another, till they 'were crumbled into nothing. The brethren of the 'firſt ſeparation had found fault with the Church of 'England for reading prayers and homilies as they 'lay in the book, and not admitting the preſby-'tery to take place amongſt them. But the bre-'thren of the ſecond ſeparation take as much diſ-'taſte againſt retaining all ſet forms of hymns and 'pſalms, committing their conceptions both in 'praying and propheſying, and ſinging of pſalms, 'to the help of memory; and then ſubjoin this 'maxim, in which all agreed, that is to ſay, that 'there is the ſame reaſon of helps in all the parts 'of ſpiritual worſhip, as is to be admitted in any 'one, during the performing of that worſhip. Upon 'which ground they charge it home on their fellow-'ſeparatiſts; that as in prayer, the book is to be 'laid aſide by the confeſſion of the ancient brethren 'of the ſeparation, ſo it muſt alſo be in propheſying 'and ſinging of pſalms; and therefore, whether 'we pray, or ſing, or propheſy, it is not to be 'from the book, but out of the heart. For pro-'pheſying, next they tell us, that the ſpirit is 'quenched two manner of ways, by memory as well 'as reading. And to make known how little uſe 'there is of memory in the act of propheſying or 'preaching, they tell us, that the citing of chapter 'and verſe (as not being uſed by Chriſt and his 'apoſtles in their ſermons or writings) is a mark of 'Antichriſt. And as for pſalms, which make the 'third part of ſpiritual worſhip, they propoſe 'theſe queries: 1. Whether in a pſalm, a man 'muſt be tied to metre, rhyme, and tune? and 'whether voluntary be not as neceſſary in tune and 'words as well as matter? and 2. Whether metre, 'rhyme, and tune, be not quenching the ſpirit? 'according to which reſolution of the new ſepara-'tion, every man, when the congregation ſhall be 'met together, may firſt conceive his own matter in 'the act of praiſing; deliver it in proſe or metre, as 'he liſts himſelf; and in the ſame inſtant, chant 'out, in what tune ſoever that which comes firſt 'into his own head, which would be ſuch a horrible 'confuſion of tongues and voices, that hardly any 'howling or gnaſhing of teeth can be equal to it. 'And yet it follows ſo directly on the former prin-'ciples, that if we baniſh all ſet forms of common 'prayer (which is but only one part of God's pub-'lic worſhip) from the uſe of the Church, we can-'not but in juſtice, and in reaſon both, baniſh all 'ſtudied and premeditated ſermons from the houſe 'of God, and utterly caſt out all King David's 'Pſalms (whether in proſe or metre, that comes all 'to one), and all divine hymns alſo into the bargain. 'Finally, as to forms of government, they de-'clared thus (or to this purpoſe at leaſt, if my me-'mory fail not) that as they which live under the 'tyranny of the Pope and Cardinals, worſhip the 'very beaſt itſelf; and they which live under the 'government of Archbiſhops and Biſhops, do wor-'ſhip the image of the beaſt; ſo they which wil-'lingly obey the reformed Preſbytery of Paſtors, 'Elders, and Deacons, worſhip the ſhadow of that 'image. To ſuch ridiculous follies are men com-'monly brought, when once preſuming on ſome new 'light to direct their actions, they ſuffer themſelves 'to be miſguided by the ignis fatuus of their own 'inventions. And in this poſture ſtood the bre-'thren of the ſeparation, anno 1606, when Smith 'firſt publiſhed his book of the preſent differences, 'between the churches of the ſeparation, as he ho-'neſtly calls them. But afterwards there grew ano-'ther great diſpute between Ainſworth and Brough-'ton, whether the colour of Aaron's linen ephod 'were of blue, or a ſea-water green; which did 'not only trouble all the Dyers in Amſterdam, but 'drew their ſeveral followers into ſides and factions, 'and made good ſport to all the world, but them-'ſelves alone. By reaſon of which diviſions and 'ſubdiviſions, they fell at laſt into ſo many factions, 'that one of them in the end became a church of 'himſelf; and having none to join in opinion with 'him, baptiſed himſelf, and thereby got the name of 'a Se-baptiſt; which never any ſectary or heretick 'had obtained before (3).' As to theſe particular differences between our author Ainſworth and Mr. Johnſon, they were made the ſubject of various books and pamphlets in thoſe days, ſome of which are come down even to our times, as the reader will perceive by the book cited in the margin (4).

[C] Much conſidered in his lifetime.] He publiſhed occaſionally ſeveral treatiſes, many of which made a great noiſe in the world, as particularly his book, intituled, A Counter-Poiſon againſt Bernard and Craſhaw, 4*to*, 1612. This piece is often cited, and the principles therein advanced refuted by Biſhop Hall, though he did not write expreſsly againſt Ainſworth, but againſt Smith and Robinſon, two miniſters amongſt the Browniſts; yet whenever he mentions Ainſworth, he always owns him for the greateſt man of his party; and ſpeaking to thoſe he wrote againſt, calls him your Doctor, your Chief, your Rabbi (5). Another work of Ainſworth's was intituled, An animadverſion to Mr. Richard Clifton's advertiſement; who, under pretence of anſwering Charles Lawne's book, hath publiſhed another man's private letter, with death, yet through a prevailing contempt for men of his ſentiments, and too cold a reception of that kind of learning, which rendered him famous, his works are now more known and valued abroad than here; inſomuch that it is not eaſy to produce an Engliſh writer oftener quoted, or with greater teſtimonies in favour of his merit, than we find beſtowed on Dr. Ainſworth; and this by the learned of all countries, and at a conſiderable diſtance in time, and of all ſects and opinions (i). A higher teſtimony of the veneration he has acquired by his writings, cannot well be expected, than that which occurs in all the late editions of Moreri's dictionary; and even in the laſt, wherein with great pains they diſtinguiſh between Henry Ainſworth, the able commentator on the Scriptures, and Henry Ainſworth the Hereſiarch, who was one of the chiefs of the Browniſts in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and very gravely tell us, that we muſt have a care not to confound them; nevertheleſs, nothing is more certain, than that theſe two Henry Ainſworths were the ſame man. There was indeed another writer, whoſe Chriſtian name was William, whoſe works have ſome affinity with thoſe of our author, and are therefore ſometimes aſcribed to him (k); but this William Ainſworth lived conſiderably later; and beſides him, there was one Mr. Samuel Ainſworth, a Nonconformiſt miniſter in Northamptonſhire, who was alſo an author (l). After the deceaſe of Mr. Ainſworth, his congregation at Amſterdam made choice of Mr. Canne for their paſtor, who was author of the marginal references to the Bible, and ſeveral other treatiſes (m).

[AINSWORTH (ROBERT) a noted Grammarian, in the latter end of the ſeventeenth, and the beginning of the preſent century, was born at Woodyale in Lancaſhire, four miles from Mancheſter, in September 1660 (a). He received his education at Bolton in the ſame county, and afterwards taught a ſchool in that town. From thence he removed to near London, and, for a time, was maſter of a conſiderable boarding-ſchool at Bethnal Green; during his reſidence at which place, he wrote, and publiſhed, A ſhort Treatiſe of Grammatical Inſtitution. Quitting Bethnal Green, he carried on his ſchool at Hackney, and ſucceſſively at other villages in the neighbourhood of the metropolis. Having acquired a moderate fortune, he retired from buſineſs, and lived in a private manner (b). In the latter part of his life he uſed to employ himſelf very much in rummaging the ſhops of obſcure brokers, in every quarter of the town; by which means he often picked up old coins, and other valuable curioſities, at a ſmall expence (c). He died at London, on the 4th of April 1743, in the eighty-third year of his age, and was buried at Poplar, where is the following monumental inſcription for him and his wife, written by himſelf:

Mr. Ainſworth had a turn, it ſeems, for Latin and Engliſh poetry; and ſome ſingle poems of his, in theſe languages, have been printed (e). As none of them have happened to fall in our way, we cannot ſpecify their character or merit; but it is certain that they have never occaſioned him to be ranked among the poets of this country. His reputation ariſes from his Theſaurus, an excellent performance, which is in general uſe and eſtimation. About the year 1714, a propoſal was made to ſome eminent bookſellers, for compiling a Latin Dictionary, upon the ſcheme of Faber's Theſaurus, and Mr. Ainſworth was ſoon prevailed upon to undertake this laborious and extenſive work. However, it went on ſlowly for a long time, and for ſome years was entirely ſuſpended (f). At length, in 1736, it appeared in 4to, with a Dedication to Dr. Mead. Its title is, 'Theſaurus Linguæ Latinæ Compendarius; or a compendious 'Dictionary of the Latin Tongue, deſigned chiefly for the Uſe of the Britiſh Nations.' A ſecond edition was afterwards publiſhed by Mr. Samuel Patrick (g). In 1752 appeared the fourth edition, in two volumes folio, under the care of the Rev. Mr.

AIRAY (HENRY) Provost of Queen's college in Oxford, was born in Westmoreland, educated in Grammatical learning by the care of Bernard Gilpin, usually called the Northern Apostle, and by him sent to St. Edmund's Hall in Oxford, in the year 1579. He was then nineteen years of age, and was maintained at the university by Gilpin, who left him a handsome legacy by his last will, bearing date the 27th of October 1582. Mr. Airay soon removed from St. Edmund's Hall to Queen's college, where he became Pauper Puer Serviens. In 1583, he took his Bachelor's degree, and was made Tabardus, or Tabardarius [A]; and in 1586, he commenced Master of Arts and Fellow. About this time he went into orders, and became a constant and zealous preacher in the university, particularly in the church of St. Peter in the East, adjoining to Queen's college. In 1594, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity, and four years after was chosen Provost of his college. In 1600, he proceeded in divinity, and six years after was chosen Vice-Chancellor (a). He wrote the following pieces, which were published after his death. 1. Lectures upon the whole Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians. London 1618, 4*to* [B]. 2. The just and necessary Apology touching his suit in Law, for the Rectory of Charlton on Otmore in Oxfordshire. London, 1621, 8*vo*. 3. A Treatise against bowing at the name of Jesus [C]. Airay was a zealous Calvinist, and a great supporter of those of his party; who concur in giving him the character of a person of great holiness, integrity, learning, gravity, and indefatigable pains in the discharge of his ministerial function (b). He died in Queen's college the 10th of October 1616, aged fifty-seven, and was buried in the inner chapel of the said college (c).

Mr. Wood tells us, all must submit to this office before they can be fellows. The Tabardi, or Tabardarii, that is, Tabarders, or Tabitters, are so called, because anciently they wore coats or upper gowns, much like those belonging to Heralds (1).

AIRAY (CHRISTOPHER), Vicar of Milford in Hampshire, was born at Clifton in Westmoreland [A], and admitted a student in Queen's college in Oxford, in Michaelmas Term 1621; where having passed through the servile offices (a), and taken the degree of Master of Arts, he was elected a Fellow. Soon after, agreeably to the statutes of that house, he went into Holy Orders, and, in 1642, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He wrote Fasciculus præceptorum Logicalium in gratiam juventutis Academicæ compositus, i. e. A Collection of the Rules of Logic, for the use of the Students in the University (b); besides some other pieces, which the Oxford Antiquarian (c), who gives us this account, had not seen. He died the 18th of October 1670, and was buried in the chancel of his church of Milford. His epitaph [B] may be seen below.

[AKENSIDE* (MARK), an eminent poet and physician of the present century, was born at Newcastle upon Tyne, on the 9th day of November 1721 (a); being the second son of Mark Akenside, a substantial butcher in that town (b), at the free-school of which he received the earliest part of his grammatical education. He was next put under the care of one Mr. Wilson, a dissenting Minister, who kept a private academy at Newcastle. Here young Akenside had the present Colonel Selby of Paston for his school-fellow (c). At about the age of 18, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, with a view of becoming a Dissenting Minister; his parents, and his relations in general, being of the Presbyterian persuasion. However, it was only for

for one winter that he profecuted his ſtudies upon this plan; after which he turned his thoughts to phyſic. Having received ſome aſſiſtance towards his education for the miniſtry, from the funds which the Engliſh Diſſenters have for that purpoſe, he took care, afterwards, to return to his benefactors the money which had been expended upon him. His genius, and his taſte for poetry diſplayed themſelves when he was at the grammar-ſchool at Newcaſtle, and during his continuance at Mr. Wilſon's academy. It is ſaid, that his Pleaſures of Imagination, and ſeveral other pieces, were firſt written by him at Morpeth, while he was upon a viſit to his relations, before he went to the univerſity of Edinburgh. At Edinburgh he diſtinguiſhed himſelf, likewiſe, by his poetical compoſitions. His Ode on the Winter Solſtice, which is dated 1740, was certainly compoſed at that place. After ſtaying three years at Edinburgh, he removed to Leyden, where he continued two years; and there, on the 16th of May 1744, he took his degree of Doctor in Phyſic (d) [A]. In the ſame year appeared his poem on the Pleaſures of Imagination; which was, in general, received with great applauſe, and raiſed his reputation high in the poetical world. But Mr. Warburton (the preſent celebrated and learned Biſhop of Glouceſter) being diſſatisfied with a note in the third book, concerning the nature and objects of ridicule, thought proper, in a preface to certain remarks upon his antagoniſts, to make ſome ſevere ſtrictures on our author; in which, however, he was attacked as a philoſopher only, and not as a Poet. Dr. Akenſide, in return, was warmly vindicated by an anonymous friend [B]. The poem on the Pleaſures of Imagination was quickly followed by an Epiſtle to Curio, containing a warm invective, under that name, againſt the Right Honourable William Pulteney, Earl of Bath, on account of his political conduct (e). The Doctor was afterwards ſo far diſſatisfied with this performance, that he altered it exceedingly, by changing it into the form of an Ode, and by reducing it to leſs than half the number of lines of which it originally conſiſted. In 1745, he publiſhed ten Odes on ſeveral Subjects, written, as he tells us, at very different intervals, and with a view to very different manners of expreſſion and verſification. The merit, he ſays, which he chiefly pretended to, was that of endeavouring to be correct, and of carefully attending to the beſt models (f). Theſe different productions appeared before he was twenty-four years of age; but he was afterwards much more ſlow in his publications. His Ode to the Earl of Huntingdon came out in 1748, and in 1758 he expreſſed his deſire of rouzing the national ſpirit, by an Ode to the Country Gentlemen of England (g). Few of his remaining poetical pieces were publiſhed ſeparately, excepting an Ode to Thomas Edwards, Eſq; on the late edition of Mr. Pope's works, which had been written in 1751, but was not printed till the year 1766 (h); with a view, as it ſhould principally ſeem, of ſhewing the author's diſlike to Dr. Warburton. The reſt of Dr. Akenſide's poems, which appeared in his lifetime, were given, at leaſt for the moſt part, in Dodſley's collection (i). His principal performance in the quality of a Phyſician, was a Treatiſe on the Dyſentery, written in Latin, and publiſhed in 1764. To return to the circumſtances of Dr. Akenſide's private life: Soon after his quitting Leyden, he ſettled for a little time at Northampton [C]; but, either not meeting with ſufficient encouragement, or being ambitious of a larger field in which to diſplay his talents, he removed to Hampſtead, where he reſided about two years and a half, and then finally fixed at London. At firſt he had but little practice; and, therefore, that he might be enabled to make a proper appearance in the world, he was generouſly allowed three hundred pounds a year by his great and intimate friend Mr. Dyſon. Whether Mr. Dyſon had any bond or obligation from him on this account, we know not; but it ſhould ſeem, that, at his deceaſe, his effects, and particularly his books and prints, which laſt he was fond of collecting, fell into that gentleman's hands. In a courſe of time, Dr. Akenſide came into very conſiderable reputation and practice; and arrived at moſt of the honours incident to his profeſſion. He was choſen a Fellow of the Royal Society; became a Phyſician to St. Thomas's Hoſpital; was admitted, by mandamus, to the degree of Doctor in Phyſic, in the univerſity of Cambridge; and was elected a Fellow of the

[A] Took the degree of Doctor in Phyſic.] The ſubject of his Diſſertatio Medica inauguralis was, De Ortu et Incremento Fœtus humani. In this diſſertation the author is ſaid to have diſplayed his medical ſagacity, by attacking ſome opinions of Leeuwenhoek and other writers, at that time very generally received; but which have ſince been diſcarded by the beſt phyſicians and philoſophers; and by propoſing an hypotheſis, which is now conſidered as founded in truth.

[B] By an anonymous friend.] This anonymous friend was the late Right Honourable Jeremiah Dyſon, Eſq. The title of the pamphlet is, 'An Epiſtle to 'the Reverend Mr. Warburton, occaſioned by his 'treatment of the Author of the Pleaſures of Imagi-'nation.' There are ſeveral ſenſible obſervations in it; but the ſtile is uncouth and unpleaſant. We do not here mean to enter into the debate; as an hiſtorical view of the controverſy, whether ridicule be a teſt of truth, and whether it ought to be applied to religious matters, will more ſuitably occur in ſome other place; moſt probably under the article of the Noble Author of the Characteriſtics. The Biſhop of Glouceſter's ſtrictures on Dr. Akenſide are reprinted in the poſtſcript to the dedication to the Free-Thinkers, prefixed to the firſt volume of the Divine Legation; without, however, any notice being taken of what had been written in the Doctor's defence.

[C] Settled at Northampton.] The writer of this article who then reſided at Northampton for education, well remembers that Dr. Doddridge and Dr. Akenſide carried on an amicable debate concerning the opinions of the ancient philoſophers with regard to a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments; in which Dr. Akenſide ſupported the firm belief of Cicero in particular, in this great article of natural religion.

Royal College of Phyſicians in London. Upon the ſettlement of the Queen's houſehold, he was appointed one of the Phyſicians to her Majeſty. He died of a putrid fever, on the 23d of June 1770, in the 49th year of his age, and was buried in the pariſh of St. James's, Weſtminſter (k). Dr. Akenſide was very much devoted to the ſtudy of ancient literature, and was a great admirer, particularly, of Plato, Cicero, and the beſt philoſophers of antiquity. His knowledge and taſte in this reſpect are conſpicuous in his poems, and in the notes and illuſtrations which he hath annexed to them. That he had a ſincere reverence for the great and fundamental principles of religion, is apparent from ſeveral paſſages in his writings; and eſpecially, from his Ode to the Author of the Memoirs of the Houſe of Brandenburgh [D]. He was warmly attached to the cauſe of civil and religious Liberty [E]. From two of his Odes it appears that he enjoyed the friendſhip of that eminent ſtateſman and parliamentary ſpeaker, the late Right Honourable Mr. Charles Townſhend. We are ſorry that we have not been able to obtain any more particulars concerning this diſtinguiſhed poet; but the friend who

[D] His ode to the author of the Memoirs of the Houſe of Brandenburgh.] Dr. Akenſide's high veneration for the Supreme Being, his noble ſentiments of the wiſdom and benevolence of the Divine Providence, and his zeal for the cauſe of virtue, are apparent in all his poems. In his Ode to William Hall, Eſq; with the works of Chalieu, he juſtly condemns the licentiouſneſs of that poet:

'We own, had Fate to man aſſign'd
'Nor ſenſe, nor wiſh, but what obey,
'Or Venus ſoft—or Bacchus gay,
'Then might our Bard's voluptuous creed
'Moſt aptly govern human-kind:
'Unleſs perchance what he had ſung
'Of tortur'd joints and nerves unſtrung,
'Some wrangling heretic ſhould plead.

'But now with all theſe proud deſires
'For dauntleſs Truth and honeſt Fame;
'With that ſtrong Maſter of our frame
'The inexorable judge within,
'What can be done? Alas, ye fires
'Of love; alas, ye roſy ſmiles,
'Ye nectar'd cups from happier ſoils,
'—Ye have no bribe his grace to win.'

His regard to the Chriſtian revelation, and his ſolicitude to have it preſerved in its native purity, are diſplayed in the Ode to the Biſhop of Wincheſter:

'To him the teacher bleſs'd,
'Who ſent religion from the palmy field
'By Jordan, like the morn to cheer—the weſt,
'And lifted up the veil which heaven from earth
'conceal'd,
'To Hoadly thus his mandate he addreſs'd:
"Go thou, and reſcue my diſhonoured law
"From hands rapacious, and from tongues impure:
"Let not my peaceful name be made a lure
"Fell perſecution's mortal ſnares to aid:
"Let not my words be impious chains to draw
"The freeborn ſoul in more than brutal awe,
"To faith without aſſent, allegiance unrepaid."

The Ode to the Author of the Memoirs of the Houſe of Brandenburgh ſeems to have been written on purpoſe to expoſe the irreligious tenets of the royal hiſtorian. Speaking of the King's writing the memoirs with a view of appealing to the judgment of poſterity, Dr. Akenſide goes on as follows:

'O evil foreſight and pernicious care!
'Wilt thou indeed abide by this appeal?
'Shall we the leſſons of thy pen compare 'With private honour or with public zeal?
'Whence then at things divine thoſe darts of ſcorn?
'Why are the woes which virtuous men have borne
'For ſacred truth, a prey to laughter given?
'What fiend, what foe of nature urged thy arm
'The Almighty of his ſceptre to diſarm?
'To puſh this earth adrift, and leave it looſe from 'heaven?

'Ye godlike ſhades of legiſlators old,
'Ye who made Rome victorious, Athens wiſe;
'Ye firſt of mortals with the bleſs'd inroll'd,
'Say, did not horror in your boſoms riſe,
'When thus by impious vanity impell'd
'A Magiſtrate, a Monarch, ye beheld
'Affronting Civil Order's holieſt bands?

'To him the teacher bleſs'd,
'Who ſent religion from the palmy field
'By Jordan, like the morn to cheer—the weſt,
'And lifted up the veil which heaven from earth
'conceal'd,
'To Hoadly thus his mandate he addreſs'd:
'Thoſe bands which ye ſo labour'd to improve?
'Thoſe hopes and fears of juſtice from above,
'Which tam'd the ſavage world to your divine
'commands?'

[E] To the cauſe of civil and religious liberty.] Dr. Akenſide's zeal for liberty is a diſtinguiſhed feature in the character of his poetical writings. He embraces every occaſion of diſplaying his ardour concerning this ſubject, and two of his principal Odes are directly conſecrated to it; the Ode to the Earl of Huntingdon, and that to the Biſhop of Wincheſter. He and his friend Mr. Dyſon were underſtood, in early life, to be ſuch ſtrenuous advocates for liberty in its moſt extenſive ſenſe, as to have ſome tincture of republicaniſm in their notions. But no ſufficient proof of this is deducible from Dr. Akenſide's poems. When, with a reference to our own country, he celebrates the cauſe of freedom, he doth it in no other light than that of a zealous Whig, who was warmly attached to the revolution, and to the memory of the great men by whom it was effected. He omits no opportunity, in particular, of teſtifying his veneration for King William the Third. If there be any truth in the ſuppoſition, that Dr. Akenſide and his friend entertained republican ideas in their youth; it is probable that they might afterwards ſoften the rigour of their ſentiments. Two alterations in the Doctor's Odes have been taken notice of in this view. In the Ode on leaving Holland, the three following lines,

'I go where freedom in the ſtreets is known,
'And tells a Monarch on his throne,
'Tells him he reigns, he lives but by her voice,' are thus changed in the laſt edition,

'I go where liberty to all is known,
'And tells a monarch on his throne,
'He reigns not but by her preſerving voice?'

In the Ode to the Earl of Huntingdon, the four ſubſequent lines which originally were,

'But here where freedom's equal throne
'To all her valiant ſons is known;
'Where all direct the ſword ſhe —— wears,
'And each the power which rules him ſhares,'

are corrected as follows, in the third line:

'Where all are conſcious of her cares.'

Whatever may be thought of theſe particular alterations, it is certain that a moſt ardent ſpirit of liberty breathes through Dr. Akenſide's works; and in this reſpect, he hath been juſtly characteriſed in a late poem:

'Come, Akenſide, come with thine Attic urn,
'Fill'd from Ilyſſus by the Naiad's hand,
'Thy harp was tun'd to freedom.--Strains like thine,
'When Aſia's lord bor'd the huge mountain's ſide,
'And bridg'd the ſea, to battle rous'd the tribes
'Of ancient Greece. The ſons of Cecrops rais'd
'Minerva's Ægis—; Lacedemon pour'd
'Her hardy veterans from their frugal board,
'And Thebes ſaw Xerxes ſhake through all his
'tents (1).

(1) Poetical Epiſtle to Chriſtopher Anſtey, Eſq; 4to. printed for Wilkie, 1773.

knew him beſt, and who was the moſt capable of gratifying the curioſity of the Public concerning him, has left ſo poor and cold an account of him, that it is deſerving of cenſure. This article would have been very defective indeed, if it had not been for the gentlemen before mentioned. Some farther notice will be taken of Dr. Akenſide's poems, and of his medical writings, in the notes [F] and [G] below.]

[F] Some farther account of his poetical works.] Mr. Dyſon, in 1772, publiſhed in quarto a beautiful and complete edition of Dr. Akenſide's Poems, with his laſt corrections and improvements. The firſt poem in this collection, is the Pleaſures of Imagination, as it had originally appeared, and had frequently been reprinted. We have obſerved in the text, that in general it was received with great applauſe, and raiſed the author's reputation high in the poetical world. Mr. Cooper, in his Letters concerning Taſte, hath hence taken occaſion to ſpeak of him in the following ſtrain of commendation: 'For 'my part I am of opinion, that there is now living a 'poet of as genuine a genius as this kingdom ever 'produced, SHAKESPEARE alone excepted. By 'poetical genius, I do not mean the mere talent of 'making verſes, but that glorious enthuſiaſm of ſoul, 'that fine phrenzy in which the poet's eye rowling, 'glances from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven, as SHAKESPEARE feelingly deſcribes it. 'This alone is poetry; aught elſe is a mechanical art of putting ſyllables harmoniouſly together. 'The gentleman I mean is Dr. Akenſide, the 'worthy author of the Pleaſures of Imagination, the 'moſt beautiful didactic poem that ever adorned the 'Engliſh language (2).' On the other hand, the late eminent poet, Mr. Gray, writing to Dr. Wharton, of Old Park, near Durham, ſays, 'You 'deſire to know, it ſeems, what character the poem 'of your young friend (Dr. Akenſide) bears here. 'I wonder that you aſk the opinion of a nation, 'where thoſe who pretend to judge, do not judge 'at all, and the reſt (the wiſer part) wait to catch 'the judgment of the world immediately above 'them; that is, Dick's and the Rainbow coffee-'houſes. Your readier way would be to aſk the 'ladies who keep the bars in thoſe two theatres of 'criticiſm. However, to ſhew you that I am a judge 'as well as my country men, I will tell you, though 'I have rather turned it over than read it (but no 'matter; no more have they), that it ſeems to me 'above the middling; and now and then, for a little 'while, riſes even to the beſt, particularly in deſcription. It is often obſcure, and often unintelligible; 'and too much infected with the Hutchinſon jargon. 'In ſhort, its great fault is, that it was publiſhed at 'leaſt nine years too early. - And ſo methinks, in a 'few words, I have very pertly diſpatched what 'perhaps may for ſeveral years have employed a very 'ingenious man, worth fifty of myſelf (3).' As theſe obſervations were haſtily delivered in a private letter, before the poem had been maturely examined, we may be allowed to think them too ſevere, and to ſteer a middle courſe between Mr. Gray and Mr. Cooper. The obſcurity of the 'Pleaſures of 'Imagination,' when read with attention, will chiefly be found in the allegory of the ſecond book, which, we freely confeſs, we could never underſtand. It might, likewiſe, have been better if the peculiar language of Hutchinſon, or rather of Shafteſbury, had ſometimes been omitted. Nevertheleſs, we cannot but regard it as a noble and beautiful poem, exhibiting many bright diſplays of genius and fancy, and holding out ſublime views of nature, providence, and morality. We concur with Mr. Gray in thinking that it was publiſhed too early. The author himſelf became afterwards of the ſame ſentiment. He was convinced that the poem was defective in ſome reſpects, and redundant in others. 'That it wanted reviſion and correction, ſays his 'editor, he was ſufficiently ſenſible; but ſo quick 'was the demand for ſeveral ſucceſſive republications, that in any of the intervals to have compleated the whole of his corrections was utterly impoſſible; and yet to have gone on from time to 'time making farther improvements in every new 'edition would (he thought) have the appearance 'at leaſt of abuſing the favour of the Public. He 'choſe therefore, to continue for ſome time reprinting it without any alteration, and to forbear 'publiſhing any corrections or improvements until 'he ſhould be able at once to give them to the Public complete. And with this view he went on for 'ſeveral years to review and correct his poem at his 'leiſure; till at length he found the taſk grow ſo 'much upon his hands; that, deſpairing of ever being able to execute it ſufficiently to his own ſatisfaction, he abandoned the purpoſe of correcting, 'and reſolved to write the poem over anew, upon 'a ſomewhat different and an enlarged plan (4).' Dr. Akenſide did not live to finiſh the whole of his plan. That part of it which is carried into execution, occurs next in the edition before mentioned; and the reader may judge of the Doctor's intentions, by having recourſe to the general argument prefixed to the poem (5). He deſigned, at firſt, to compriſe the whole of his ſubject, according to a new plan, in four books. But he afterwards changed his purpoſe, and determined to diſtribute 'the Pleaſures of Imagina-'tion' into a greater number of books (6). How far his ſcheme would have carried him, if he had lived to complete it, is uncertain; for at his death he had only finiſhed the firſt and ſecond books, a conſiderable part of the third, and the introduction to the laſt. The firſt book of the improved work bears a nearer reſemblance to the firſt book of the former editions than any of the reſt do to each other. There are, nevertheleſs, in this book, a great number of corrections and alterations, and ſeveral conſiderable additions. Dr. Akenſide has introduced a tribute of reſpect and affection to his friend Mr. Dyſon. He has referred the pleaſures of imagination to two ſources only, greatneſs, and beauty, and not to three, as he had heretofore done. His delineation of beautiful objects is much enlarged; and upon the whole, the firſt book ſeems to have received no ſmall degree of improvement. The ſecond book is very different from the ſecond book of the preceding editions. The difference, indeed, is ſo great that they cannot be compared together. The author enters into a diſplay of truth and its three claſſes, matter of fact, experimental or ſcientifical truth, and univerſal truth. He treats, likewiſe, of virtue as exiſting in the divine mind, of human virtue, of vice and its origin, of ridicule and of the paſſions. What he hath ſaid upon the ſubject of ridicule is greatly and advantageouſly reduced from what it was in the former copies. The enumeration of the different ſources of ridicule is left out; and, conſequently, the lines which had given offence to Dr. Warburton. The allegorical viſion, which heretofore conſtituted a principal part of the ſecond book, is likewiſe omitted. The poetical character of the ſecond book as it now ſtands, is, that it is correct, moral, and noble. The third book is an epiſode, in which Solon the Athenian lawgiver is the chief character; and the deſign of it ſeems to be to ſhew the great influence of poetry, in enforcing the cauſe of liberty. This part is entirely new, and if it had been finiſhed, would have proved a beautiful addition to the poem. It is greatly to be regretted, that Dr. Akenſide did not live to complete his deſign. Nevertheleſs, we ſhould have been ſorry to have had the original poem entirely ſuperſeded. Whatever may be its faults, we find in it a certain brightneſs and brilliancy of imagination, and a certain degree of enthuſiaſm, which the Doctor did not ſeem to have poſſeſſed in equal vigour in the latter part of his life. Years, and an application to ſcientific ſtudies, appear, in ſome meaſure, to have turned his mind from ſound to things, from fancy to the underſtanding. Every reader of taſte would have regretted the loſs of the fine deſcription (in the third book) of the operations of the mind in producing works of imagination; and have felt the being deprived of the following beautiful lines in the allegoric viſion of the ſecond book:

'Of hills with many a ſhaggy foreſt mix'd,
'With many a ſable cliff and glittering ſtream.
'Aloft recumbent o'er the hanging ridge,
'The brown woods wav'd; while ever trickling ſprings
Waſh'd

To 'the Pleaſures of Imagination,' ſucceed two books of Odes, the firſt containing eighteen Odes, and the ſecond fifteen. It was Dr. Akenſide's intention, if he had lived, to have made each book conſiſt of twenty. Thoſe which had been formerly publiſhed, are greatly altered and improved. The Doctor's Odes are not equal to the ſublime and beautiful productions of Mr. Gray; nor perhaps to thoſe of one or two living writers. But ſtill there is in them a noble vein of poetry, united with manly ſenſe, and applied to excellent purpoſes. This emcomium cannot be extended to the whole of the Odes without exception. Dr. Akenſide does not always preſerve the dignity of the lyric muſe. He is defective in the pathetic, even upon a ſubject which peculiarly required it, and where it might have been moſt expected, the death of his miſtreſs. We mean his Ode to the Evening Star. However, his Hymn to Chearfulneſs, and his Odes on leaving Holland, on Lyric Poetry, to the Earl of Huntingdon, and on recovering from a Fit of Sickneſs, juſtly entitle him to a place among the principal lyric writers of this country. The Hymn to the Naiads and nine Inſcriptions, complete his poetical works. In Pearch's collection of poems (7), we find three pieces aſcribed to Dr. Akenſide, Love, an elegy; a Britiſh Philippic, and a Hymn to Science; which, if they were written by him, he did not think proper to acknowledge (8).

Dr. Alexander Monro junior, of Edinburgh, having taken notice of ſome inaccuracies in this paper, in his 'Obſervations anatomical and phyſiological, &c.' Beſides theſe, Dr. Akenſide read at the College, ſome practical obſervations, made in St. Thomas's hoſpital, on the putrid Eryſipelas, which he intended for the ſecond volume of the Medical Tranſactions. This paper he afterwards carried home, with a deſign to correct it; but it was not returned at the time of his deceaſe. Being appointed Krohnian Lecturer, he choſe for his ſubject, the Hiſtory of the Revival of Learning; and read three lectures on it before the College. But this work he gave up, as it was ſuppoſed, in diſguſt; ſome one of the College having objected that he had choſen a ſubject foreign to the inſtitution. K.

ALAN (OF LYNN), in Latin Alanus de Lynna, a famous divine in the XVth Century, was born at Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, and educated in the univerſity of Cambridge; where he applied himſelf diligently to the ſtudy of Philoſophy and Divinity, and, having taken the degree of Doctor (a), became an eminent preacher. Bale, who gives Alan an advantageous character (b), yet blames him for uſing allegorical and moral expoſitions of Scripture [A]. But he is particularly famous for the great pains he took in making Indexes to moſt of the books he read [B]. Alan flouriſhed about the year 1420 (c), and wrote ſeveral pieces, particularly 1. De vario Scripturæ ſenſu, i. e. Of the different ſenſes of Scripture. 2. Moralia Bibliorum, i. e. The Morality of the Scriptures. 3. Sermones notabiles, i. e. Remarkable Diſcourſes. 4. At length he became a Carmelite, in the town of his nativity, and was buried in the convent of his order (e).

He allegorized the hiſtorical parts of the Old and New Teſtament; and applied them to the buſineſs of the ſoul, and the moral actions of men.*' Pits, on the other hand, commends the method he took to explain the Holy Scriptures; which was by comparing them with themſelves, and having recourſe to the ancient fathers of the church. In quo conatu, optimam viam ſecutus, alia cum aliis ſacræ ſcripturæ loca conferens, & ad antiquos eccleſiæ patres, ſanctoſque recurrens doctores, nihil temere ſuoque ſolius ingenio nixus, interpretatus eſt (2).

The indexes to all theſe authors Bale himſelf ſaw in the library of the Carmelites at Norwich (3). The uſe and neceſſity of indexes is well ſet forth by Dr. Fuller (4). 'An index, ſays he, is a neceſſary implement, and no impediment of a book, except in the ſame ſenſe wherein the carriages of an army are termed impedimenta. Without this, a large author is but a labyrinth, without a clue to direct the reader therein. I confeſs there is a lazy kind of learning, which is only indical; when ſcholars (like adders, which only bite the horſe-heels) nibble but at the tables, which are calces librorum, neglecting the body of the book. But though the idle deſerve no crutches (let not a ſtaff be uſed by them but on them), pity it is the weary ſhould be denied the benefit thereof; and induſtrious ſcholars prohibited the accommodation of an index, moſt uſed by thoſe, who moſt pretend to contemn it.'

ALAN, ALLEN, ALLYN (WILLIAM), Cardinal-Prieſt of the Roman Church. He was the ſon of John Allen, by Jennet Lyſter, ſiſter to Thomas Lyſter, of Weſtby in Yorkſhire (a), and was born at Roſſal in Lancaſhire, ſome time in the year 1532. His father was a gentleman of good family, and ſome fortune [A], who took care of his education till ſuch time as he reached his fifteenth year, and then ſent him to Oxford (b), where, in 1547, he was entered of Oriel college, and had for his tutor, Morgan Philips, or Philip Morgan, a very famous man, and a zealous Papiſt (c), under whom he ſtudied with great ſucceſs, addicting himſelf eſpecially to Logick and Philoſophy, in which he became ſuch a proficient, that he was unanimouſly elected fellow of his college in 1550 (d), in which year alſo he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e). In an Act celebrated July the ſixteenth, he went out junior of the Act, having compleated his degree of Maſter of Arts, with great reputation (f); being at that time eſteemed an honour to the univerſity on account of his great parts, learning, and eloquence. In 1556, he became principal of St. Mary's Hall, and in that, and the year following, one of the Proctors of the univerſity (g), being then but twenty-four years of age. In 1558, he was made Canon of York (h); but on Queen Elizabeth's coming to the crown, he, as a zealous Catholick, loſt all hopes of preferment, and therefore, in 1560, withdrew out of his native country (i), and retired to Louvain in the Spaniſh Netherlands, where an Engliſh college was erected, of which he became the principal ſupport [B]. At this time, ſeveral perſons of great learning, and ſome of the boldeſt champions of the Popiſh cauſe, reſided in this place; with whom Allen converſed, and by the politeneſs, as well as ſtrength of his genius, he grew quickly into great eſteem with them. To this, it is ſaid, the gracefulneſs of his perſon did not a little contribute; for, with a majeſtick preſence, he had an eaſy, affable deportment, and, with the greateſt ſeverity of manners, a mildneſs in ſpeech and behaviour, which drew the affection of all who converſed with him (k). Here he began to write in ſupport of the Catholic cauſe, and his firſt piece was againſt a work written by the learned Biſhop Jewell, on the ſubject of Purgatory and Prayers for the Dead (l) [C]. The method he made uſe of in this work, was very proper to captivate the judgment of the reader; and his ſtyle, which was remarkably pure and flowing, made his performance ſtill the more dangerous. The chiefs of the party then abroad, conceived the greateſt hopes of this new diſputant; and, as a mark of their confidence, put under his care a young man,

[A] A Gentleman of good family and fortune.] So an eminent writer and his contemporary informs us. His words are theſe, 'Natus ille in comitatu Lancaſtrenſi honeſta familia, & quæ aliquot clariores 'cognatione complexa, i. e. He was born in Lancaſhire of a reputable family, allied to ſome of a 'higher degree (1).' Pits improves this, according to his wonted manner; for he tells us, that he was nobilibus ortus parentibus (2), which muſt ſignify, born of honourable parents at leaſt. The Author of his Life tells us, that he was deſcended from the Allens of Staffordſhire; and that his grandfather, George Allen, ſettled at Roſſal in Lancaſhire, becauſe an uncle of his, who was Abbot of Delawiſe, demiſed to him diverſe lands there, belonging to his monaſtery (3). Wood rightly obſerves, that the arms Cardinal Allen bore, viz. Argent three Conies paſſant ſable (4), are not the arms of the Allens of Staffordſhire, nor indeed, that I can find, of any other family (5) of that name; perhaps it was aſſigned him abroad, on account of the dangers he had run in the ſervice of the Catholic cauſe, and the fierceneſs with which his enemies had purſued him; but this is ſubmitted to the reader as a mere conjecture.

[B] Of which he became the principal ſupport.] The reaſon why the Engliſh fugitives inclined to ſettle in the Low Countries, was chiefly on account of its vicinity to their own country, whereby they had an opportunity of applying, as occaſion required, to their friends for relief. The Spaniſh government alſo, having already an eye towards Britain, encouraged ſuch learned Catholicks as fled from thence, to ſettle in thoſe provinces, and eſpecially at Louvain, where there was a flouriſhing univerſity, and other conveniencies (6). Of this, the government in England had early intelligence, and took great care to break off all correſpondence between theſe fugitives, and the relations they had left behind them. There are ſtill ſome writings in the Paper Office, which contain the names of perſons puniſhed for ſending money to Louvain, as alſo an account of the ſums they ſent (7). However, Dr. Harding, Dr. Bullock, and other eminent perſons remaining there, our author Allen, when he went abroad, thought it the propereſt place for him to reſide in, and renew his acquaintance with his ſtudies (8).

[C] On the ſubject of Purgatory and Prayers for the Dead.] Of all who have written againſt the Papiſts, there is none whoſe works have been better received than thoſe of Biſhop Jewell; nor of all the ſubjects which he handled, was there one wherein he ſeemed to have reaſoned with greater force, than on this, which Allen undertook to anſwer. The title of his book ran thus: A Defence of the Doctrine of Catholicks, concerning Purgatory, and Prayers for the Dead. It was printed at Antwerp, in 1565, in 8*vo* (9). The ſtrength of our author's argument lies in this poſition, that a middle ſtate is what moſt Proteſtants own; and that therefore it is more reaſonable to believe, as the Church teaches concerning it, than to think at random in this reſpect. He likewiſe takes pains to ſhow, that prayers for the dead were in uſe in the earlieſt ages of the Church; and, at the ſame time, omits nothing that may move the paſſions, and incline the reader to believe, that as the practice of antiquity, ſo reaſon and good-nature alſo, were on his ſide of the queſtion. This treatiſe made a great noiſe in England, and was anſwered by Mr. William Fulke (10); to whom, in proceſs of time, Dr. Richard Briſtow wrote a reply, printed at Louvain, 1580; whereupon Dr. Fulke thought himſelf obliged to write a rejoinder, which came out the next year (11).

of an honourable family, who was come to ſtudy at Louvain. The care he took of this young pupil, and his application to his other ſtudies, had ſuch an effect upon his health, that his Phyſicians were of opinion, nothing could reſtore it, but the enjoying for a ſeaſon his native air. On this account, though his coming into England was attended with great danger, our author ventured over about 1565 (m). He went firſt, as the doctors had adviſed him, into Lancaſhire, where he was born, and there, without any regard to his ſafety, he laboured to the utmoſt of his power in making converts, and in diſſuading ſuch as were already Catholics, from going to Heretical Conventicles, that is, from going to the eſtabliſhed Church (n). In order to carry his point the more effectually, he wrote and diſtributed ſeveral little pieces, which were afterwards printed; but by theſe endeavours rendering himſelf obnoxious to the government, ſo ſtrict a ſearch was made after him by the magiſtrates, that he was forced to retire out of that county (o), into the neighbourhood of the city of Oxford, where he concealed himſelf ſome time. In this retreat he wrote a kind of apology for his party, under the title of Brief Reaſons concerning the Catholic Faith (p). Some indeed ſay, this was written at the houſe of the Duke of Norfolk, in Norfolk, where it is certain our author was ſome time concealed, though he returned afterwards into the neighbourhood of Oxford again, where he diſtributed copies of this performance, to fix the minds of ſuch as wavered between the two religions; and to draw over ſuch as already doubted their ſafety, while remaining in the eſtabliſhed Church (q). Such ſucceſs attended theſe his endeavours, that though the conveniency of a ſhip going to the Netherlands (r) offered, yet he refuſed to make uſe of it, and choſe rather to continue in this dangerous ſituation, promoting, as far as in his power lay, the doctrine of Popery, and the ſpiritual juriſdiction of his Holineſs, and ſuch as derived their authority from him. With this view, he ventured to eſtabliſh a correſpondence with ſome of his old friends in the univerſity, and amongſt the reſt with a perſon formerly a Papiſt, but then of the eſtabliſhed church, and one, of whoſe preferment his family had great hopes. This man, our author by his unwearied applications drew back to his former opinions, which ſo exaſperated his relations, that they perſecuted Allen with extraordinary diligence, inſomuch that he was forced to fly towards London, and not long after, with ſome difficulty, made his eſcape into Flanders, in 1568 (s), having remained in England three years. In all probability he had ſome great friends here, who, in reſpect to their former acquaintance with him, were well enough pleaſed at his withdrawing a ſecond time beyond ſea. Amongſt whom we may reckon Sir Chriſtopher Hatton (t), afterwards Chancellor, who received part of his education in St. Mary's Hall at Oxford, while our author was Principal thereof; on which account, Sir Chriſtopher had a great tenderneſs for Allen's perſon; and Allen, on the other hand, had ſo high an eſteem of him, as to raiſe his reputation to the greateſt height abroad, which occaſioned ſome invidious reflections at home (u). After our author came a ſecond time into the Spaniſh Low-Countries, he went to Mechlin (w) in the Dutchy of Brabant, where he read a divinity lecture in a certain monaſtery there, with great applauſe. Thence he went to Doway, where he became Doctor in Divinity (x), and laboured very aſſiduouſly in eſtabliſhing a ſeminary there for the ſupport of Engliſh ſcholars; and, becauſe this was looked upon with an evil eye by the government in England, he afterwards wrote a book in defence of ſuch eſtabliſhments, of which the reader will find notice taken in our account of his writings. While he was thus employed, he became canon of Cambray (y), a very conſiderable and honourable preferment, conferred on him purely to reward his zeal in the ſervice of the Catholic Church [D]. In this ſeminary of Doway, many books were compoſed to juſtify the Popiſh religion, and to anſwer the books written in defence of the Church of England, which occaſioned Queen Elizabeth's iſſuing a proclamation, forbidding ſuch books to be either ſold or read (z). In 1569, our author Allen appointed one Briſtow, who became afterwards a very eminent man, moderator of ſtudies at Doway (a); which Briſtow, in all probability, was the perſon Allen drew over to his opinions, when he was in England, as is before mentioned. Not long after, Dr. Allen was appointed canon of Rheims, through the intereſt of the Guiſes (b), and to this city he transferred the ſeminary which had been ſettled at Doway. The reaſon which induced this altera-

[D] To reward his zeal in the ſervice of the Catholic Church.] All who are admitted to this dignity, are obliged to prove their deſcents, that is, to ſhow that for ſo many generations they have been gentlemen. We learn from a celebrated Popiſh writer, a very extraordinary circumſtance concerning our author Allen's miſſion in England, the report of which might very poſſibly contribute ſomewhat to his obtaining this preferment. The author having told us the reaſon of his going over to England, proceeds thus: Neither did he lead there an idle or ſupine life, but, like a brave and bold ſoldier, diſguiſed in name and in habit, he ſallied by ſtealth into the enemies quarters, recovering from them many whom they had ſeduced, which grievouſly provoked them, and occaſioned much pains to be taken in order to apprehend him. Once he very narrowly eſcaped, for the perſon employed to ſeize him, who knew him well, and had actually ſupped with him the ſame night, had ſuch a miſt before his eyes when he came to execute his deſign, that he paſſed by him without knowing him (12). It may not be amiſs to obſerve here, becauſe Wood takes no notice of it, that the pupil of whom Allen took ſuch care as to endanger his own health, was Mr. Chriſtopher Blount, afterwards Sir Chriſtopher Blount, who was concerned in the Earl of Eſſex's inſurrection (13).

[It is probable that the perſon employed in the ſearch, was ſome good-natured man, who, becauſe he knew Allen, would not know him. Allen's eſcape may be accounted for without a miracle; for he had to do with Engliſhmen.]

tion, was, becauſe the then governor of the Netherlands, Don Lewis de Requeſens, had obliged the Engliſh fugitives to withdraw out of his government (c). Henceforward Dr. Allen was eſteemed the chief of his party; and indeed he laboured inceſſantly to do it ſervice by writing various treatiſes in defence of the doctrines, and not a few, by way of apology for the practices of the Papiſts; by licenſing, and recommending many books written by others, and by many journies into Spain and Italy. By theſe his labours, he procured a ſeminary to be eſtabliſhed at Rome (d), and two others in Spain (e); wherein Engliſh ſtudents were not only educated in all ſorts of learning, but were alſo maintained and provided for. At home, Dr. Allen was juſtly reputed a capital enemy of the ſtate (f); all correſpondence with him was looked on as the higheſt kind of treaſon, and Thomas Alfield, a Jeſuit, was actually executed for bringing certain books of our author's writing into England [E]. The celebrated Robert Parſons, the Jeſuit, was Dr. Allen's great friend and counſellor (g), and very probably put him upon that deſperate project, which, if it had ſucceeded, would have overwhelmed the Engliſh, and which, as it miſcarried, did in a manner enervate the Spaniſh monarchy. For many years there had been differences, diſcontents, and even actual injuries committed, between the Engliſh and the Spaniards; but now Dr. Allen, and the fugitive Noblemen from England, perſuaded King Philip the Second openly to undertake the conqueſt of their native country (h). To facilitate this, the Pope, who then was Sixtus V. was prevailed upon to renew the excommunication thundered againſt Queen Elizabeth by his predeceſſor Pope Pius V (i). While this was in agitation, Sir William Stanley, who commanded a very conſiderable garriſon of Engliſh and Iriſh in the important town of Daventer, baſely betrayed it to the Spaniards, and went with his whole regiment of 1200 men into that ſervice (k). Rowland York, who had been alſo intruſted with a ſtrong fort in the ſame country, acted in the like infamous manner, which not a little aſtoniſhed the States General of the United Provinces, and brought no ſmall ſcandal on the Engliſh nation (l): yet Dr. Allen wrote a treatiſe in defence of this baſe proceeding, and ſent ſeveral prieſts to Stanley, in order to inſtruct thoſe he had drawn over to the King of Spain's ſervice (m), as the reader will ſee in the notes [F]. [E] Bringing certain books of our author's writing into England.] The college of Doway was ſettled through the prudence and care of Dr. Allen, who procured a penſion from the Pope, for the ſupport of ſuch as led a collegiate life there. Of theſe, there were uſually eight or ten doctors, who officiated as profeſſors: of whom, ſome explained the Holy Scriptures, and others taught ſcholaſtic divinity; but the ſtudies principally encouraged there, were the canon-law, and controverſy. Here alſo, ſuch as were appointed thereto, wrote books againſt hereſy, defended the religion, and the practices of Catholics, againſt the aſperſions of their enemies; and alſo collected memoirs of the ſufferings and deaths of ſuch as were ſtyled martyrs for the Catholic Faith. In the direction of this college, Dr. Allen officiated as preſident, and behaved with ſo much mildneſs, wiſdom, and circumſpection, that he was univerſally revered and beloved (14). He likewiſe reviſed and approved ſuch books as were written there, during the time that he preſided, as appears particularly by his teſtimony prefixed to Richard Briſtow's brief Treatiſe of diverſe ſure and plain ways to find out truth, in this doubtful and dangerous time of Hereſy; to which book Dr. Allen's licence bears date, April 30, 1574 (15). He likewiſe licenſed ſome of the books of Robert Parſons, and of many others. As to this Jeſuit, whoſe name was Thomas Alfield, and who in the text is ſaid to have died for bringing in ſome of our author's books; there is ſtill among the papers of the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, a brief of the treaſonable expreſſions extracted out of Dr. Allen's books, in order to ground his indictment. Theſe expreſſions are moſt of them contained in a treatiſe written by Dr. Allen, intituled, The Defence of the twelve Martyrs in one Year (16), which is not mentioned either by Pits or Wood, in their catalogues of his works. In order to give the reader ſome notion of our author's ſtyle and manner of writing, as alſo, becauſe this book is ſo ſcarce, that 'tis hardly to be met with, we ſhall tranſcribe a paragraph or two from the indictment. 'The bond and 'obligation we have entered into for the ſervice of 'Chriſt and the Church, far exceedeth all other 'duty, which we owe to any human creature. And 'therefore, where the obedience to the inferior 'hindreth the ſervice of the other, which is ſuperior, 'we muſt, by law and order, diſcharge ourſelves of 'the inferior. The wife, if ſhe cannot live with 'her own huſband, being an infidel, or an heretic, 'without injury or diſhonour to God, ſhe may depart from him, or contrariwiſe, he from her, for 'the like cauſe; neither oweth the innocent party, 'nor can the other lawfully claim, any conjugal 'duty, or debt in this caſe. The bond-ſlave, which 'is in another kind, no leſs bound to his lord and 'maſter, than the ſubject to his ſovereign, may 'alſo, by the ancient Imperial laws, depart, and 'refuſe to obey or ſerve him, if he become a Heretic. Yea, ipſo facto, he is made free. Finally, 'the parents that become Heretics, loſe the ſuperiority and dominion they have by the law of nature, 'over their own children. Therefore, let no man 'marvel, that in caſe of hereſy, the Sovereign 'loſeth the ſuperiority over his people and kingdom.' The indictment charges, that the author did hereby intend, that Queen Elizabeth, by reaſon of her hereſy, had fallen from her ſovereignty. It likewiſe charges Thomas Alfield, with bringing the ſaid traiterous books of William Allen into her Majeſty's dominions, and there publiſhing them on the 10th of September, in the twenty-ſixth year of her reign; that is, in 1584 (17). For which facts he was executed at Tyburn, the 6th of July, 1585 (18).

[F] As the reader will ſee in the notes.] This event happened in the winter of 1587. Sir William Stanley had been before in the ſervice of the King of Spain, but deſerted from him, and ſerved with reputation in Ireland. The Earl of Leiceſter made him Governor of Daventer, not only without, but againſt the conſent of the States, who always ſuſpected him; and who, after the Earl was gone into England, would willingly have removed him. Stanley having made an agreement with Count Taxis, admitted him with a ſmall body of troops into the place, and having thus reduced it to the King of Spain's obedience, he was left there Governor, with ſuch of his Iriſh forces as adhered to him. As for Rowland York, whom the Earl of Leiceſter intruſted with a ſtrong fort, to bridle the Spaniſh garriſon in Zutphen, he ſold it to the ſame Count Taxis, who commanded that Spaniſh garriſon (19). The treatiſe written by our author, in defence of this action, was firſt printed in Engliſh, in the form of a letter, and afterwards in Latin, under the title of Epiſtola de Daventriæ Ditione, Cracov. 1588. In this epiſtle it is alledged, that Sir William Stanley was no traitor, becauſe he had only delivered to the King of Spain, a city which was his own before; and all Engliſhmen, in the ſervice of the States, are exhorted to follow his example (20).

give the greater weight to theſe his writings, our author, Allen, on the twenty-eighth of July 1587, was created Cardinal, by the title of St. Martin in Montibus (n); and ſoon after, the King of Spain gave him an Abbey of great value in the kingdom of Naples, with ſtrong aſſurances of much greater preferment, which was afterwards performed. In April 1588, he compoſed that work which rendered him moſt famous abroad, and infamous at home. It conſiſted of two parts, the firſt explaining the Pope's Bull, for the excommunication and deprivation of Queen Elizabeth; the ſecond, exhorting the nobility and people of England to deſert her, and take up arms in favour of the Spaniards (o). Of this book the reader will find a farther account in the notes [G]. It is ſufficient to ſay, that it was by far the ſevereſt piece ever written againſt an Engliſh Prince, and very capable, conſidering the then ſituation of things, of producing miſchievous effects. Many thouſand copies were printed at Antwerp, in order to have been put on board the Armada, that they might have been in readineſs to have been diſperſed by the Papiſts all over England, upon the firſt landing of the Spaniards. But, on the failing of this enterprize, all theſe books were ſo carefully deſtroyed, that very few were preſerved (p). Of theſe, one, as ſoon as it was printed, was tranſmitted by ſome of the Lord Treaſurer's ſpies, to the Engliſh Council, and Queen Elizabeth thereupon ſent Dr. Dale into the Low-Countries, to complain of ſuch a proceeding to the Prince of Parma, who affected to preſerve great meaſures towards her Majeſty. He heard this complaint with a great deal of phlegm, and anſwered, that as he knew of no ſuch book, he could not ſay any thing to its contents (q). After the Armada was deſtroyed, Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, who had been three years in priſon under the charge of high-treaſon, was brought to his trial, and the great crime charged upon him, was his correſpondence with Cardinal Allen, which being proved, he was found guilty by his Peers (r). In the ſame year, the King of Spain promoted our author, as he had promiſed him, to the Archbiſhoprick of Mechlin in Flanders (s), where he would have had him conſtantly reſident, in order to his more effectually cheriſhing the Popiſh and Spaniſh intereſts in England. But the Pope having a high opinion of the Cardinal's merit, and finding him of great uſe in conſiſtories, would not ſuffer him to leave Rome (t), where, however, he laboured as earneſtly as ever in the ſervice of his countrymen and the Catholic Faith. Some have aſſerted, that he and one Sir Francis Ingleſield aſſiſted Father Parſons in compoſing his traiterous book concerning the ſucceſſion (u), which he publiſhed under the name of Doleman, and which was of ſo dangerous conſequence, that it was made capital by law for any perſon to have it in his cuſtody (w). Yet others affirm, that he had no hand in it, but, on the contrary, was very little pleaſed with this treatiſe (x), as tending to perpetuate thoſe diſſentions, which for ſo many years had torn and diſtracted his native country. The remainder of his life he ſpent at Rome in great honour and reputation, living in much ſplendor, and uſing all his intereſt for the comfort and maintenance of ſuch poor Catholics as fled out of England (y). As for the adminiſtration here, they had ſeveral ſpies upon him, and it appears by the papers of the Treaſurer Burleigh, that he had conſtantly very diſtinct accounts of every ſtep the Cardinal took (z). In the laſt years of his life, he is ſaid to have changed his ſentiments, as to government, and to have been heartily ſorry for the pains he had taken in promoting the invaſion of England by the Spaniards: nay, we are told by a very eminent Popiſh writer, that when he perceived the Jeſuits intended nothing but deſolating and deſtroying his native land, he wept bitterly, not knowing how to remedy it, much leſs how to bridle their inſolence (a). This conduct of his drew upon him the ill-will of that powerful ſociety, who, notwithſtanding all the pains he had taken, all the books he had written, all the reputation and rewards he had acquired, gave out that he was a good ſimple man, but not of any eſteem or reckoning in ſtate affairs handled in the Pope's conſiſtory, a man of weak judgment, ſhallow wit, and ſmall advice, never uſed but a little for matters of learning, and that in poſitive only, not in any ſchool point (b). On his death-bed he was very deſirous of ſpeaking to the Engliſh ſtudents then in Rome, which the then Father Rector, a Jeſuit, prevented, as fearing he ſhould have perſuaded them to a loyal reſpect for their Prince, and a tender regard for their country (c). He is generally ſaid to have died of a retention of urine; but it was ſhrewdly ſuſpected, that he was poiſoned by the Jeſuits, which ſuſpicion was attended with ſuch probable circumſtances, that the reverend Fathers themſelves admitted his being poiſoned, but then they charged it on his antagoniſt, the Biſhop of Caſſana, whom they liked not, and who it was thought, on his demiſe, would have been made a Cardinal (d). As for our author, his death happened on the ſixth of October 1594, in the ſixty-third year of his age (e). He was buried with great pomp, in the chapel of the Engliſh college at Rome, where a monument is erected to his memory, with an inſcription, which the reader will find in the notes [H]. Upon the death of this memorable perſon, the Jeſuits, as a Prieſt of the Church of Rome tells us, openly triumphed, and inſulted over the dead corpſe; giving out, among other calumnies againſt him, that he was well gone, and that God had taken him away in good time. For if he had lived but a little while longer, he would have diſgraced himſelf, ſhamed his country, and loſt the credit which he had gotten (f); yet they ſhortly after, for many reaſons, altered their tone, and when they found how little credit theſe diſcourſes met with, magnified the Cardinal's memory, as if he had lived a Saint, and died a Confeſſor [I]. Without all queſtion, it is a very hard taſk, to give this eminent perſon his true character: however, ſince it is our province, we cannot be blamed for attempting it, eſpecially if it be conſidered that we offer nothing but what is ſupported by authority. If we conſider him as an Engliſh ſubject, writing, adviſing, and acting againſt his Prince, we muſt look upon him as a buſy, enterprizing, and dangerous rebel, labouring continually the deſtruction of his Prince and her people, equally ready to perſuade foreigners to invade, or ſubjects to riſe up in arms, which is the picture drawn of him by Camden (g). If, on the other hand, we look on him in the light of a zealous Papiſt, and as one convinced in his conſcience, that what he did was agreeable to the doctrines of the Church, then we cannot deny him the title of an active, learned, and induſtrious perſon; and if we may credit what ſhould ſeem to be the ſtrongeſt evidence, far from being an enemy, in the latter part of his life eſpecially, either to his country, or to his lawful Sovereign Queen Elizabeth (b) [K]. Laſtly, taking him merely as an author, he was unqueſtionably, for matter, method, wit,

[G] Of this book the reader will find, &c.] The firſt part of this book was intitled, A Declaration of the Sentence of Sixtus V; wherein it is maintained, that, by virtue of the Pope's bull, Queen Elizabeth was accurſt, and deprived of her crown; the invaſion and conqueſt of her kingdoms committed to the King of Spain, to execute the ſame with his armies both by ſea and land; and to take the crown to himſelf, or to limit it to ſuch a potentate as the Pope and he ſhould name. The title of the ſecond part was, An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England; and in the title, our author is called the Cardinal of England (21). The chief points inſiſted on in this book, are theſe. The Queen is called the pretended Queen, and the preſent Uſurper. She muſt be deprived of the adminiſtration of the kingdom. She is an Heretic, a Schiſmatic; uſurping the kingdom againſt all right: as for the other cauſes, ſo becauſe ſhe had not the conſent of the great Biſhop of Rome. That ſhe moved the Turk to invade Chriſtendom. She had ſet at ſale, and made a market of laws and rights. Some of her facts make her uncapable of the kingdom. Some others make her unworthy of life. That therefore Pope Sixtus V. had renewed the excommunication againſt her, and deprived her of her title and pretences to the kingdom of England and Ireland, and declared her illegitimate, and an uſurper, and abſolved all her ſubjects from the oath of fidelity to her. And then he charged all perſons to withdraw their aid from her; that worthy puniſhment might be taken of her. And that they join themſelves with the Duke of Parma. Alſo, it was proclaimed lawful to lay hands upon the Queen; and a very great reward was promiſed to them that did ſo. And a ſafe-conduct was then given to as many as would bring warlike proviſions to the Spaniſh camp; and to all who would aſſiſt that enterprize, the Pope doth by indulgence give full pardon, and plenary remiſſion of all their ſins, &c. In the ſame book he ſays, that he was made Cardinal on purpoſe to ſuccour and ſerve his nation at this time, and promiſes that all imaginable diligence ſhall be uſed to preſerve and protect all Catholics, and all ſuch as ſhould come in and ſubmit themſelves to the Prince of Parma. Notwithſtanding all this, many Papiſts were of opinion, that the Cardinal was in a manner compelled to take this book upon himſelf; andthat in reality it was either written or altered by Father Parſons, and other Jeſuits (22). Nay, it is pretended, that the Cardinal himſelf in his lifetime proteſted as much; and it is certain, that after his death, the Jeſuits pretended to father upon him many things, of which he was ignorant. The truth is, the contents of this book were univerſally diſliked by all ſober Catholics (23) as well as Proteſtants; and therefore it is no wonder there is ſuch ſhifting it from one to another.

To the memory of William Alan, a Lancaſtrian, in the Holy Roman Church, Cardinal of England, who, driven from his country, worn out with daily Labours, ſupporting the Orthodox Religion, ſtriving inceſſantly in the founding Seminaries, for promoting the ſpiritual ſafety of his country, cheriſhing when founded, expoſing himſelf to many dangers by ſerving the Church of Rome, in Actions, Writings, and by the whole forces of his Soul and Body, here in its Boſom, endeared by the Fame and Example of his Wiſdom, Piety, Modeſty, and Integrity, he died the 17th of the Kalends of November, in the 63d year of his Age, and of Man's Salvation 1594.

[I] As if he had lived a Saint, and died a Confeſſor.] In order thoroughly to underſtand this perplexed affair, the reader muſt obſerve, that a little before the Spaniſh invaſion, in 1588, it was thought neceſſary, to have ſome Engliſhman promoted to the rank of a Cardinal. The candidates were Dr. Lewis, Biſhop of Caſſana, and our Dr. Allen, and much intereſt was made on both ſides; but at length the Jeſuits being exceedingly apprehenſive of Biſhop Lewis's coming to that honour, it was procured for him of whom we are writing. However afterwards, when the Cardinal did not go all their lengths, they treated him as injuriouſly, as ever they had done any of their greateſt enemies: yet growing again apprehenſive, that Biſhop Lewis might put on that hat which Allen had left, they began to obſerve, in all companies, that the deceaſed Cardinal was a perfect ſaint, that he was juſtly admired by ſeveral Popes, reſpected by all the Princes of Europe, who either knew or heard of him; that his whole ſtudy was for the good of his country, and the maintenance of the Catholic religion, and that yet the Biſhop of Caſſana had made it the buſineſs of his life, to diſturb and diſquiet ſo holy and ſo excellent a man (25).

'YOURS of the tenth of July came ſafely to my hands, and gave me knowledge of a certain overture made to you, by one, that might ſeem to do it by ſome ſecret commiſſion of treaty of an accord between England and Spain, with deſire of my ſenſe therein, either of myſelf or with the Pope, upon ſome reaſonable conditions, for toleration of the Catholic religion in our country. Which argument, how grateful it ſhould be unto me, you that of old knew ſo well my opinion and deſire in that cauſe, may eaſily deem. And after a little wit, learning, language, one of the moſt conſiderable writers of his age, as the greateſt of his enemies, and the beſt critics, have allowed [L]. It ſeems ſtrange, that many of our writers of controverſy, and ſome not unlearned, have treated this our author as a Jeſuit (i); whereas in all controverſies between that order and the ſecular Prieſts, the latter always gloried in Cardinal Allen, as a man to whom no Jeſuit could juſtly be compared in any reſpect [M]. In the cloſe of this life it is proper to remark, that at Rome, and every where abroad, Cardinal Allen was ſtyled Cardinal of England, regarded as the Protector of the nation, and honoured with extraordinary reſpect. He had about him ſeveral perſons of ſome diſtinction, particularly Mr. Fitzherbert, who wrote a large account of his life, which was never printed, as well as the epitome of that life, from which moſt of the facts mentioned in this article are taken; Mr. Thomas Heſket, his nephew; Mr. Banes, who had lived long in Poland; with many others. To maintain his magnificence, he had a revenue of 15,000 crowns per annum, then computed at 4,500 pounds of our money (k). But when it appeared that all this had wrought little, and that there were no hopes of reducing England, either by fraud or force, leſs care

'a little pauſe of mind upon ſo ſudden and unwonted 'news, I could think no otherwiſe, but that God 'himſelf hath ſtirred up in their hearts this motion, 'for the ſaving of that realm from the preſent fears, 'and dangers, and perplexities it is fallen into. And 'thereby alſo a ſpecial [favour] offered at length unto 'me, once e'er I die, not only to give the willing, 'deſired comforts, I owe unto my afflicted Catholic 'friends and brethren, but therein alſo to ſerve 'moſt faithfully and profitably, even my very ene'mies, though otherwiſe than through theſe unfor'tunate differences and debates in religion, [our 'Lord God forgive the author thereof] I know I 'have none; or to do to the one or the other, and 'above all to my native country, moſt dear unto me, 'ſo much good as an unfeigned peace would bring, 'I would travel to the laſt drop of my blood. I 'thank God, I am not ſo eſtranged from the place 'of my birth, moſt ſweet, nor ſo affected to foreign'ers, that I prefer not the weal of that people above 'all mortal things, whereof if it pleaſed the Queen's 'majeſty or council to take a ſure taſte, I deſire no 'more, but that they would confidently uſe and 'command me in this matter. And in truth, upon 'the receipt of your letter, I had not ſlept before I 'had dealt with his Holineſs, if the party that made 'the motion unto you, had brought any warrant in 'the world from any in authority, or any ſufficient 'proof or atteſtation of their contentment therein. 'Which might have been [as yet it may be] kept as 'cloſe as themſelves would require. That they ſo 'did not, if they meant any matter indeed I marvel. 'And you did well and wiſely to ſtand on that point: 'without which I cannot, in reaſon nor honour, at'tempt a thing of that weight and quality with the 'Pope, much leſs bring our purpoſe to paſs, either 'with him or the King. With whom alſo, not on'ly by his Holineſs's mediation, but by myſelf, in 'matters concerning our country and religion, I may 'perhaps do more than I need now to ſay. And 'whatſoever I can do with either of them, I would 'employ in this caſe myſelf to the uttermoſt. 'Though, to ſay the truth, if the Pope were a tem'poral Prince only, being no leſs injured [though in 'another kind] than the King himſelf, his perſon 'were not ſo fit to be a moderator of this pretended 'peace. But being a ſpiritual perſon, and the com'mon and moſt loving father of all Chriſtians, and 'attending above all human reſpects the ſervice of 'God, and the advancement of religion, without 'all formalities and puncto's of worldly humour, I 'am aſſured he will embrace this cauſe with all 'hearty affection. For I know many ways his moſt 'tender heart and deſire towards our country's weal, 'both in God and in the world, &c.'

[L] And the beſt critics have allowed.] In this note we ſhall give an account of ſuch of his writings as we have not already mentioned. Such as, A Defence of the Lawful Power and Authority of the Prieſthood to remit ſins. To which is added two other tracts, The People's Duty in confeſſing; and An Explanation of the Doctrine of the Catholick Church, with reſpect to Indulgencies. Printed at Louvain, 1567, in 8*vo* [27]. De Sacramentis in genere, de Sacramento Euchariſtiæ, & de Miſſæ Sacrificio, Libros tres; i. e. Of Sacraments in general, of the Euchariſt, and of the Sacrifice of the Maſs, three Books. Addreſſed to Pope Gregory XIII. Printed at Antwerp, 1576 (28). Of the Worſhip due to Saints, and their Relicks. 'A 'true, ſincere, and modeſt Defence of Chriſtian 'Catholicks, that ſuffered for their faith at 'home and abroad. Againſt a falſe, ſeditious, and 'ſlanderous libel, intituled, The Execution of Juſ'tice in England: wherein is declared, how unjuſtly 'the Proteſtants do charge Catholics with Treaſon; 'how untruly they deny their perſecution for reli'gion, and how deceitfully they ſeek to abuſe ſtran'gers about the cauſe, greatneſs, and manner of 'their ſufferings; with diverſe other matters per'taining to this purpoſe.' Printed without the name of the place, in 1583 (29). The book to which this was an anſwer, was penned by Lord Burleigh himſelf, and the original, under his own hand, is yet preſerved (30). As for this piece of Cardinal Allen's, it is eſteemed the very beſt of all his writings. It conſiſted of nine chapters, wherein as much is ſaid for his cauſe, and as great learning ſhewn in defending it, as it would admit. Of this diſcourſe it is, that the learned Edmund Bolton, author of Nero Cæſar, gives this character, a princely, grave, and flouriſhing piece, of natural and exquiſite Engliſh, is Cardinal Alan's apology (31). Beſides theſe, he wrote ſome other little treatiſes, which were publiſhed without his name, and therefore cannot certainly be known to be his. To the laſt mentioned book, an anſwer was written by John Stubbe of Lincoln's-Inn (32), by direction of the Lord Treaſurer, and another by Biſhop Bilſon (33).

[M] Could juſtly be compared in any reſpect.] If only the common writers of pamphlets (34), following honeſt John Stowe (35), had ſtyled our author a Jeſuit, I ſhould have looked on it as a mere term of reproach, and not ſtrictly to be taken; but ſince Mr. Strype (36), who ſhould have known better, calls him ſo, it is neceſſary to cite the following ſhort proof of the contrary, from an author of undeniable credit in ſuch a diſpute, I mean Father Watſon, the great champion of the ſecular prieſts againſt that order (37): 'It is, ſays he, a very 'mean occupation, and but coarſe ſtuff, that the 'Jeſuits can and will not make a commodity of one 'way or other. For who knowing what number of 'learned there are in the world, of Dominicans, 'Franciſcans, Auguſtines, Benedictines, Carthu'ſians, &c. that I may omit ſundry Cardinals, 'Biſhops, Deans, Canons, and others, ſecular 'Prieſts, yea of our own nation, as Dr. Allane, 'Dr. Sanders [though too much jeſuited], Dr. Hard'ing, Dr. Stapleton, Dr. Gifford, Dr. Parkinſon, 'Dr. Ely, and a whole ſcore twice told, now in 'eſſe, of ſecular Prieſts, whom no Engliſh Jeſuit is 'able to hold tack withal, yet have theſe Machia'vels got ſuch a general fame and report to fly 'abroad of them, as though there were not one of 'any talent in the world to be found, unleſs he were 'a Jeſuit.' And in another part of the ſame work, this author tells us, that Pope Gregory XIII. made uſe of this phraſe to his Cardinals, Venite Fratres mei, oſtendam vobis Alanum: as much as to ſay, continues he, I will ſhew you a man in Anglia born, to whom all Europe may give place, for his high prudence, reverend countenance, and purport of government (38). But whoever would ſee a ſtill more ample character of this our Cardinal, may conſult a foreign writer, mentioned in the margin, who will give him full ſatisfaction (39).

was taken of Engliſh Prieſts, and few of them were raiſed even to the degree of Biſhops. But in the reign of King Charles II. when it was again thought probable at Rome, that ſomething might be done for promoting the Catholic cauſe in Britain, Philip Thomas Howard, younger brother to the Duke of Norfolk, was created Cardinal, and ſometimes called the Cardinal of England (l), as our Cardinal Allen had been before.

ALBAN (St.) is famous for having been the firſt Chriſtian (a), who ſuffered martyrdom in this iſland; for which reaſon he is uſually ſtyled the St. Stephen, or protomartyr, of Britain [A]. He was born at Verulam, of Pagan parents [B], and flouriſhed towards the end of the third century. In his youth he took a journey to Rome [C], in company with Amphibalus, a Monk of Caer-Leon [D], and ſerved

(a) See the article AARON.

[A] He is ſtyled the —— protomartyr of Britain.] This is the uſual appellation given him by our old hiſtorians. Thus Matthew of Weſtminſter (1) calls him Anglorum ſive Britonum promartyrem, 'the protomartyr of the Engliſh, or Britons:' where, at the word Britonum, ſome critic has put the following remark, which, in the printed books, has crept from the margin into the text. Quod ſolum verum eſt; quia certum eſt, eum Britonem, non Anglicum extitiſſe: unde male dicitur, Anglorum protomartyrem; i. e. 'Which alone is true; becauſe it is certain he was 'a Briton, and not an Engliſhman: ſo that he is 'improperly called the protomartyr of the Engliſh.' For this reaſon Thomas Walſingham, in deſcribing the common-ſeal of the convent of St. Albans, retains only the proper appellation. In quo (ſays he) vetuſtiſſimo opere imago glorioſi protomartyris Britannorum Albani figurabatur, tenens in manu palmam (2). i. e. 'In which moſt ancient piece of workmanſhip, the 'image of St. Alban, the protomartyr of the Britons, was figured, holding a branch of palm in 'his hand.' Venantius Fortunatus, in celebrating the praiſes of the martyrs, writes thus of St. Alban:

(1) Flores Hiſt. an. 794.

(2) Walſing. in Hiſtor. Rich. ii. an. 1. 81.

Egregium Albanum fæcunda Britannia profert (3).

The great St. Alban fruitful Britain bore.

(3) Lib. 8. Carm. 4. de Virginitate.

Notwithſtanding which teſtimonies, Thomas Dempſter (4) contends, that this Saint was by birth a Scotchman, though he ſuffered martyrdom in Britain; and for this he cites the following diſtich of Hartmannus as quoted by Caniſius:

(4) Hiſt. Eccleſ. Scotor. l. i. n. 23.

Scotia ſe Albano felicem martyre clamat,
Victima qui Chriſto prima Britanna fuit.

The Church to Scotland martyr'd Alban ow'd,
Who firſt for Chriſt in Britain ſhed his blood.

The learned Uſher ſought in vain to find theſe verſes in the books of Caniſius; and therefore builds no more upon them, than upon another confident aſſertion of Dempſter's in the ſame place, that he had met with a ſmall treatiſe written by St. Alban, intitled Chriſtianorum Puritas, which the Archbiſhop will venture any wager, neither that hiſtorian nor any other writer ever ſaw. Verum quum in tomis Caniſianis hoc fruſtra quæſiverim, non magis hic apud me fidem ſuam liberat, quam in illo quod in eodem ipſo loco non minori confidentia aſſeverat, perveniſſe ad ſe Albani opuſculum inſcriptum Chriſtianorum Puritas; cujuſmodi libellum neque ab illo, neque a mortalium omnino quoquam, conſpectum fuiſſe unquam, quovis pignore auſim contendere (5). The title of Protomartyr is likewiſe given to St. Alban in an ancient inſcription, found by ſome workmen, who were repairing the eaſt end of the church of St. Alban's, in the year 1257. Theſe labourers, in opening the ground between the ſhrines of St. Oſwin and St. Wulſtan, found certain leaden ſheets containing relics, which, by the following inſcription on a plate of lead, appeared to be thoſe of the martyr. IN HOC MAUSOLEO INVENTUM EST VENERABILE CORPUS SANCTI ALBANI PROTOMARTYRIS ANGLORUM (6); i. e. In this Mauſoleum is found the venerable body of St. Alban, the Protomartyr of the Engliſh. I ſhall only add part of the hymn, which uſed to be ſung on the feſtival of this Saint:

[B] He was a native of Verulam, &c.] This town was anciently called Werlamceſter or Watlingaceſter; the former name being derived from the river Warlame, which ran on the eaſt ſide, the latter from the Roman high-way, called Watling-ſtreet, which lay to the weſt (8). Tacitus calls it Verulamium, and Ptolemy Urolamium. The ſituation of this place was cloſe by the town of St. Alban's in Hertfordſhire, which takes its name from our protomartyr. There is nothing now remaining of old Verulam but ruins of walls, chequered pavements, and Roman coins, which are now and then dug up. It is conjectured from the ſituation, that this was the town of Caſſivelaunus, ſo well defended by woods and marſhes (9), which was taken by Cæſar. In Nero's time, it was eſteemed a Municipium (10), or town, whoſe inhabitants enjoyed the rights and privileges of Roman citizens (11). It was entirely ruined by the Britons, during the war between the Romans and Boadicea Queen of the Iceni. Afterwards Verulam flouriſhed again, and became a city of great note. About the middle of the fifth century, it fell into the hands of the Saxons. But Uther the Briton, from his ſerpentine ſubtilty firnamed Pendragon, recovered it with much difficulty, after a very long ſiege. Alexander Nequam or Neckam, who was born at Verulam in the thirteenth century, mentions this revolution, as alſo the martyrdom of St. Alban (whom he improperly ſtyles a citizen of Rome), in the following verſes (12):

[C] He took a journey to Rome.] Leland tells us, that, at the time when Alban flouriſhed, learning and the polite arts had been lately introduced by the Romans into Britain, which was now become a province of the empire; and that the youth of quality and diſtinction uſed to travel to Rome for improvement in knowledge and the ſciences. *Eo tempore, quo floruit Albanus, bonæ literæ, beneficio magno Romanorum, in Britannia jam in provinciam redacta, enituerunt; uſque adeo ut nobiles votis omnibus eloquentiam, unà cum receptis artibus, inſigniter excolerent. [D] Amphibalus, a Monk of Caer-Leon.] In an ancient book of the Acts of St. Alban and St. Amphibalus, the latter is ſaid to have been a Roman by birth, and to have paſſed into Britain in the time of Diocletian's perſecution (15). But Giraldus Cambrenſis (16) and Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis (17) affirm, that he was born at Caer-Leon, the metropolis of Wales;

ſerved ſeven years as a ſoldier in the armies of the Emperor Diocletian. Having returned home, he ſettled in the town of Verulam, where he lived highly eſteemed by his countrymen, till the perſecution under the above-mentioned Emperor (b). In the mean time, through the example and inſtructions of Amphibalus, he renounced the errors of Paganiſm, in which he had been educated, and became a thorough convert to the Chriſtian religion (c). He was put to death in the year of Chriſt 303 [E], during the tenth and laſt general perſecution of the Church. The ſtory of his martyrdom is very briefly and obſcurely related by Gildas, but more circumſtantially and at large by venerable Bede, the ſubſtance of whoſe narrative is as follows. Being yet a Pagan (or at leaſt it not being known that he was become a Chriſtian) he entertained the above mentioned Amphibalus (d) in his houſe. The Roman Governor being informed that he harboured a Chriſtian, ſent a party of ſoldiers to apprehend him. But Alban, putting on the habit of his gueſt [F], preſented himſelf to the officers in his ſtead, and was carried before that Magiſtrate. The noble freedom with which he behaved [G], and the declaration he made of his converſion to Chriſtianity, ſo enraged the Judge, that he ordered him immediately to be beheaded. In his way to execution, he was ſtopped by a river, over which was a bridge, ſo thronged with ſpectators, that it was impoſſible to croſs it. The Saint, impatient for the crown of martyrdom, approached the brink, and lifting up

Wales; and Rudburn (18) and the author of the little Wincheſter Hiſtory (19) tell us, he was a Monk, and promoted to the clerical office in the cathedral of that city. Johannes Caius (20) likewiſe informs us, that Amphibalus was a native of Caer-Leon; and adds, that he was Rector of the univerſity of Cambridge. However it be, it is certain he was inſtrumental in the converſion of St. Alban, and was himſelf afterwards crowned with martyrdom. See more of him in the ſequel of this article.

[E] He was put to death in the year of Chriſt 303.] The date, aſſigned by Bede (21), is the year 286; in which he is followed by the Anglo-Saxon Annals, and by the Latin Annals aſcribed to Aſſerius Menevenſis; by Thomas Rudburn the elder, in his Leſſer Chronicle; by Johannes Tinmuthenſis, and by Capgrave in his Life of St. Alban; by the Saliſbury Breviary, and others. There is no great variation between this account of time, and the computations of Matthew Paris and Matthew of Weſtminſter. For the former tells us, the relics of St. Alban were diſcovered by King Offa, 507 years after that Saint's death, 344 years after the arrival of the Angles in Britain, on the kalends of Auguſt, the firſt indiction; that is, in the year of Chriſt 793, from which the indictions began to be reckoned. The latter informs us, that his tomb was diſcovered on the Octave of St. Stephen, the beginning of the year 1257, nine hundred and ſeventy years after his death. Here may properly be inſerted the following computations, made by a Monk of St. Alban's, who lived about the middle of the thirteenth century. 'From the incarnation of our 'Lord, to the paſſion of St. Alban, are elapſed '286 years; and from the paſſion of St. Alban, to 'the arrival of Germanus, Biſhop of Auxerre, in 'Britain, 163 years: which put together make 449 'years. From the arrival of St. Germanus, to the 'tranſlation of St. Alban, under the illuſtrious King 'Offa, are 344 years: add theſe to the former, and 'they become 793. From this tranſlation, to that 'which was made in the reign of King Henry I, 'under the Abbot Geoffrey, are 336 years. All 'theſe put together make 1129 years. From this 'laſt tranſlation, to the diſcovery of the ſaid martyr's Mauſoleum, under Abbot John, on the 'octave of St. Stephen, are 127 years. Theſe 'added to the foregoing make the whole 1256. 'And at this time, viz. in the year of our Lord '1257, are elapſed 970 years from the martyrdom 'of St. Alban, counting the beginning of the year 'from the feaſt of the Circumciſion, and not from 'that of the Annunciation.' William Caxton, and after him Johannes Major, in his Scottiſh Hiſtory, refer the martyrdom of St. Alban to the year of Chriſt 226, which is full fifty-eight years before the beginning of Diocletian's reign. According to ſome of the Wincheſter Annals, St. Alban ſuffered in the year 296; according to others, in the year 305. Stowe's Chronicle places his martyrdom in 293; and Wendover's in 304, which that writer calls the nineteenth of Diocletian. The truth of the caſe is; St. Alban was martyred during that dreadful perſecution, which, according to Oroſius and others, laſted ten years. But it appears from Euſebius, that this flame broke out in the year of Chriſt 303, being the nineteenth of Diocletian; and though in other provinces it continued to rage during the ſpace of ten years, yet in Gaul and Britain, where Conſtantius Auguſtus reſided, it ceaſed the very ſucceeding year. And therefore the Martyrdom of St. Alban is properly reckoned among the events of the year 303 (22).

[F] He put on the habit of his gueſt.] The garment of Amphibalus, which Alban, upon this occaſion, put on, is called by Bede, and in ancient writers, Caracalla; which is rendered by the Saxon interpreter of Bede, a monkiſh habit. This Caracalla was a kind of cloak with a cowl, as appears from St. Jerom (23) and Eucherius (24), who, deſcribing the Ephod, or ſacerdotal garment of the Jewiſh Prieſts, tell us, it was made, in modum Caracallæ, after the manner of the Caracalla, or monkiſh dreſs, ſed ſine cuculla, but without a cowl. Hence the diminutive Καραχάλλιον, in the Greek-Latin Gloſſary aſcribed to Cyrill, is explained by Cuculla. Thomas Walſingham relates (25) that this garment was preſerved in the Church of Ely, in a large cheſt, which was opened in the reign of Edward II, A. D. 1314. They found therein a woollen garment, ſo big that it filled the cheſt from top to bottom; and on the upper part of it were perceived ſome ſpots of blood, as freſh as if it had been newly ſtained therewith. This hiſtorian ſays hereupon, that it is plain this garment was the ſame which St. Alban, at the time of his converſion, received from his maſter St. Amphibalus, as a mark of the new religion he had embraced, and the ſame in which the martyr afterwards ſuffered death. Thomas Rudburn, who reports the ſame ſtory (26), goes farther, and tells us, there was found with the garment an ancient writing in theſe words; This is the Caracalla of St. Amphibalus, the Monk, and Preceptor of St. Alban; in which that Protomartyr of England ſuffered death, under the cruel perſecution of Diocletian againſt the Chriſtians.

[G] He behaved with a noble freedom.] It happened at the time when Alban was brought before the Judge, that magiſtrate was ſtanding by an altar, and offering ſacrifice to his Gods. When he ſaw Alban, and perceived the cheat he had put upon him, he ordered him to be dragged before the images of his gods, ſaying to him; Becauſe you have choſen to conceal a ſacrilegious perſon and a blaſphemer, rather than deliver him up to ſuffer the juſt reward of his blaſphemy, the puniſhment due to him ſhall be inflicted on you, if you refuſe to comply with the ceremonies of our religion. Alban, not in the leaſt terrified with theſe threats, boldly declared he would not obey the Judge's commands. The Magiſtrate then aſked him, Of what family he was? Alban replied, To what purpoſe do you enquire of my family? if you would know my religion, I am a Chriſtian. Then the Judge aſked him his name; to which he anſwered, My name is Alban, and I worſhip the only true and living God, who created all things. The Magiſtrate returned, If you would enjoy the happineſs of eternal life, delay not to ſacrifice up his eyes to Heaven, the ſtream was miraculouſly divided [H], and afforded a paſſage for himſelf and a thouſand perſons. This miracle converted the executioner [I] upon the ſpot, who threw away his drawn ſword, and, falling at St. Alban's feet, deſired he might have the honour to die with him, or rather for him. This ſudden converſion of the headſman occaſioning a delay in the execution, St. Alban walked up to a neighbouring hill, where praying for water to quench his thirſt, a fountain ſprung up under his feet. Here he received the crown of martyrdom [K], on the tenth of the kalends of July. The executioner was a ſignal example of divine vengeance: for, at the inſtant of the ſtroke given to the Saint, his eyes dropped out of his head [L]. The behaviour of St. Alban at his death, and the miraculous circumſtances attending it, were inſtrumental in converting many of the ſpectators to Chriſtianity [M]. Between four and five hundred years afterwards, Offa, King of the Mercians, built a very large and ſtately monaſtery, to the memory of St. Alban, in the place where he ſuffered martyrdom [N]. The ſtory of this Saint's death, particularly the miraculous circumſtances attending it, are by many looked upon as fabulous, and without foundation; whilſt others think there is no reaſacrifice to the great gods. Alban anſwered, The ſacrifices you offer are made to devils; neither can they help the needy, or grant the petitions of their votaries. The Judge was now enraged beyond meaſure, and commanded the holy confeſſor to be beaten, in hopes thereby to ſhake his conſtancy: but finding all means ineffectual, he ordered him to be taken away, and led to immediate execution (27).

[H] The ſtream was divided.] Neither Bede, nor the other antient writers of the Acts of St. Alban, have told us the name of this river. In a few copies of Gildas, it is true, the word Tameſis or Tamenſis appears: but it is not to be found in the manuſcript of that author in the public library of Cambridge. Nor can it be admitted, unleſs we ſuppoſe Gildas to have given the name of Tameſis to the Coln, becauſe that river empties itſelf into the Thames. For the Coln runs through part of Hertfordſhire, between old Verulam and new St. Albans (28).

[I] This miracle converted the executioner.] Capgrave calls the ſoldier, who was to have beheaded St. Alban, by the name of Heraclius (29); and the author of the Acts of St. Alban and St. Amphibalus (30) gives him that of Araclius. This man had the honour to bury St. Alban with his own hands, and afterwards to tread in his ſteps. He is celebrated by Robert of Dunſtable (31) in the following verſes:

This ſoldier is placed in the Roman martyrologies together with St. Alban.

[K] Here he received the crown of martyrdom.] The place where he was beheaded, was called in the Anglo-Saxon language Holm-hurſt. Hurſt ſignifies a Wood; and an ancient author, quoted by Archbiſhop Uſher, tells us, he had ſeen the place, and that it was overgrown with trees. Vidi locum repleri arborum denſitate, in quo martyr invictus quondam pro Chriſto ſententiam ſubiit capitalem. In after-times, it obtained the name of Derſwold Wood, and was the ſpot whereon the town of St. Albans was built (32).

[M] Many of the ſpectators were converted to Chriſtianity.] One of them, being more ſenſibly touched than the reſt, delivered himſelf to this effect: He told them, 'That if St. Alban had proved his 'belief by mere rhetoric, he ſhould not have wonder'ed if his countrymen had paid no regard to his 'diſcourſe: for why ſhould they liſten to a perſua'ſion, which ſtood condemned by the conſtitutions 'and religious cuſtoms of their anceſtors? But ſince 'he wrought miracles in atteſtation of his doctrine, 'not to ſubmit to ſuch irreſiſtible evidence, was, in 'effect, to ſtand out againſt the omnipotence of God; 'for that God was the author of thoſe wonderful 'effects, was paſt diſpute.' With what colour of ſenſe then (adds he) can we diſpute the truth of thoſe doctrines, thus ſupernaturally atteſted? For when was ever any thing of this kind performed by our deities, or heard of in our religion? And beſides all this, the character of the man was admirable. His patience and conſtancy, his temper and devotion, were particularly remarkable; inſomuch that, all things conſidered, his behaviour ſeems almoſt as great a miracle as any of the reſt. When he was inſulted, he ſhewed no uneaſineſs, nor indeed ſeemed to have any paſſion about him but that of pity. And when he was brought to the place of execution, he diſcovered as much pleaſure in his countenance, as if he had been going to an entertainment. Who, upon reflection, does not eaſily perceive, that Alban was ſupported by more than human aſſiſtance? And if ſuch greatneſs and conſtancy be the peculiar marks of divine favour, we may certainly conclude, that ſuch bleſſings are beſtowed only on the virtuous and devout. And therefore the beſt ſervice we can do ourſelves and our country, is to embrace St. Alban's principles, and imitate his example. This diſcourſe being well received by the auditors, they unanimouſly declared for the Chriſtian religion; and wanting a perſon to inſtruct them more fully, and aſſiſt them in religious offices, they went in queſt of Amphibalus, who had converted St. Alban. This Monk, having eſcaped the fury of his perſecutors, was retired into Wales, where he preached with wonderful ſucceſs, and converted great numbers to the Chriſtian faith. The men of Verulam abovementioned, being about a thouſand in number, travelled into Wales, where they all received baptiſm at the hands of St. Amphibalus (35).

[N] Offa, King of the Mercians, built a monaſtery in the place where St. Alban ſuffered martyrdom.] This foundation was made in the year 795. That King, and ſeveral of his ſucceſſors, beſtowed large poſſeſſions on this religious houſe, and obtained ample privileges for it from ſeveral Popes. Particularly, it was exempt from paying the apoſtolical duty called Romeſcot or Peter-pence: its Abbot, or Archdeacon acting under him, had epiſcopal juriſdiction over all the clergy and laity reſiding on any of the lands belonging to the monaſtery; and Pope Adrian IV. who was an Engliſhman, and born near Verulam, granted to the Abbot of this monaſtery; that as St. Alban (theſe are the words of the privilege) is well known to be the protomartyr of the Engliſh nation, ſo the abbot of his monaſtery ſhould, at all times, be reputed the firſt in dignity of all the Abbots. The church of this monaſtery is ſtill in being, and is much admired for its largeneſs, beauty, and antiquity. When the Monks were turned out, it was purchaſed by the townſmen for four hundred pounds, and converted into a parochial church (36).

ſon to diſbelieve the miracles recorded of St. Alban [O]. St. Amphibalus himſelf afterwards ſuffered martyrdom [P] at Rudburn, three miles diſtant from Verulam.

[O] The ſtory of this Saint's death —— is by many looked upon as fabulous —— whilſt others think there is no reaſon to diſbelieve the miracles recorded of St. Alban.] Our great Milton, in his Hiſtory of England (37), ſeems to give very little credit to the narrative of Bede and others. His words are, ſpeaking of St. Alban, The ſtory of whoſe martyrdom, ſoiled and worſe martyred with the fabling zeal of ſome idle fancies, more fond of miracles, than apprehenſive of truth, deſerves no longer digreſſion. Let us now hear Mr. Collier. 'As for 'St. Alban's miracles, being atteſted by authors of 'ſuch antiquity and credit, I do not ſee why they 'ſhould be queſtioned. That miracles were wrought 'in the Church at that time of day, is clear from 'the writings of the ancients. To ſuppoſe there 'are no miracles but thoſe in the Bible, is to believe 'too little. To imagine that God ſhould exert his 'omnipotence, and appear ſupernaturally for his 'ſervants, in no place but in Jewry, and in no age 'ſince the Apoſtles, is an unreaſonable fancy. For 'ſince the world was not all converted in the 'Apoſtles time, and God deſigned the farther en-'largement of his Church, why ſhould we not be-'lieve he ſhould give the Pagans the higheſt proof 'of the truth of Chriſtianity, and honour his ſer-'vants with the moſt undiſputed credentials? Now 'if this is very reaſonable to ſuppoſe, why ſhould 'St. Alban's miracles be diſbelieved, the occaſion 'being great enough for ſuch an extraordinary in-'terpoſition? For by this means the martyr muſt 'be mightily ſupported, the Britiſh Chriſtians for-'tified againſt the perſecution, and the Pagans ſur-'priſed into a converſion (38).'

[P] St. Amphibalus ——— ſuffered martyrdom.] We have ſeen in the remark [M], that a thouſand of the inhabitants of Verulam were converted and baptized by this Saint. The reſt of the burghers who continued Heathen, being vexed at the loſs of ſo many of their townſmen, took arms, and went after them into Wales; where they inhumanly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. As for St. Amphibalus, who had inſtructed and baptized them, they brought him away with them, and ſtoned him to death at Rudburn (39); in which town Thomas Rudburn the hiſtorian (who was born there, and wrote in the fifteenth century) affirms there were two knives found of an extraordinary ſize, ſuppoſed to have been uſed upon that occaſion (40). It is remarkable, that the martyrdom of St. Amphibalus is not mentioned by Gildas, Bede, or in any of the ancient martyrologies; but Matthew Paris, and other hiſtorians, vouch the matter of fact from a book of great antiquity in St. Alban's monaſtery. As to the name Amphibalus, it came originally from Geoffrey of Monmouth's Britiſh Hiſtory (41); though the learned Archbiſhop of Armagh is of opinion, it was not the real name of St. Alban's inſtructor, but belonged more properly to the Caracalla or garment mentioned above (42), than to its owner (43); ἀμφιβαλλειν ſignifying in the Greek language the ſame as induere, or accingere ſc. veſtem. [We cannot avoid expreſſing our opinion, that, in the preceding article, too much attention hath been paid to the miracles ſaid to have been wrought at the time of St. Alban's martyrdom. Neither was it reaſonable to ſet the ſentiments of ſo weak and credulous a man as Collier, in oppoſition to the ſound judgment of Milton. The facts related in the text are too abſurd in themſelves, as well as too deſtitute of ſatisfactory evidence, to admit of credit. There appears to be no ſufficient reaſon for allowing the truth of any miracles beyond thoſe of the apoſtolic age. The ſcheme of Dr. Middleton, though it occaſioned much alarm at firſt, and was written againſt by many learned men, hath ſilently and gradually ſpread itſelf, till it ſeems to have become the ſyſtem of the greater part of rational and moderate Divines; and the productions of his antagoniſts are ſunk into oblivion. The only true diſtinction is that which is laid down and ſupported by Dr. Douglas, in his excellent work, intitled the 'Criterion.' All the miracles pretended to have been wrought, excepting thoſe of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian Revelations, will be found, when accurately examined, either not to have been miraculous in their nature, or to be void of proper and ſatisfactory evidence. Whereas the nature of the extraordinary facts recorded in the Old and New Teſtament is ſuch, that they muſt have been miraculous; and the teſtimony in favour of them is ſo ſtrong and deciſive, that they muſt have been true. Thus they ſtand upon a diſtinct and an unmoveable foundation.] K.

ALBANACT, or ALBANAK, the ſon of Brutus or Brito, from whom this iſland is ſaid to have received the name of Britain (a). Many very learned men deny the exiſtence of him and his ſuppoſed father. It is neceſſary, however, to the thorough underſtanding of our ancient hiſtory, to be acquainted with what it reports of him, and that is briefly this [A]. Brutus, King of this whole iſland, had by his wife Ignoge, three ſons, Locrin, Kamber, and Albanact (b). To the eldeſt, he gave [A] And that is briefly this.] It is not our intention, in this article, to enter into the great controverſy which hath divided, nay, and well nigh confounded our beſt Antiquaries, viz. whether any credit is due to the ſtory of Brute? Our preſent buſineſs, therefore, ſhall be to examine this ſtory of Albanact; and to inquire if the arguments alledged to prove it fabulous, be more weighty, than thoſe which have been, or may be urged for it as a true hiſtory. To this inquiry, we have been led by ſeveral inducements. One was the fitneſs of diſcuſſing ſuch points in this work, it being hard to think of another, into which they would ſo properly fall. A ſecond reaſon was, the ſhewing foreigners that theſe matters are not altogether ſo void of light, as ſome who have ſkimmed the Britiſh hiſtory would perſuade them. To which we may add an inclination to demonſtrate the folly of rejecting without conſideration, as fabulous, all that relates to very ancient times. It is morally certain, that the dread of credulity, hath betrayed more people into it, than ever it kept from leaning thereto. An age or two ago, a man would have been laughed at for adviſing recourſe to Turkiſh hiſtories, in order to correct thoſe we have of that nation's riſe, progreſs, and preſent ſtate, yet now many excellent authors confeſs it to be neceſſary (1). But if we reflect on what would have been ſaid, if at that time one had mentioned the memoirs of a Tartar Prince (2), and his ſkill in Aſtronomy, it will not appear ſo amazing a paradox, ſhould we even venture to aſſert, there is more wiſdom in doubting the truth of the old Britiſh hiſtory, than in believing it wholly falſe and fictitious. For while we only doubt we are ready at any time to review old arguments, or to hear new evidence; whereas a thing once declared fabulous, is thenceforward condemned to oblivion. All who are well read, eſpecially in oriental hiſtory, know of how great conſequence this advice is; and that without it, we had never known more of the famous Timur, who ſubdued a larger empire than Alexander, than our immediate anceſtors, who called him Tamerlane, and reported him a lame blackſmith (3). Some ſuch introduction as this was neceſſary, not to this article of Albanact only, but to ſeveral others of as ancient date; and therefore this preface, once for all, may ſuffice to gain attention to the narrative itſelf, though not abſolutely certain; and to render the notes leſs tedious, which expoſe the grounds of theſe diſputes. It may indeed be objected, that all ſuch diſputes are frivolous, to which we anſwer, that concerns not us: very great men have engaged in them; and have ſo far introduced them into all our hiſtories, as to make it our duty to clear them the beſt we may.

the middle and beſt part of the iſland, called from him Loëgria; to the ſecond, Kamber, the country on the other ſide of Severn; and to the youngeſt, Albanact, all the land on the other ſide the Humber. This was ſome time before his death, which happened in the year before Chriſt 1114 (c), when all the young Princes were at their reſpective governments. For ſome years they all three governed their countries in peace and proſperity; but at length, Humber, King of the Huns, invaded the dominions of Albanact with a great army, ſlew him, and drove his people to fly for ſhelter to Locrin, who, equally ſtung with his brother's loſs, and the inſult offered to himſelf, drew together all his forces, and gave battle to the invader, who was now in his territories, defeated him, and in the flight forced him into a river, in which he was drowned, whence it received his name, and hath never ſince been otherwiſe called than Humber (d). This fell out about 1104 years before Chriſt (e); and from this King Albanact, the northern part of this iſland was called Albany, as it is by its natives to this day. Our ancient hiſtorians, who relate theſe facts, ſome of whom are mentioned in the margin, agree pretty well in their dates, and in their relation, and ſo they well might, if, as ſome ſay, they all tranſcribed the work of him who is firſt mentioned. But as this does not appear, ſo we think no conſequences ſhould be drawn from an unproved aſſertion [B]. The old Scots hiſtorians (f) did not much oppoſe this account of their country's receiving the name of Albany; but Buchanan is very angry with it, and will by no means allow that this is any thing better than a fable (g). Of which however we ſhall prove he was a moſt incompetent judge. On his authority, ſucceeding authors have treated this narration with extraordinary contempt. We decide nothing, but for the reader's ſatisfaction, and to place this controverſy in a true light, we will fairly ſtate the arguments on both ſides, that the judicious peruſer may frame his concluſion according to reaſon and evidence [C].

ALCOCK

[B] An unproved aſſertion.] The grand argument againſt this part of the Britiſh hiſtory is, that it has no foundation but in one author's writings, viz. Geoffrey of Monmouth. Now thoſe who ſay this, beg the queſtion, becauſe they affirm that other authors tranſcribe his book, who perhaps never ſaw it. Geoffrey relates the death of Brutus, the diviſion of his kingdom, the invaſion of Humber, the death of Albanact, and Locrin's victory, but without a date (4). Henry of Huntingdon relates the coming of Brutus, which he ſays he met with in ſeveral authors (5). But he ſays nothing of Albanact; ſo that it ſeems many writers had touched this ſubject before Geoffrey, with whom this Henry was contemporary (6). The Chronicle of Godſtow is the work of various writers; it makes no mention of Geoffrey, though the hiſtory does indeed correſpond with his, except in dates, which are carefully placed here (7), though omitted as I have ſaid by Geoffrey. Alured of Beverley is noted by the induſtrious Leland (8), to have taken moſtly out of Geoffrey's Britiſh hiſtory, yet himſelf ſays nothing of this. He ſpeaks of ancient books he had read, and particularly of a Britiſh hiſtory (9) he uſed, but does not ſay it was Geoffrey's. In all probability it was not, for Alured has many things not to be found in Geoffrey of Monmouth. But the faireſt and fulleſt proof that can be had, or indeed deſired, that the ſtory of Albanact reſts not on this ſuſpected author, is the teſtimony of Girald Barry, or as he has been commonly called, Giraldus Cambrenſis, who in his deſcription of Wales (10), delivers this whole ſtory as it ſtands in our text; though immediately after he calls Geoffrey a fabulous writer, and treats him with the utmoſt indignity. Hence it is moſt evident, that this hiſtory was found elſewhere than in Geoffrey's writings, and ſo it is aſſerted by Leland (11), in a tract, or rather in hiſtorical collections for a tract, to prove the ſuperiority of the Kings of England over Scotland. In theſe notes it is ſaid, that Albanact's ruling over Scotland, and leaving it his name, ſtood in many ancient Chronicles then in being. This, however, was no more than had been affirmed long before by Edward I. to the Pope, in a letter, wherein this poſſeſſion and right of Albanact is ſtated as a thing notorious and indubitable (12). But after all, this iſland was very populous when the Romans came firſt hither under Cæſar, ſo that it muſt have been long inhabited. We have no account of theſe inhabitants from other authors; the ancient bards retained theſe remains and ruins of old hiſtory, which, on a nice enquiry, will be found a thing cuſtomary in all nations, even the moſt barbarous. Here are various hiſtorians, who have (as the Greeks did) turned their verſe into proſe: here is a royal letter too, in ſupport of its authority; and if, after all, darkneſs is welcomer than ſuch a light, why no body is bound to take it. The ſtory, with its proofs, is propoſed; and if they are not ſufficient to procure it credit, they are at leaſt ſuch as ought to ſecure it a place in this Dictionary, that it may abide the cenſure of the public.

[C] According to reaſon and evidence.] The point here to be diſcuſſed is, whether Scotland was called Albania, or Albany, from Albanact? Buchanan deſpiſes this etymology, and treats the ſtory as a fable. To ſtate his reaſons fairly, they are theſe (13). 1. This account depends on the ſtory of Brute, which he eſteems a ridiculous fable, and the invention of the Monk of Monmouth. 2. He ſays the derivation of Albania, from Albanactus is not grammatical (14). 3. He can give us the true derivation. Albany is from Albion, the old name of the whole iſland, which was ſo called, not from the whiteneſs but height of its mountains (15). To theſe particulars, plain and eaſy anſwers may be given. 1. The overturning the Monk of Monmouth's hiſtory, will not prove the ſtory of Brute a fable (16). Our ballads relate many fictions about Roſamond, yet there was certainly ſuch a woman. But Buchanan, I believe, never read Geoffrey, though he quotes him; for he banters him about one Tintagol a giant, of whom the Monk of Monmouth ſays not a word. 2. As to the grammatical criticiſm, we muſt obſerve, that Albanactus is a Britiſh name latinized, ſo is Albania: now how faulty ſoever the derivation may be, according to the Roman uſage, that does by no means ſhew that the Britiſh name of the man might not be the ground of the Britiſh name of the country. I ſhall preſently ſhew Buchanan knew better. 3. It is a conjecture only, that Alp and Alb, ſignify high; and beſides he owns the old cuſtom was to name places from perſons, as Knock-Fergus, i. e. the Rock of Fergus (17), from his being loſt there. But to theſe we may add ſome poſitive arguments in favour of the Britiſh account. 1. Buchanan (18) owns the Britiſh language prevailed originally through the iſland; and that in this language, Scotland is called Albin, and the Scots Albinich, which is preciſely what the Britiſh author called them, whom the Monk of Monmouth tranſlated. 2. He can give us no counter-hiſtory to this; for Fergus, the firſt King of Scotland, came thither as he ſays (19), three hundred and thirty years before Chriſt, in the reign of Coil, a Britiſh King, which is agreeable to the Britiſh hiſtory he ſo much condemns. 3. This name of Scotland correſponds with all the other appellations impoſed by the Britons, whence we are ſenſible the Roman or Latin names were framed not more elegantly than this.

On

On the whole, Buchanan ſhews himſelf infinitely a better Philologiſt than he is an Antiquary; and if this controverſy ſhould be determined according to his rule, that Britiſh names are to be accounted for from the Britiſh tongue, and not from the Greek and Latin; as alſo in conſequence of his conceſſions; without doubt this old derivation will appear both natural and probable. Hector Boethius, whom Buchanan owns to have been a learned man, was aware of this, and did not therefore diſpute the point. But what is ſtill more to the purpoſe, the very learned Biſhop Leſley, who was ſcarcely inferior to Buchanan, even in his Latin ſtyle; and in politics and antiquities much his ſuperior: a prelate who reſided long in England, converſed with our Antiquaries; and who, notwithſtanding, had no great reaſon to be in love with our nation, agrees exactly with us in this etymology (20). The hiſtory of Brute and his ſons does not appear at all incredible to him; and he ſays expreſsly, that the original of Albany is Albanact. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that Shakeſpeare has introduced Albanact into one of his plays (21), probably to familiarize the name to his countrymen, and to preſerve the memory of the ſole ſovereignty of Brute. [Notwithſtanding the ingenuity diſplayed by our worthy predeceſſor, we can ſcarcely think that the article of Albanact, involved as it is in obſcurity and fable, was deſerving of ſo much attention. Neither was it, in this reſpect, neceſſary to treat Buchanan with ſeverity, or to prefer Biſhop Leſley to him. The royal letter of Edward the firſt, which was deſigned to ſupport a particular point at any rate, is a very inſufficient authority either for the exiſtence of Albanact, or his ruling over the kingdom of Scotland; and we believe that few of our preſent Antiquaries will agree in ſuppoſing, that the name of Albany might be given to the northern part of this iſland, in conſequence of its having been under the government of Albanact.] K.

ALCOCK (John) ſucceſſively Biſhop of Rocheſter, Worceſter, and Ely, in the latter end of the fifteenth century, was born at Beverley in Yorkſhire, and educated at the univerſity of Cambridge, where he took the degree of Doctor of Laws. In the year 1461, he was collated to the church of St. Margaret's, New Fiſh-Street, by Thomas Kemp, Biſhop of London, and in the ſame year was advanced to the Deanery of St. Stephen's College, Weſtminſter. In 1462 he was appointed Maſter of the Rolls (a). Six years after, he obtained two Prebends, one in the church of Sarum, and the other in that of St. Paul's, London. In 1470, he was made a Privy Counſellor, and one of the Ambaſſadors to the King of Caſtile; and, in the next year, he was, together with others, a Commiſſioner to treat with the Commiſſioners of the King of Scotland. About the ſame time, he was appointed, by Edward the Fourth, to be of the Privy Council to his ſon Edward Prince of Wales. He was alſo in 1471 promoted to the Biſhoprick of Rocheſter; and in 1472, conſtituted Lord High Chancellor of England (b), which great poſt he doth not appear to have held longer than ten months. In 1476 he was tranſlated to the See of Worceſter, and appointed Lord Preſident of Wales (c). During his being Biſhop of Worceſter, he very elegantly enlarged the collegiate church of Weſtbury. He was in diſgrace with the Protector Richard Duke of York, and was removed from his office of Preceptor to Edward the Fifth, on account of his attachment to that young Prince. Soon after the acceſſion of King Henry the Seventh, he had again, for a ſhort time, the cuſtody of the great ſeal. At length, in 1486, he was raiſed to the Biſhoprick of Ely, in the room of Dr. John Morton, tranſlated to Canterbury, and, according to A. Wood, MS. Glyn, he was made Preſident of the Council of King Edward the Fourth, in the ſame year; which is a palpable miſtake, as Henry the Seventh came to the Crown in 1485 (d). Biſhop Alcock, in 1488, preached a ſermon in St. Mary's church at Cambridge, which laſted from one o'clock in the afternoon, till paſt three (e). He was a Prelate of ſingular learning and piety (A); and was, not only a conſiderable writer, but an excellent architect, which occaſioned his being made Comptroller of the royal works and buildings, under Henry the Seventh. He founded a ſchool at Kingſton upon Hull, (Fuller ſays, at Beverley (f);) and a chapel on the ſouth ſide of the church, in which his parents were buried. He built the beautiful and ſpacious hall belonging to the epiſcopal palace at Ely, and made great improvements in all his other palaces. Laſtly, he founded Jeſus College in Cambridge [B], for a Maſter, ſix Fellows, and as many Scholars (g). This Prelate wrote ſeveral Pieces; particularly theſe following: 'Mons Perfectionis ad 'Carthuſianos.' London, 1501, 4*to*. 'Galli Cantus ad Confratres ſuos curatos in 'Synodo apud Barnwell, 25 Sept. 1498.' Lond. per Pynſon, 1498, 4*to*. This is Biſhop Godwin's account of the matter. But Camden (3), and others tell us, that the Nuns of that houſe were ſo notorious for their incontinence, and ſo generally complained of, that King Henry VII, and Pope Julius II, conſented to its diſſolution. And agreeably hereto, Bale (4) calls this nunnery ſpiritualium meretricum cœnobium, i. e. a community of ſpiritual harlots. [Jeſus College, under the patronage of the Biſhops of Ely, hath ſince increaſed much in buildings and revenues; and now conſiſts of a Maſter, ſixteen Fellows, and thirty Scholars.]

ALCRED, ALCREDUS, or ALREDUS, King of Northumberland. He was lineally deſcended from Ida, the firſt King of the Bernicii, and was born about the year 740 (a). When he attained to man's eſtate, he ſaw his country miſerably diſtracted, partly through the vices of their Kings, and partly through the madneſs of the people. Oſulf, who ſucceeded on the voluntary reſignation of his father, and who was the lawful heir of the kingdom of Northumberland, periſhed by a conſpiracy in his own family, in the year 758 (b). In his ſtead, Æthelwold, who is alſo called Moll, ſucceeded by a popular election; for it does not appear, that he was ſo much as of the royal family (c). This it ſeems was by no means pleaſing to many of the great Lords of the kingdom, eſpecially ſuch as were of the royal blood; and therefore Oſwin, a perſon of great intereſt in his country, took up arms againſt him, but with very little ſucceſs; for his army being totally routed, he was himſelf alſo ſlain, at a place called Edwin's Cliff, in the month of Auguſt 761 (d). This, however, did not hinder Alcred from aſſerting his right to the crown, in which he proved ſucceſsful; for, as ſome of our hiſtorians tell us, he procured Æthelwold to be fraudulently ſlain near Durham, in 765 (e). Roger Hoveden ſays, King Æthelwold loſt his kingdom at Wincanheale, in the latter end of October that year (f); and the Saxon Chronicle intimates, that after ſix years reign he reſigned (g). However it was, Alcredus at this time aſcended the throne, which proved no eaſy ſeat to him (h). In 768 died Elbert, King of Northumberland, in the cloiſter which he had choſen for his retreat. The ſame year King Alcred married his Queen Oſgerna (i). He ſeems to have lived upon good terms with his neighbours, and to have taken ſome pains in cultivating a friendſhip with foreign Princes (k). However, he was as far from pleaſing his ſubjects as any of his predeceſſors, inſomuch that about Eaſter, in the year 774, he was compelled to fly from York, with a very ſmall number of dependents, who choſe rather to follow his fortunes, than to deſert his perſon (l). He retired firſt to the ſtrong city of Bebba, which is thought to be the town now called Bamborrow in Northumberland, and finding himſelf not ſafe there, he ſought the protection of Cynoth, King of the Picts, who treated him kindly (m). Two of our ancient hiſtorians aſſert, that this King Alcred was depoſed by the unanimous conſent of all the Princes of the royal family, and other great Lords of his kingdom (n), which hath drawn ſome to conſider this as an inſtance of depoſing a King for mal-adminiſtration [A]. Thoſe who expelled him, either recalled out of baniſhment, or took out of priſon, Æthelred, the ſon of Æthelwold, and ſet him upon the throne. In 778 they expelled him, and crowned Alfwold of the blood royal, who governed the kingdom ten years (o). It is not certain how long Alcred lived in exile, or where he died; but in all probability it was before this Prince came to the throne, who was his near relation, and who took his two ſons, Ofred and Alcmund, into his protection. He was an excellent Prince, and as our hiſtorians ſay, exceedingly pious (p). Yet, in 788, or as the Saxon Chronicle has it, in 789, towards the end of September, he was treacherouſly murdered by one Siga, a powerful nobleman (q); who ſome years after, ſtung with remorſe, laid violent hands on himſelf (r). To him ſucceeded his nephew Ofred, the ſon of Alcred, who in leſs than a year was betrayed and driven into exile; and Æthelred, the ſon of Æthelwold, being a ſecond time recalled from baniſhment, again mounted the throne (s). Ofred having ſtill ſome friends, in 792 returned out of the Iſle of Man, then called Euphania, and endeavoured to dethrone his competitor; but being betrayed, he was defeated, and delivered up into the hands of Æthelred, who cauſed him to be put to death; though he ſuffered his body to be royally interred at Tinmouth (t). In 794, King Æthelred was murdered by his people, and was ſucceeded in the kingdom by Eardwulf (u); though Roger Hoveden ſays, that Oſbald ſucceeded him, and was depoſed and baniſhed in twenty-ſeven days (w): to whom ſucceeded Eardwulf, who held the kingdom, not without much trouble, many years; and in 800, procuring Alcmund, the younger ſon of Alcred, to be put into his hands, by thoſe who had the care of him, he cauſed him and all his attendants to be put to death (x); thereby putting an end to the family of Alcred, and all its pretenſions. But ſuch was the prudence, piety, and integrity, of this young Prince, that though he was thus cut off, by a ſudden and violent death, in the bloom of his youth, and without any fault of his own, yet many years after his deceaſe, he was, for the fame of his virtues, reputed a ſaint; and, as ſuch, had the nineteenth day of March appointed for his feſtival (y). There was alſo another ſaint of his name (z), of whom, to avoid multiplying articles, we will ſay ſomewhat in the notes, that we may omit nothing curious or inſtructive; and which, at the ſame time, has any relation to the Britiſh hiſtory [B].

[A] An inſtance of depoſing a King for male-adminiſtration.] Amongſt the ſtate tracts, written in the reign of King William, there is the ſpeech of the Right Honourable Thomas, Earl of Stamford, at the general quarter ſeſſions, held for the county of Leiceſter at Michaelmas 1691, his Lordſhip being then Cuſtos Rotulorum for that county. The intent of this ſpeech is to vindicate the Revolution; wherein his Lordſhip having run through all the inſtances of depoſitions of Princes in France, Spain, and Scotland, proceeds thus: 'As for England, 'I will mention ſome few before the Conqueſt '(vulgarly ſo called), who were Archigallo, Eme'rian, Vortigern, Sigebert, King of the Weſt 'Saxons, Beornred, and Alured, King of Northum'berland; all theſe were deprived of their thrones 'for their cruel and evil government, and others 'more worthy put in their ſtead (1).' This muſt be founded on what we are told by Simeon of Durham, who in his hiſtory, under the year 794, writes thus: 'Alcredus Rex conſilio & conſenſu ſuorum 'omnium, reges familiæ ac principum deſtitutus 'ſocietate, exilio imperii mutavit majeſtatem; i. e. 'King Alcred, by the common council and conſent of 'his ſubjects, being deſerted by his Princes, and even 'thoſe of the Royal Family, changed his royal ſtate 'for an inglorious exile (2).' Roger Hoveden tranſcribes this account literally (3); though by a different manner of pointing it, it has ſomewhat a different ſenſe given to it in Sir Henry Savil's edition. It is very remarkable, that Simeon of Durham hath exactly the ſame ſtory of another King of Northumberland: for under the year 796, having related the murder of King Æthelred, he goes on thus: 'Oſbald vero patricius à quibuſdam ipſius gentis 'principibus in regnum eſt conſtitutus, & poſt XXVII 'dies omni regiæ familiæ ac principum eſt ſocietate 'deſtitutus, fugatuſque & de regno expulſus, atque 'ad inſulam Lindisfarnenſem cum paucis ſeceſſit, & 'inde ad Regem Pictorum cum quibuſdam è fratri'bus navigio pervenit (4); i. e. One Oſbald, a 'Nobleman, was by ſome of his own party exalted to 'the throne; but being deſerted by all of the Royal 'Family, and by the great men, in twenty-ſeven days 'ſpace he was compelled to fly, with a few of his 'followers, out of the kingdom, retiring into Holy 'Iſland; and thence he paſſed in a bark, with ſome 'of his brethren, into the dominions of the King of 'Picts.' Neither are theſe all the inſtances of that nature to be met with in the Chronicle of the Northumbrian Kings (5). On the contrary, there are ſeveral others both before and after him; inſomuch that it is certain that the people in thoſe days made very free with their monarchs; or rather their chiefs made free with them, as was the caſe alſo in Scotland.

[B] Has any relation to the Britiſh hiſtory.] It is ſurprizing, that Alford (6) the Jeſuit, ſhould particularly relate the martyrdom and canonization of this St. Alemund, and yet ſay nothing of another Saint of the ſame name, who ſeems to have been much more famous. He was alſo a Northumbrian, and flouriſhed about the ſame time with this other Alcmund; whence I have ſometimes inclined to doubt, whether the latter was not ſupplanted by the former. This other Alcmundus was Biſhop of Hexham in Northumberland; and Richard the Prior, in his celebrated hiſtory of that church, tells us (7), that he became Biſhop of that See in 767, being the ſecond year of the reign of King Alcred, and that he died in 781, being the fourth year of King Elfwald; when he had held the See upwards of twelve years, or, as he ſays in another place, thirteen years (8). But Simeon of Durham gives us a very large account of his declaring himſelf a Saint (9), which, for its ſingularity, deſerves to be taken notice of. The body of Biſhop Alcmund was, it ſeems, depoſited by that of his predeceſſor St. Acca. But, two hundred and fifty years after he was buried, he appeared to one Dregmus, a very pious man, and deſired him to go to one Ælfred, a prieſt at Durham, and with his help to remove his body into a more honourable place. Dregmus hereupon aſked him who he was? I am, ſaid he, Alcmund Biſhop of Hexham, and my body lies next to that of St. Acca, my predeceſſor. Upon this his corpſe was taken up the next day; but ſo many people crowded to ſee it, that it was too late to depoſit it in the place deſigned for it, and therefore it was laid in the porch of St. Peter for that night, being watched by a great company of Monks and Prieſts. Towards morning, all of theſe, except one, fell faſt aſleep; whereupon he taking this opportunity, ſtept to the ſhrine, and withdrew a middle bone of one of St. Alcmund's fingers. The next day, when, after ſinging various hymns, they attempted to move the corpſe to the high altar, where it was to remain; they found, to their great amazement, that it was impoſſible to ſtir it. The prieſt, who took the finger-bone with no other intent than to place it in the church of Durham, as a relic of St. Alcmund; and not in the leaſt ſuſpecting that he was the cauſe of this wonder, beſought the people to apply themſelves to God in prayer, that he would be pleaſed to permit the Saint to declare what the reaſon was, why his body could not be moved. Accordingly, that night St. Alcmund appeared to the man whom he viſited firſt, and ſaid, with a ſtern countenance, What is it you would do? would you carry me maimed into that church where I ſerved God and St. Andrew whole; adjure you all the people to-morrow, that they reſtore what they fooliſhly took away, otherwiſe my body cannot be moved: at the ſame time he ſtretched out his hand and ſhewed the maimed finger. This being accordingly done, the prieſt delivered the bone, and the body was carried and interred behind the altar. ALCUINUS, or ALBINUS (Flaccus), a famous writer in the eighth century, was born in Yorkſhire, or (as others tell us) not far from London (a). He had his education firſt under venerable Bede, and afterwards under Egbert, Archbiſhop of York, who made him keeper of the curious library which he had founded in that city (b). Alcuinus flouriſhed about the year 780, was deacon of the church of York, and at laſt Abbot of the monaſtery of Canterbury. In 793 he went over into France, being invited thither by Charlemagne, to aſſiſt him in oppoſing the hereſy of Felix, Biſhop of Urgel [A], and the Canons of the falſe Synod of Nice (c). He was in high eſteem

[A] The hereſy of Felix, Biſhop of Urgel.] Hear what Mr. Du Pin ſays of this Hereſiarch and his doctrine. 'Towards the end of the VIIIth century, 'there aroſe in the Weſt a diſpute about the myſtery 'of the incarnation. Felix, Biſhop of Urgel, in 'Catalonia, being conſulted by Elipand, Biſhop of 'Toledo, whether Jeſus Chriſt as man, ought to be 'called the adoptive or natural Son of God, anſwered, that in that quality he ought only to be 'called his adoptive Son. He wrote in defence of 'this opinion, and endeavoured to ſpread it, not 'only in Spain, but alſo in France and Germany. 'He was oppoſed by the Biſhops, who, in a council 'held at Ratiſbon in 792, condemned that error, 'together with its author, who was ſent to Rome to 'Pope Adrian. The Pope confirmed the judgment 'of esteem with that Prince, who not only honoured him with his friendship and confidence, but became his pupil likewise, being instructed by him in rhetoric, logic, mathematics, and divinity (d). The year following he attended Charlemagne to the council of Francfort, and, upon that Prince's recommendation, was admitted a member of that council. The same Prince gave him the Abbies of Ferrara, St. Jodocus, and St. Lupus. In 796 he earnestly requested leave to retire from secular affairs; which was refused him. In 798 he drew his pen against Felix, Bishop of Urgel, and confuted his errors in seven books. In 799, being invited by Charlemagne to accompany him in his journey to Rome, he excused himself on account of his infirmities and old age. In 801, Charlemagne being returned from Italy, and newly declared Emperor, Alcuinus took the opportunity of congratulating him on his election, and pressed his suit so earnestly, that at length he obtained leave to retire from court, to the Abbey of St. Martin at Tours, which the Emperor had lately given him. Here he spent the remainder of his life in an honourable retreat, and employed himself in educating the youth in the school which he had founded in that city. The Emperor in vain endeavoured by repeated letters to recal him to court. He died at Tours, on Whitsunday, in the year 804 (e). He was a man of singular piety and learning, and the best English Divine (according to William of Malmsbury) after Bede and Aldhelme (f). France was indebted to Alcuinus for the flourishing state of learning in that kingdom [B]. He wrote a great number of books [C], most of which are extant. His style is elegant and sprightly, and his language very pure, considering the age in which he lived.

' of the synod, and obliged Felix to retract. Nevertheless some Spanish Bishops persisted in that opinion. Felix himself espoused it anew, and Elipand defended him in a letter, which was condemned by Pope Adrian, then by a synod held in Italy; and lastly, by the council of Francfort in 794, consisting of three hundred bishops. The question was debated in that council, and it was decided, that Jesus Christ, as man, ought to be called the proper, and not the adoptive Son of God. This council informed Elipand, and the other Spanish Bishops, of their decision; and Charlemagne joined his authority with that of the council, to oblige them to renounce their opinion. This affair was likewise examined at Rome, under Pope Leo III. in a council of fifty-seven Bishops, held in 799. They confirmed the judgment given by Adrian, against the error of Felix, Bishop of Urgel, and anathematized him as an heretic. The same year Charlemagne sent for Felix to Aix la Chapelle, and gave him permission to defend his opinions before the Bishops. Alcuinus replied to him, and confuted him; whereupon he gave up his opinion and embraced that of the church. He was followed by his disciples, and that question occasioned no farther controversy in the Church (1).'

Three Homilies; the firſt on the Incarnation, the ſecond on the Nativity of the bleſſed Virgin, and the third on the Feaſt of All Saints.* Theſe homilies are ſpurious, being taken out of Paulus Diaconus's Homiliarium. The third of them is the thirty-ſeventh among thoſe on the Saints, under St. Auguſtin's name (9). 25. Vita Antichriſti, ad Carolum Magnum; i. e. The Life of Antichriſt, dedicated to Charlemagne. 26. De Virtutibus & vitiis ad Comitem Widonem Liber; i. e. A Diſcourſe concerning the Virtues and Vices, addreſſed to Count Wido. 27. De Septem Artibus Liber; i. e. A Treatiſe concerning ſeven Sciences. This piece is imperfect, there remaining no more than two chapters, viz. thoſe on Grammar and Rhetoric, with a tranſition to Logic. The Grammatica was publiſhed ſeparately at Hanover in 1605. The Rhetorica & de Virtute Dialogus came out at Paris in 1599. And the Dialectica or Logic being a Dialogue between Charlemagne and Alcuinus, was publiſhed, together with the Grammar, at Ingolſtad in 1604 (10). 28. Diſputatio Regalis; i. e. The Royal Diſputation, being a dialogue between Pipin, afterwards King of Italy, and the author. 29. Scriptum de vita Sancti Martini Turonenſis; i. e. The Life of St. Martin of Tours. 30. Vita beatiſſimi Richarii preſbyteri; i. e. The Life of St. Richarius or Riguier the Prieſt. 33. De Vita S. Willebrordi Trajectenſis Epiſcopi Libri duo; i. e. The Life of St. Willebrord Biſhop of Utrecht, in two Books; one in proſe, the other in verſe. 34. Epiſtolæ 115; i. e. One Hundred and fifteen Letters. 35. Poemata & Verſus de pluribus Sanctis; i. e. Poems and Verſes on ſeveral Saints. The pieces hitherto mentioned were publiſhed altogether by Andrew du Cheſne: but ſince that edition of Alcuinus's works, other pieces have been publiſhed under the ſame author's name; as, 36. Libri quatuor Carolini de Imaginibus; i. e. Four Caroline Books concerning Images. Theſe are ſaid by Roger Hoveden (11) to have been written by Alcuinus under the name of the Emperor Charlemagne. They were written againſt the worſhip of images, a little before the council of Francfort, and publiſhed during the ſeſſion of that council under the Emperor's name; who in the preface expreſsly declares, he undertook that work out of a zeal for God and truth. Dr. Cave is of opinion, they are the genuine work of that Emperor, who might poſſibly be aſſiſted in compoſing them by Alcuinus (12). 37. Confeſſio fidei; i. e. A Confeſſion of Faith. This is a Collection taken out of the writings of St. Auguſtin, and divided into four parts. It was publiſhed under Alcuinus's name by Chifflet, at Dijon, 1654, in quarto, among ſeveral tracts of other writers. M. Daillé, in a tract of his publiſhed at Roan in 1675, has endeavoured to prove, that this Confeſſio fidei is a ſpurious piece, and falſely aſcribed to Alcuinus. F. Mabillon has written a long diſſertation (13) in defence of the genuineneſs of the piece in queſtion. However, he owns very candidly, he has not abſolutely proved his aſſertion, but only rendered it highly probable. 38. Commentarius brevis in Cantica Canticorum; i. e. A ſhort Commentary on the Canticles or Solomon's Song. London, 1638, 4*to.* This piece was publiſhed by Patricius Junius, with the commentary of Gilbert Foliot. 39. Breviarium fidei ad verſus Arianos; i. e. A Summary of Faith againſt the Arians. Sirmundus publiſhed it at Paris in 1630, without a name; but Chifflet reſtored it to Alcuinus (14). 40. Homilia de Purificatione B. Mariæ Virginis; i. e. An Homily on the Purification of the Virgin Mary; falſely aſcribed to St. Ambroſe, but reſtored to Alcuinus by M. Baluze (15). 41. Epiſtolæ duo & Sermo ad Carolum M. i. e. Two Letters and a Diſcourſe addreſſed to Charlemagne, publiſhed by M. Baluze (16). 42. Epiſtola & Præfatio ad Libros ſeptem in Felicem Orgiletanum; i. e. An Epiſtle and Preface to the ſeven Books againſt Felix, Biſhop of Urgel. It was wanting in the printed copies, and was firſt publiſhed by M. Baluze (17). 43. Epiſtolæ tres; i. e. Three Letters, brought to light by Dacherius (18). 44. Epiſtolæ XXVI. i. e. Twenty-ſix Letters, publiſhed by Mabillon (19). 45. Carmen de Cuculo; i. e. A Poem on a Cuckow, and two other poems, publiſhed by Mabillon (20). 46. Poemata duo; i. e. Two Poems, the firſt a ſhort one in heroic verſe, the other a long one in elegiac, both of them chiefly on the argument of the books of the Old and New Teſtament; publiſhed by Lambecius (21). 47. Hymnus & Epigrammata tres in S. Vedaſtum; i. e. An Hymn and three Epigrams on St. Vedaſt, publiſhed by Lambecius (22). 48. Homilia in die Natali S. Vedaſti; i. e. An Homily on the Birth-day of St. Vedaſt, publiſhed by Bollandus (23). 49. De Pontificibus & Sanctis Eccleſiæ Eboracenſis; i. e. Of the Biſhops and Saints of the Church of York. This is an heroic poem, containing near 1700 verſes. It was copied from two manuſcripts, one at Rheims in France, and the other at St. Theodoric near Rheims; and ſent by Mabillon to Dr. Gale, Dean of York, who publiſhed it under Alcuinus's name (24). But Oudin (25) is of opinion, it was not written by Alcuinus, becauſe the poetry is very barbarous, and inferior to that of his other poems. That writer aſcribes it to a Benedictine Monk, named Fridegodus, who lived about the year 960. Dr. Gale aſſures us (26) he had by him ſeveral epiſtles of Alcuinus, which were never publiſhed. Beſides the works of Alcuinus above mentioned, he wrote ſome pieces, which are loſt; namely, 50. Commentarius in Proverbia; i. e. A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs. 51. Commentarius in quatuor Epiſtolas S. Pauli, viz. ad Epheſios, ad Titum, ad Philemonem, & ad Hebræos; i. e. A Commentary on four of St. Paul's Epiſtles, viz. thoſe to the Epheſians, to Titus, to Philemon, and to the Hebrews. 52. De Orthographia liber; i. e. A Treatiſe of Orthography. 53. De muſica Liber; i. e. An Eſſay on Muſic. B.

[A number of other ſmall pieces aſcribed to Alcuinus, have appeared ſince Du Cheſne's edition, the titles of which may be met with in Du Pin's Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory (27). We ſhall ſubjoin Mr. Warton's account of Alcuinus, as it contains ſome particulars not mentioned in the preceding article, and concludes with a very judicious obſervation concerning the ſtate of learning in the eighth century.

'Alcuine, Biſhop Ecbert's Librarian at York, was 'a contemporary pupil with Aldhelm, under Theodore and Adrian at Canterbury. During the 'preſent period, there ſeems to have been a cloſe 'correſpondence and intercourſe between the French 'and Anglo-Saxons in matters of literature. Alcuine was invited from England into France, to 'ſuperintend the ſtudies of Charlemagne, whom he 'inſtructed in Logic, Rhetoric, and Aſtronomy. 'He was alſo the maſter of Rabanus Maurus, who 'became

'became afterwards the Governor and Preceptor of 'the great Abbey of Fulda in Germany, one of the 'most flouriſhing ſeminaries in Europe, founded by 'Charlemagne, and inhabited by two hundred and 'ſeventy Monks. Alcuine was likewiſe employed 'by Charlemagne to regulate the lectures and diſ-'cipline of the univerſities, which that prudent and 'magnificent potentate had newly conſtituted. He 'is ſaid to have joined to the Greek and Latin, an 'acquaintance with the Hebrew tongue, which per-'haps in ſome degree was known ſooner than we 'may ſuſpect; for at Trinity College in Cambridge 'there is a Hebrew Pſalter with a Normanno-Gallic 'interlinear verſion of great antiquity. Homilies, 'lives of ſaints, commentaries on the Bible, with 'the uſual ſyſtems of Logic, Aſtronomy, Rhetoric, 'and Grammar, compoſe the formidable catalogue 'of Alcuine's numerous writings. Yet in his books 'of the ſciences, he ſometimes ventured to break 'through the pedantic formalities of a ſyſtematical 'teacher: he has thrown one of his treatiſes in Lo-'gic, and I think, another in grammar, into a 'dialogue between the author and Charlemagne. 'He firſt adviſed Bede to write his Eccleſiaſtical 'Hiſtory of England; and was greatly inſtrumental 'in furniſhing materials for that early and authen-'tic record of our antiquities.

'In the mean time, we muſt not form too mag-'nificent ideas of theſe celebrated maſters of 'ſcience, who were thus invited into foreign coun-'tries to conduct the education of mighty monarchs, 'and to plan the rudiments of the moſt illuſtrious 'academies. Their merits are in a great meaſure 'relative. Their circle of reading was contracted, 'their ſyſtems of philoſophy jejune; and their lec-'tures rather ſerved to ſtop the growth of ignorance, 'than to produce any poſitive or important improve-'ments in knowledge. They were unable to make 'excurſions from their circumſcribed paths of ſcien-'tific inſtruction, into the ſpacious and fruitful re-'gions of liberal and manly ſtudy. Thoſe of their 'hearers, who had paſſed through the courſe of the 'ſciences with applauſe, and aſpired to higher ac-'quiſitions, were exhorted to read Caſſiodorus and 'Boethius; whoſe writings they placed at the ſum-'mit of prophane literature, and which they be-'lieved to be the great boundaries of human erudi-'tion (28).'

The account, in the preceding extract, that Alcuine firſt adviſed Bede to write his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, and was greatly inſtrumental in furniſhing materials for that work, cannot be true. Leland indeed doth ſay, that 'He exhorted Bede to 'write the Hiſtory of the Engliſh Church;' and Biſhop Tanner hath paſſed over this aſſertion without any ſtricture (29). But the fact is evidently confuted by chronology. Bede publiſhed his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory in 731; and he had been employed ſeveral years before in making collections for this great undertaking (30). He could not perhaps, conſidering the extenſiveneſs of his materials, and the difficulty at that period of ſpeedily collecting them, have formed his deſign later than in the year 720. Now Alcuine lived till the year 804; ſo that he muſt have given his advice to Bede above eighty years before his own death, which is too abſurd to be credited. There was another Alcuinus, or Albinus, Abbot of St. Auſtin's Church in Canterbury, who was ſtrictly contemporary with Bede, and who died three years before him. This Alcuinus it was who urged Bede to draw up his hiſtory, and who aſſiſted him by his communications, as is evident from a letter written to him by that venerable author himſelf (31). Neither is it at all probable that our Alcuine was educated under Bede; before he was put under the care of Archbiſhop Egbert. Dr. Henry juſtly remarks, that 'as he ſurvived Bede 'about ſeventy years, it is hardly poſſible that he 'could have received any part of his education 'under him, as ſome writers of literary hiſtory have 'affirmed; and it is worthy of obſervation, adds 'the Doctor, that he never calls that great man his 'maſter, though he ſpeaks of him with the higheſt 'veneration (32).' 'Alcuine, ſays Sir John Haw-'kins, was well verſed in the liberal ſciences; par-'ticularly in muſic, as appears by a tract of his on 'the uſe of the Pſalms, and by the preface to Caſ-'ſiodorus de ſeptem Diſciplinis, firſt printed in 'Garetius's edition of that author, and which is ex-'preſsly ſaid by Du Pin, Fabricius, and others, to 'have been written by Alcuine (33).'] K.

ALDHELM or ADELM (St.) Biſhop of Shireburn in the time of the Saxon heptarchy, is generally ſaid to have been the ſon of Kenred or Kenter, brother of Ina King of the Weſt Saxons (a) [A]. He was born at Caer-Bladon, now called Malmſbury [B] in Wiltſhire, and had his education partly abroad in France and Italy, and partly at home under Maildulphus an Iriſh Scot, who had built a little monaſtery where the town of Malmſbury now ſtands. After Maildulphus's death, Aldhelm ſucceeding him did, by the help of Eleutherius, Biſhop of Wincheſter, to whom the ground of right belonged, build there a very ſtately monaſtery [C], of which himſelf was the firſt

[A] He is generally ſaid to have been the ſon of Kenred or Kenter, brother of Ina King of the Weſt Saxons.] Let us hear William of Malmſbury concerning the family of St. Aldhelm. 'Ferunt quidam (ſays that 'hiſtorian) incertum unde id aſſumpſerint, fuiſſe 'nepotem Inæ regis Weſt-Saxonum ex fratre Ken-'tero. Nobis pro vero arrogare non libuit, quod 'videtur magis opinioni quadrare volaticæ, quam ve-'ritati hiſtoricæ. Siquidem ex chronicis conſtat quod 'Ina nullum fratrem præter Inigildum habuerit, qui 'paucis ante ipſum annis deceſſit. Poſſem & illud 'objicere, quod Aldhelmus non minor ſeptuagena-'rio decedens, Inam plus xviii annis ſuperſtitem reli-'querit, idemque rex poſtea tot annos viridi adhuc 'ævo Romam iverit. Convenitne ut patruus juvenis 'nepotem ſeptuagenarium haberet, qui de fratre mi-'noris ætatis natus fuiſſet?——Qui legit manualem 'librum legis Elfredi, reperiet Kenterum beati Ald-'helmi patrem non fuiſſe regis Inæ germanum, ſed 'arctiſſima neceſſitudine conſanguineum (1).——Some 'report, upon what authority I know not, that he was 'nephew of Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, being the 'ſon of his brother Kenter. I would not aſſume for 'true, what looks more like a flying rumour, than a 'matter of fact. For it is evident from hiſtory, that 'Ina had no other brother than Inigild, who died a 'few years before him. I might alſo object, that Ald-'helm, being not leſs than ſeventy years old when he 'died, left Ina, who ſurvived him eighteen years, and 'that the ſame King, after ſo many years, went to 'Rome in the vigour of his age. Is it conſiſtent, that 'the uncle in the flower of his youth ſhould have a 'nephew ſeventy years of age, and the ſon of his 'younger brother? Whoever reads King Elfred's ma-'nual, will find that Kenter the father of St. Ald-'helm was not the brother of King Ina, but only very 'nearly related to him by blood.' We ſhall leave the matter to reſt upon the authority and reaſoning of William of Malmſbury.

[B] Caer-Bladon, now called Malmſbury.] This town was built by Dunwallo Mulmutius King of the Britons, and by him called Caer-Bladon. After it had been deſtroyed by the wars, there aroſe out of its ruins a caſtle called by the Saxons Ingelborne; which was known by no other name for a long time, till Maildulphus an Iriſh Scot, a great ſcholar, and eminent for his devotion and ſtrictneſs of life, being delighted with the pleaſantneſs of the wood under the hill, upon which the caſtle ſtood, lived there a hermit. Afterwards inſtituting a ſchool, and with his ſcholars devoting himſelf to a monaſtic life, he built a little monaſtery. From this Maildulphus the town of Ingelborne began to be called Maildulfſburg, and by Bede Maildulfi Urbs Maildulf's town: which name in length of time was changed into that of Malmſbury (2).

(2) Camden, ubi ſupra, col. 103.

[C] Aldhelm built a very ſtately monaſtery.] King Ethelſtan enriched this monaſtery with ample donations, and choſe it for the place of his burial. After the Monks had been in poſſeſſion of it for the ſpace first Abbot. Upon the death of Hedda, Biſhop of the Weſt Saxons, that kingdom being divided into two dioceſes, namely, Wincheſter and Shireburn, King Ina promoted Aldhelm to the latter, comprehending Dorſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Devonſhire, and Cornwall (b). It is ſaid, he was conſecrated at Rome by Pope Sergius I. and that he had the courage to reprove the Holy Father for having a baſtard [D]. This Prelate, by the direction of a dioceſan Synod, wrote a book againſt the miſtake of the Britons concerning the celebration of Eaſter; in which he charged the Britiſh Church with many ſingularities, which kept them from the Saxon communion. This book, Bede tells us (c), reconciled many of the Britons, who were ſubject to the Weſt Saxons, to the Catholic uſage in that point. He likewiſe wrote a book, partly in proſe, and partly in hexameter verſe, in praiſe of virginity (d), dedicated to Ethelburga, Abbeſs of Barking (e), and publiſhed among Bede's Opuſcula (f). Aldhelm wrote ſeveral other pieces, mentioned by Bale and William of Malmſbury [E]. Bede gives him the character of an univerſal ſcholar and an elegant writer (g). The monkiſh authors, eſpecially William of Malmſbury (h), have aſcribed ſeveral miracles to St. Aldhelm: particularly they tell us, that a Carpenter having cut a beam for his church too ſhort, the Saint by his prayers ſtretched it out to the full proportion; and that he hung his garments upon the rays of the ſun, which miraculouſly ſupported them, to the admiration of all the beholders (i). He was the firſt Engliſhman that ever wrote in Latin, and that introduced Latin poetry into England [F]. He preferred muſic to all other worldly delights, and played ſkilfully on all ſorts of inſtruments (k). The Popiſh writers pretend, he of 270 years, they were turned out in the year 956 by the command of King Edwy, and ſecular prieſts put in their room; but they were reſtored by King Edgar. This religious houſe was famous for its wealth, and for having produced ſeveral learned men, eſpecially William of Malmſbury, to whoſe learned induſtry the civil and eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England are greatly indebted. King John gave the Monks leave to raze the caſtle for the enlargement of the abbey, which exceeded all the reſt in Wiltſhire both for riches and honour, its Abbot ſitting in Parliament as a Peer of the Realm. At the diſſolution of the monaſteries in the reign of Henry VIII. the abbey of Malmſbury was purchaſed for a large ſum of money by one Stump, a rich clothier, for the uſe of the inhabitants, who converted it into a pariſh church (3).

' Will lead the Muſes to my native land.'

His hiſtorian tells us, he made an excellent uſe of his ſkill in Engliſh poetry; which was to poliſh the barbarous manners of the people, and to bring them to a better ſenſe of religion. ' Commemorat Elfredus ' carmen triviale, quod adhuc vulgo cantitatur, Al- ' delmum feciſſe; adjiciens cauſam, qua probet ra- ' tionabiliter tantum virum his quæ videntur frivola ' inſtitiſſe: populum eo tempore ſemi-barbarum, pa- ' rum divinis ſermonibus attentum, ſtatim cantatis ' miſſis domos curſitare ſolitum; ideoque ſanctum ' virum ſuper pontem quæ rura & urbem continuat, ' abeuntibus ſe oppoſuiſſe obicem, quaſi artem can- ' tandi profeſſum. Eo plus quam ſemel facto, plebis ' favorem & concurſum emeritum. Hoc commento, ' ſenſim inter ludicra verbis ſcripturarum inſertis, ' cives ad ſanitatem reduxiſſe; qui ſi ſevere & cum ' excommunicatione agendum putaſſet, profecto pro- ' feciſſet nihil (15). —— Elfred informs us, that Aldhelm made the ballad, which is ſtill commonly ſung, adding a probable reaſon why ſo great a man buſied himſelf about ſuch trifles; namely, that the people were half barbarians, little attentive to religious diſcourſes, and accuſtomed to run home immediately after ſinging of maſs; wherefore the holy man, placing himſelf upon a bridge that joined the town and country, uſed often to ſtop them, profeſſing himſelf ſkilled in the art of ſinging. By this means he gained the favour of the populace, who flocked about him; and inſenſibly mixing words of ſcripture with ludicrous matters, he brought the towns-men to a right way of thinking; whereas, if he had thought proper to uſe ſeverity, or have proceeded to excommunication, he would have met with no ſucceſs.' B.

[All the accounts of Aldhelm repreſent him as having been a very conſiderable man for the time in which he lived. It is evident, ſays Dr. Henry, from his works, which are ſtill extant, that he had read the moſt celebrated authors of Greece and Rome, and that he was no contemptible critic in the languages in which theſe authors wrote (16). In the different ſeminaries in which he was educated, he acquired ſuch a ſtock of knowledge, and became ſo eminent for his literature, not only in England but in foreign countries, that he was reſorted to by many perſons from Scotland, Ireland, and France. Artville, a Prince of Scotland, who applied himſelf to letters, ſent his works to Aldhelm to be examined by him, and intreated him to give them their laſt poliſh, by rubbing off their Scotch ruſt (17). Beſides the inſtructions which Aldhelm received from Maidulphus, in France and Italy, he had part of his education, and as it would ſeem, the moſt conſiderable part, at Canterbury, under Theodore, Archbiſhop of that city; and Adrian, the moſt learned profeſſor of the ſciences who had ever been in England (18). The ardour with which he proſecuted his ſtudies at that place, is well repreſented in a letter written by him to Hedda Biſhop of Wincheſter; which letter alſo gives a good account of the different branches of knowledge in the cultivation of which he was then engaged. Theſe were, the Roman Juriſprudence, the Rules of Verſes and the muſical Modulation of Words and Syllables, the Doctrine of the Seven Diviſions of Poetry, Arithmetic, Aſtronomy, and Aſtrology (19). It is obſervable, that Aldhelm ſpeaks in very pompous terms of Arithmetic, as a moſt high and difficult attainment; though it is now ſo generally taught, as not to be reckoned a part of a learned education. In oppoſition to what has commonly been underſtood, that Aldhelm was the firſt of the Saxons who taught his countrymen the art of Latin verſification, Mr. Warton informs us, that Conringius, a very intelligent antiquarian in this ſort of literature, mentions an anonymous Latin poet, who wrote the life of Charlemagne in verſe, and adds, that he was the firſt of the Saxons that attempted to write Latin verſe. But it ought to have been recollected, that Aldhelm died above thirty years before Charlemagne was born. ' Aldhelm's Latin compoſitions, whe- ' ther in verſe or proſe, as novelties, were deemed ' extraordinary performances, and excited the at- ' tention and admiration of ſcholars in other coun- ' tries. A learned cotemporary, who lived in a re- ' mote province of a Frankiſh territory, in an epiſtle ' to Aldhelm, has this remarkable expreſſion: " VESTRÆ LATINITATIS PANEGYRICUS RUMOR " has reached us even at this diſtance, &c." Mr. Warton, to whom we are indebted for the preceding information, juſtly takes notice, that Aldhelm's Treatiſe on Metre is a proof that the ornaments of compoſition had begun to be ſtudied; and that when Malmeſbury, in ſpeaking of Aldhelm (20), characteriſes the Greeks by their acuteneſs, he took his idea of them from their ſcientifical literature, which was then only known: for after the revival of the Greek philoſophy by the Saracens, Ariſtotle and Euclid were familiar in Europe, long before Homer and Pindar (21). In an ancient anonymous chronicle, found by Leland at Barnewell, not far from Cambridge, it is ſaid of Aldhelm, that ' he was ' an excellent harper, a moſt eloquent Saxon and ' Latin Poet, a moſt expert chantor or ſinger, a ' DOCTOR EGREGIUS, and admirably verſed in the ' Scriptures and the liberal Sciences (22).' ' Sanctus ' Aldhelmus, Inæ, Regis Weſtſaxonum, propin- ' quus, citharœdus erat optimus, Saxonicus atque ' Latinus poeta facundiſſimus, cantor peritiſſimus, ' doctor egregius, ſermone nitidus, Scripturarum ' tam liberalium quam Eccleſiaſticarum eruditione ' mirandus (23).' To excel in ſinging, and in playing on the harp, are often mentioned as accompliſhments of the ancient Saxon eccleſiaſtics (24). Other writers, beſides Bale, have celebrated Aldhelm's love of muſic, and his ſkill in the practice of it. Bale's expreſſion is, ' Artem Muſices omni- ' bus mundi deliciis prætulit, inſtrumentorum ' omnium peritiam perappoſitè callens (25).' Accordingly, Sir John Hawkins has not forgotten to give Aldhelm an honourable place in his Hiſtory of Muſic (26).] K.

ALDHUN, the firſt Biſhop of Durham, ſucceeded Elfſig in the biſhopric of Lindisfarne or Holy Iſland (a), in the year 990, being the twelfth of the reign of King Ethelred. He was of a noble family, but, according to Simeon of Durham, more ennobled by his virtues and religious deportment [A]. He ſat about ſix years in the ſee of Lindisfarne, during which time that iſland was greatly expoſed to the incurſions of the Daniſh pirates. This made him think of removing from thence; though Simeon of Durham says, he was put upon it by an admonition from Heaven (b). However, taking with him the body of St. Cuthbert, which had been buried there about 113 years, and accompanied by all the Monks and the rest of the people, he went away from Holy Island; and, after wandering about some time, at last he settled with his followers at Dunelm, now called Durham; where he gave rise both to the city and cathedral church [B]. He had a daughter named Ecgfrid, whom he gave in marriage to Uchtred, son of Waltheof Earl of Northumberland, and with her six towns belonging to the episcopal see (c); upon condition that he should never divorce her. But that young Lord afterwards repudiating her [C], Aldhun received back the church lands he had given with her (d). This Prelate educated King Ethelred's two sons, Alfred and Edward; and, when their father was driven from his throne by Swane King of Denmark, he conducted them, together with Queen Emma, into Normandy, to Duke Richard the Queen's brother (e). This was in the year 1017, a little before Bishop Aldhun's death. For the next year, the English having received a terrible overthrow in a battle with the Scots, the good Bishop was so affected with the news, that he died a few days after [D], having enjoyed the prelacy twenty-nine years (f). Radulphus de Diceto (g) calls this Bishop Alfhunus, and Bishop Godwin (h) Aldwinus.

[B] He gave rise both to the city and cathedral church of Durham.] Before Aldhun's arrival, the town of Dunelm, or Durham, consisted only of a few scattered huts or cottages. The spot of ground was covered with a very thick wood, which the Bishop, with the assistance of the people that followed him, made a shift to cut down, and clear away. After he had assigned the people their respective habitations by lot, he began to build a church of stone; which he finished in three years time, and dedicated it to St. Cuthbert, placing in it the body of that Saint. From that time the episcopal see, which had been placed at Lindisfarne by bishop Aidan, remained fixed at Durham; and the cathedral church was soon endowed with considerable benefactions by King Ethelred and other great men (2). Durham, in Latin Dunelmum, (Bishop Godwin tells us) was so called from Dun, which in the Saxon language signified a mountain, and Holm which signified a river-island; because the river Were surrounds on all sides the mountain on which the city stands (3).

[C] That young lord repudiated Aldhun's daughter.] Malcolm King of Scotland, having invaded the northern parts of England, laid siege to Durham. Waltheof Earl of Northumberland, being an old man and not able to make head against the enemy, shut himself up in the royal city of Bebbanburg. But his son Uchtred, at that time married to Ecfrid, putting himself at the head of the Northumbrians and Yorkshire-men, fell upon the Scots, and gave them a total overthrow, Malcolm himself narrowly escaping by flight. King Ethelred hearing of this victory sent for Uchtred; and as a reward of his valour and conduct, gave him the earldom of Northumberland, though his father was not yet dead, and annexed to it that of York. The young Earl was scarcely invested with these new honours, when he repudiated his wife (4). Simeon of Durham assigns no reason for this divorce: but it is very probable, Uchtred now thought himself too great a man to be son-in-law to a Bishop, and that he aspired after a nobler alliance: for having first married the daughter of a rich citizen named Styr, and thereby (probably) acquired a considerable increase of wealth, he soon got rid of her by divorce, and obtained in marriage Elfgiva the daughter of King Ethelred (5). As for Ecfrid, she was married to a Thane in Warwickshire named Kilvert; but being divorced from this second husband, she returned to Durham, and there shut herself up in a convent during the rest of her life (6). Our author places the siege of Durham, mentioned in this remark, in the year 969; whereas Aldhun did not remove from Lindisfarne till about 996; which two dates are utterly irreconcileable. It is not easy to say whence this chronological mistake arose, whether from the negligence of the author, the copyist, or the printer. It is certain that Aldhun's daughter was not married to Uchtred till after her father's settlement at Durham, nor was she divorced from him till after the above-mentioned siege.

ALDRED, Archbishop of York in the reigns of Edward the Confessor, Harold, and William the Conqueror, was a Monk of Winchester, afterwards Abbot of Tavistock, and from thence promoted to the see of Worcester, in the year 1046 (a). Four years after his consecration he took a journey to Jerusalem, through Hungary; a thing which no English Bishop had attempted before him (b). Being returned into England, he was sent by King Edward on an embassy to the Emperor Henry II. [A] He stayed a whole year in Germany, and learned many things there relating to Church discipline, [A] He was sent by King Edward on an embassy to the Emperor Henry II.] The design of this embassy was, to desire the Emperor to send letters and Ambassadors to Solomon King of Hungary, to prevail with him to send home Prince Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, whom King Edward had designed for his heir (1). For King Edmund having left two sons, Edmund and Edward, King Canute, for fear they should disturb him in the possession of the throne, sent them into Denmark, under pretence of travelling, but with a secret intention of having them murdered. The person, with whom he had entrusted the young Princes, knowing his design, instead of carrying them into Denmark, conducted them to the King of Sweden, whom he acquainted with the King of England's design. The Swedish King received them with great kindness: but, being cautious of disobliging Canute, he sent the young Princes to the court of Hungary, where Solomon willingly took upon himself the care of their education. That prince married one of his daughters to Edmund, and gave his sister-in-law, the Emperor's daughter, to Edward. Edmund died soon after his marriage; but Edward had several children (2). The Emperor complied with the intention of Aldred's embassy, and accordingly Edward, with his wife Agatha, his son Edgar, and his daughters Margaret and Christina, arrived in England in 1057. But Prince Edward dying soon after his arrival disappointed the Confessor's intention (3).

the practice of which he afterwards introduced into England (c). He had the adminiſtration of the ſee of Wilton three years, during the abſence of Biſhop Herman [B]; and of that of Hereford four years, after the death of Leofgar, in 1056 (d). In the year 1061, Kinſius Archbiſhop of York being dead, Aldred was advanced to that See, and, with the King's conſent, held the Biſhoprick of Worceſter in commendam [C], as four of his predeceſſors had done (e). Soon after, he went to Rome for his pall, accompanied by Toſti Earl of Northumberland, Giſo Biſhop of Wells, and Walter Biſhop of Hereford. But Pope Nicolas II. being informed of his ſimoniacal practices, not only refuſed to confirm him in the Archbiſhoprick, but deprived him likewiſe of all he enjoyed before. Thus diſappointed, he left Rome with his three companions: but as they were travelling over the Alps, they were ſet upon by a band of robbers, who plundered them of every thing but their clothes; ſo that they were obliged to return to Rome, to get a farther ſupply for their journey. Then Earl Toſti interpoſing, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats [D], prevailed upon the Pope to confirm Aldred, and give him the pall; which he did, on condition that Prelate ſhould reſign the See of Worceſter (f). Being quietly ſeated in his chair at York, he began to do ſome good things: for he built a common hall for the Canons to dine in; he finiſhed the hall at Beverly, begun by his predeceſſor, but left imperfect; he re-built the new cathedral church at Glouceſter, which had been deſtroyed by the Danes; laſtly, he obliged the clergy of his province to wear a decent and uniform habit, whereas before they were not diſtinguiſhable from the laity. The See of York having been greatly reduced by the perſecution of the Barbarians, Aldred, with the King's conſent, retained twelve towns or manors belonging to the See of Worceſter for his own uſe (g) [E]. And now this Prelate began to diſcover himſelf to be a mere worldling and an odious time-ſerver. For no ſooner was his patron King Edward dead, but he aſſiſted Harold, ſon of Earl Godwin, to obtain the crown. Afterwards, when William the Norman had ſucceeded in his invaſion, and Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury had refuſed to crown him, Aldred fell in with the ſtream, and performed the ceremony; only exacting an oath from the Norman, that he would love and protect the Engliſh equally with his own natural ſubjects (h). But when afterwards he found that the Conqueror little regarded this oath, he thundered out an excommunication againſt him (i). Soon after, the Daniſh invaſion coming on, and the citizens of York, with the Northumbrians and others, declaring for Prince Edgar Atheling's title, Aldred ſickened at the news, and died, September 10, 1069, juſt before the Danes landed; and was buried in the cathedral church of York (k). This Archbiſhop was the laſt Engliſhman promoted to the ſee of York; his ſucceſſors being of Norman race (l). I ſhall give the reader a taſte of this Prelate's ſpiritual pride and prieſtly

[B] He had the adminiſtration of the ſee of Wilton three years, during the abſence of Biſhop Herman.] This Herman was a Fleming, and had been chaplain to King Edward, who advanced him to the Biſhopric of Wilton. The revenues of that Biſhopric being but ſmall, Herman petitioned the King for leave to fix the epiſcopal ſee in the convent of Malmſbury: but Edward, by the advice of his nobles, refuſing his conſent, Herman in diſguſt threw up his Biſhopric, and retiring into France lived three years in a monaſtery: in the meantime Aldred had the care of his ſee. But Herman diſreliſhing the monaſtic life, and hearing that the Biſhop of Shireburn was dead, which ſee the King had formerly promiſed him he would annex to that of Wilton, he returned into England; and the King keeping to his promiſe, Herman held the united ſees of Wilton and Shireburn till the ninth year of William the Conqueror, when the epiſcopal ſeat was fixed at Sarum or Saliſbury (4).

There is ſome obſcurity in this paſſage: but the ſenſe of it ſeems to be; that Aldred, abuſing the eaſy diſpoſition of the King, found means to retain the ſee of Worceſter, rather by the force of money properly applied, than by virtue of the precedent he alledged.

[D] ——— By threats.] The earl was of a fiery diſpoſition, and upon this occaſion played the bully for his friend. He went to his Holineſs, and railed plentifully at him. He told him, his excommunication would ſtrike no terror into diſtant nations, if it could not frighten a band of robbers in the very neighbourhood of Rome. He demanded reſtitution for the loſs he had ſuſtained; otherwiſe he might depend upon it, when the King of England came to hear of this uſage, he would withdraw the tribute due to the holy chair. The thunder of theſe threats (ſays Malmſbury) frightened the Pope into compliance. Toſtinus quippe gravibus verborum contumeliis Apoſtolicum aggreſſus, in ſententiam ſibi placitam reduxit. Parum metuendam à longinquis gentibus ejus excommunicationem, quam propinqui latrunculi deriderent. In ſupplices furere, in rebelles parum valere. Petri merito Nicolao ſubtraheret: ſe non defuturum rerum veritati exaggerandæ. Hoc minarum fulmine Romani territi Papam flexerunt, ut Aldredo Archiepiſcopatum redderet & pallium (6). Stubbs ſays nothing of Earl Toſti's threats, but imputes the Pope's change of mind to the motions of pity, and the interceſſion of the whole court. Itaque Papa Nicholaus ſuper eum pietate commotus, & totius curiæ interceſſione pro eo exoratus, Archiepiſcopatum ei dato pallio confirmavit (7). [E] He retained twelve towns or manors belonging to the ſee of Worceſter for his own uſe.] This is what his panegyriſt Thomas Stubbs tells us: but if John Bromton is to be believed, his conduct in this affair merits the higheſt cenſure. For, according to that hiſtorian (9), he detained thoſe poſſeſſions by violence and injuſtice; and, the better to cover his rapine, he nominated Wolſtan, Prior of Worceſter, to that ſee, agreeably to the Pope's Bull, which gave him the power of appointing his ſucceſſor therein. This Wolſtan being a plain eaſy man, and owing his advancement to Aldred, did not attempt, during the life of the Archbiſhop, to recover the twelve manors unjuſtly transferred to the church of York: but no ſooner was Aldred dead, than Wolſtan defended the rights of the church of Worceſter, and recovered the poſſeſſions which had been diſmembered from it.

arrogance, in two ſtories; the one from his panegyriſt Stubbs [F], who relates it as a ſingular inſtance of his conſtancy and reſolution; the other from William of Malmſbury [G].

[F] Two ſtories; the one from Stubbs.] As the Archbiſhop's officers were, one day, bringing a great quantity of proviſions to his palace at York, they were met upon the road by the high-ſheriff of the county, who ſtopped them, and aſked them to whom they belonged. The men anſwered, they were ſervants of the Archbiſhop, and were carrying thoſe proviſions for his uſe. The high-ſheriff, deſpiſing the Prelate and his ſervants, ordered the officers who attended him to ſeize upon the carriages and proviſions, and carry them to the King's granary in the caſtle of York. The Archbiſhop hearing of this, ſent ſeveral of his clergy and citizens to demand reſtitution of the high-ſheriff, and to threaten him with excommunication if he refuſed it. But that officer diſregarding his threats, the Archbiſhop poſted up to London, and went, attended by a numerous train of Biſhops and other eccleſiaſtics, to Weſtminſter, where the King then was in council. The monarch no ſooner caſt his eyes upon the Prelate, than he roſe up to ſalute him as uſual; which the latter put by with his croſier, and taking no notice of the King's ſtanding, nor of his crowd of courtiers, he addreſſed himſelf to him in theſe words: 'Hear me, William; when thou wert an alien, and 'God had permitted thee, for our ſins, and through 'much blood, to reign over us, I anointed thee King, 'and placed the crown upon thy head with a bleſ-'ſing: but now, becauſe thou deſerveſt it not, I will 'change that bleſſing into a curſe againſt thee, as a 'perſecutor and oppreſſor of God and his miniſters, 'and a breaker and contemner of thoſe oaths and 'promiſes, which thou madeſt unto me before the 'altar of St. Peter.' The King aſtoniſhed at theſe menaces threw himſelf at the Archbiſhop's feet, and humbly begged to know by what offence he had deſerved ſo ſevere a ſentence. The noblemen in the preſence were irritated to a high degree at the Prelate's arrogance, in ſuffering the King to lie at his feet without raiſing him. But the Archbiſhop turning to them ſaid, 'Let him alone, gentlemen, let him 'lie; he does not fall down at my feet, but at the 'feet of St. Peter.' After ſome time he thought fit to raiſe the King, and told him his errand. The Conqueror was too much frightened to deny his requeſt. He gave him rich gifts, and diſpatched an expreſs to the high-ſheriff for the reſtitution of his goods, which were punctually reſtored, to the value of a ſack-ſtring, uſque ad ligamen ſacci (10).

[G] ——— The other from William of Malmſbury.] Urſus, Earl of Worceſter, had built a caſtle to the prejudice of a neighbouring monaſtery: for the ditch of the ſaid caſtle took off part of the church-yard belonging to the Monks. Aldred had often by letters admoniſhed the Earl to do juſtice to the Monks. But finding intreaties would not do, he went to Urſus in perſon, and demanded whether it was by his appointment that this encroachment was made. The Earl not denying the fact, the Prelate cried out;

Higheſt thou Urſe (11);
Have thou God's curſe.

This curſe, ſays my author, ſeemed to take effect: for Urſus died ſoon after, and Roger his ſon enjoyed his father's honour but a very ſhort time; for, having ſlain one of the King's officers, he was forced to fly his country (12). B.

ALDRICH or ALDRIDGE (Robert), called in Latin Aldriſius, was Biſhop of Carliſle in the reigns of King Henry VIII. King Edward VI. and Queen Mary (a). This Prelate was born at Burnham in Buckinghamſhire, educated in grammar learning at Eaton ſchool, and elected Scholar of King's college in Cambridge in the year 1507; where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and was about that time ſtyled by Eraſmus, in one of his epiſtles, blandæ eloquentiæ juvenis (b). Afterwards he became Proctor of the univerſity, School-Maſter of Eaton, Fellow of that college, and at length Provoſt. In 1529 he retired to Oxford, where he was incorporated Bachelor of Divinity, March 15, 1529 (c); and the next year, performing his exerciſes for the degree of Doctor in that faculty, he was licenſed to proceed, in April 1530 (d). About the ſame time he was made Archdeacon of Colcheſter. In 1534, May 7, he was inſtalled Canon of Windſor; and the ſame year he was appointed Regiſter of the moſt noble order of the Garter (e), in the room of Dr. Richard Sydenore, Archdeacon of Totneſs (f). July 18, 1537, he was conſecrated Biſhop of Carliſle, in the room of Dr. John Kyte deceaſed: from which time to that of his death, though there were many changes both in Church and State, yet (Mr. Wood tells us) he ran through all, and conſequently complied with all (g) [A]. Biſhop Aldrich wrote ſeveral pieces, particularly theſe following: 1. Epiſtola ad Gulielmum Hormannum; i. e. A Letter to William Horman. 2. Epigrammata varia; i. e. Various Epigrams. 3. Several Reſolutions concerning the Sacraments. 4. Anſwers to certain Queries concerning the Abuſes of the Maſs. He wrote alſo Reſolutions of ſome queſtions relating to Biſhops and Prieſts, and other matters tending to the Reformation of the Church begun by King Henry VIII. ALDRICH (Henry) an eminent divine, and polite ſcholar in the ſeventeenth, and beginning of the eighteenth century, was the ſon of Henry Aldrich of Weſtminſter, Gent. He was born there in the year 1647 (a), and educated in the college-ſchool in that city, under the famous R. Buſby. In act-term 1662, he was admitted into Chriſt-church college, Oxon, of which he was, ſoon after, elected ſtudent (b). He took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 31, 1666 (c), and that of Maſter, April 3, 1669 (d). Entering ſoon after into Holy Orders, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge in every branch of divine and human learning, and became a famous tutor in his college. On the fifteenth of February 1681, he was inſtalled Canon of Chriſt-church, in the ſecond ſtall (e); and the ſecond of March following, accumulated the degrees of Bachelor, and Doctor in Divinity (f). He bore his part in the controverſy with the Papiſts during the reign of King James II. [A], upon which, and other accounts, his merit became ſo conſpicuous, that when, at the Revolution, J. Maſſey the Popiſh Dean of Chriſt-church fled beyond ſea, his deanery was conferred upon Dr. Aldrich; who was therein inſtalled the ſeventeenth of June 1689 (g). In this eminent ſtation he behaved in the moſt worthy and exemplary manner; and promoted learning, religion, and virtue, with great application and zeal, in that noble college over which he happily preſided. A great deal of its preſent luſtre and beauty it owes to his ſkilful and ingenious hand; for it was he who deſigned the beautiful ſquare, called Peckwater-Quadrangle, which is eſteemed a regular and compleat piece of architecture (h). Like his excellent predeceſſor Biſhop Fell (i), he publiſhed yearly ſome piece of an ancient Greek author [B], for a new year's-gift to the ſtudents of his houſe. He wrote likewiſe a ſyſtem of logic, and ſome other things [C]. The reviſing of the manuſcript of Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, was committed to his care, jointly with Biſhop Sprat: but it doth not appear that they made any additions, or con-

It was an anſwer to O. Walker's Two Diſcourſes concerning the Adoration of our bleſſed Saviour in the Euchariſt. And he writing Animadverſions upon the Reply to two Diſcourſes, &c. Dr. Aldrich publiſhed 2. A Defence of the Oxford Reply to two Diſcourſes lately printed at Oxford, &c. From the Exceptions made to it in the ſecond Appendix to a Compendious Diſcourſe of the Euchariſt. Oxford, 1688, 4*to*. This ſecond Appendix was written by Obadiah Walker, and The Compendious Diſcourſe, &c by Abraham Woodhead (1). Biſhop Burnet ranks our author among thoſe eminent Engliſh clergymen, who 'examined all the points of Popery with a ſolidity 'of judgment, a clearneſs of arguing, a depth of 'learning, and a vivacity of writing, far beyond 'any thing that had before that time appeared in 'our language (2).'

The learned author compoſed it for the uſe of his noble pupil, Frederic-Chriſtian Howard, ſon to Charles Earl of Carliſle.—He alſo printed Elements of Geometry, in Latin, in a large thin octavo; probably for the uſe of ſome of his friends or pupils: for it was never publiſhed. — And likewiſe, had a hand in Gregory's Greek Teſtament, printed at Oxford in 1703, fol. — Some of his notes are printed in the new edition of Joſephus, by Havercamp.

ſiderable alterations in it, as has been aſſerted by a late writer, Mr. Oldmixon (k). Beſides his preferments above mentioned, Dr. Aldrich was alſo Rector of Wem in Shropſhire (l). He was choſen Prolocutor of the Convocation in 1702. This worthy perſon died at Chriſt-church, on the fourteenth of December 1710. As to his character: he was a moſt univerſal ſcholar, and had a taſte for all ſorts of learning, eſpecially architecture. Having never been married, he appropriated his income to works of hoſpitality and beneficence, and in encouraging learning to the utmoſt of his power, of which he was a moſt munificent patron, as well as one of the greateſt men in England, if conſidered as a Chriſtian or a gentleman. He had always the intereſt of his college at heart, whereof he was an excellent governor [D]. And, as he was remarkable for modeſty and humility, concealing his name to thoſe ſeveral learned tracts he publiſhed, ſo at his death he appointed to be buried without any memorial in the cathedral; which his thrifty nephew complied with, depoſiting him on the South ſide of Biſhop Fell's grave, December 22, eight days after his deceaſe; which happened in the ſixty-third, or ſixty-fourth year of his age (m).

[Dr. Aldrich was one of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners appointed by King William the Third, on the 13th of September 1689, to prepare matters for introducing an alteration in ſome parts of the church ſervice, and a comprehenſion of the diſſenters. But the Doctor, in conjunction with Dr. Peter Mew, Biſhop of Wincheſter; Dr. Thomas Sprat, Biſhop of Rocheſter; and Dr. William Jane, Regius Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Oxford, either did not appear at the meetings of the Committee, or ſoon withdrew from them. They excepted to the manner of preparing matters by a ſpecial commiſſion, as limiting the convocation, and impoſing upon it; and they were againſt all alterations whatſoever (4). In this laſt reſpect, many wiſe and good men have entertained a different opinion.

(4) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 168. 173. 177. 181.

Dr. Aldrich's ſkill in architecture was diſplayed in other inſtances beſides that of the Peckwater-quadrangle. The pariſh church of All Saints in Oxford, which he is known to have deſigned, is eſteemed a finiſhed ſpecimen of his knowledge and taſte in building. He is ſuppoſed likewiſe to have given the plan, and adjuſted the deſign, of the Chapel of Trinity College, erected by Dr. Ralph Bathurſt (5).

(5) Warton's Life of Ralph Bathurſt, p. 68. 71.

Sir John Hawkins has favoured the Public with ſeveral particulars relative to Dr. Aldrich's ſkill in muſic; and on account of the Doctor's eminence in this reſpect, Sir John hath given his Life, with his head prefixed. His abilities as a muſician rank him, we are told, among the greateſt maſters of the ſcience. He compoſed many ſervices for the church, which are well known; as are alſo his anthems, nearly to the number of twenty. He adapted, with great ſkill and judgment, Engliſh words to many of the motets of Paleſtrina, Cariſſimi, Victoria, and other Italian compoſers for the church, ſome of which are frequently ſung in our cathedrals as anthems. By the happy talent which Dr. Aldrich poſſeſſed, of naturalizing the compoſitions of the old Italian maſters, and accommodating them to an Engliſh ear, he increaſed the ſtores of our own church. Though the Doctor chiefly applied himſelf to the cultivation of ſacred muſic; yet, being a man of humour, he could divert himſelf by producing pieces of a lighter kind. There are two catches of his; the one 'Hark 'the bonny Chriſt-church Bells,' the other entitled, 'a Smoking Catch,' to be ſung by four men ſmoking their pipes, which is not more difficult to ſing than diverting to hear. His love of ſmoking was, it ſeems, ſo exceſſive as to be an entertaining topic of diſcourſe in the univerſity. Such was Dr. Aldrich's regard for the advancement of muſic, and the honour of its profeſſors, that he had formed a deſign of writing a Hiſtory of the Science; and the materials from which he propoſed to compile it are yet extant in the library of his own college. It appears from theſe materials, that he had marked down every thing which he had met with concerning muſic and muſicians; but that he had wrought no part of them into any kind of form (6).

(6) Hawkins's Hiſtory of Muſic, Vol. i. Prelim. Diſc. p. 22. Vol. iii. p. 183. Vol. iv. p. 92. Vol. v. p. 10, 11.

Dr. Aldrich is of ſome note as a Latin poet. In the Muſæ Anglicanæ, we find two elegant copies of verſes by him; one on the acceſſion of King William the Third, and the other on the death of the Duke of Gloceſter (7). Sir John Hawkins hath preſerved a humorous tranſlation of the well-known Engliſh ballad:

(7) Muſæ Anglicanæ, Vol. ii. p. 26. Vol. iii. p. 9.

'A ſoldier and a ſailor,
'A tinker and a taylor,' &c. (8)

(8) Hawkins Hiſt. of Muſic.

The following epigram, entitled 'Cauſæ Bibendi,' is likewiſe aſcribed to Dr. Aldrich.

'Si bene quid memini, Cauſæ ſunt quinque bibendi,
'Hoſpitis Adventus, præſens Sitis, atque futura,
'Aut Vini Bonitas; aut quælibet altera Cauſa.'

This epigram hath been thus tranſlated:

'If on my Theme I rightly think,
'There are five reaſons why men drink.
'Good wine, a friend, becauſe I'm dry,
'Or leaſt I ſhould be by and by;
'Or any other reaſon why.'

The tranſlation is not equal to the original. It is evident, from the verſes cited and referred to, that Dr. Aldrich was of a very chearful and pleaſant turn of mind. Indeed, he is always ſpoken of as having been a man of wit; and as one who, to his great talents and virtues, joined thoſe amiable qualities, which rendered him the object of general affection, as well as of general eſteem and reſpect.]

ALDULPH or ARDULPH or EARDULPH, King of Northumberland, in the time of the Saxon heptarchy, ſucceeded King Oſwald, and was inaugurated in St. Peter's church at York, the twenty-ſixth of May 796 (a). King Ethelred, the immediate predeceſſor of King Oſwald, the better to ſecure himſelf on the throne, had baniſhed ſeveral of the principal Northumbrian Lords, and among the reſt Aldulph, whom he ſuſpected of carrying on deſigns againſt his perſon and crown. But the malecontent party prevailing, and King Ethelred being aſſaſſinated, Oſwald was elected in his room. This Prince reigned but twenty-ſeven days, being driven out by the oppoſite faction, who placed Aldulph on the throne. Two years after his acceſſion, a conſpiracy being formed againſt him by the murderers of the late King Ethelred, at the head head of whom was one Wada; King Aldulph engaged them in a place called by the Anglo-Saxons Billingahoth near Walalege; and many being ſlain on both ſides, Wada and his forces were put to flight, and the King obtained a glorious victory (b). In the year 801, this Prince led an army againſt Kenwolf King of the Mercians, who had afforded ſhelter to his enemies: but, through the interpoſition of the Biſhops and Nobles on both ſides, the two Monarchs were reconciled, and made a league of the moſt firm and laſting friendſhip (c) [A]. Aldulph had the addreſs to maintain himſelf upon the throne by the help of the moſt powerful faction of the two, which at that time divided the kingdom of Northumberland. Nevertheleſs the other made ſeveral attempts from time to time to advance itſelf. Alcred, who had ſwayed the ſceptre of that kingdom, had left a ſon named Alcmund, who was at the head of this laſt party. This Prince beginning to grow formidable, Aldulph, who judged it neceſſary to ſacrifice him to his own ſafety, cauſed him to be privately murdered. His death being looked upon by the oppoſite party as a martyrdom, Alcmund was placed in the number of the ſaints; and this furniſhed the King's enemies with a pretence to take up arms, and to put themſelves under the command of a Lord named Aldrick. This rebel being overcome and ſlain in battle, the malecontents continued ſome time without making any freſh attempt. But the face of affairs ſoon changed: the party oppoſed to the King became ſo powerful, that this Prince was forced to ſave himſelf by flight, and take refuge in the court of Charlemagne, where the Engliſh were always well received. Nor did Aldulph ever recover his crown: for, two years after, the kingdom of Northumberland ſubmitted to the power of Ecbert King of Weſſex; which put an end to the Heptarchy (d).

I find an ALDULPH Biſhop of Lichfield in the reign of Offa King of the Mercians; whom I mention for no other reaſon, but becauſe in his time the See of Litchfield was erected into an Archbiſhopric [B].

Lambert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, made uſe of all his intereſt to prevent the diſmembering his juriſdiction; and, the conteſt being brought before the court of Rome, the Archbiſhop urged the grant of Gregory the Great to the ſee of Canterbury. However, King Offa prevailed in his application, and obtained of Pope Adrian I. that all the Biſhops within the kingdom of Mercia ſhould be ſuffragans to the Biſhop of Litchfield as their Metropolitan (2). Which may be thus rendered into Engliſh:

Honour, which us'd to dignify a name,
Is dignify'd by Alexander's fame.
In bounty rich, in uſing riches wiſe,
His treaſure only in beſtowing lies.
His charity prevents the ſuppliant's moan;
Nor ought, but what he gives, he calls his own.

I call theſe verſes flattering; becauſe, as an hiſtorian, Huntingdon ſeems to have drawn a more faithful picture of this Prelate, acknowledging his virtues, and not diſſembling his faults: for thus he deſcribed him after his death: 'Nutritus in ſummis deliciis à Rogero avunculo ſuo Saliſberienſi epiſcopo, majores inde animos contraxit quam opportunum eſſet ſuis. rebuilt it, and ſecured it againſt the like accident for the future by a ſtone roof (b). This prelate increaſed the number of Prebends in his church, and augmented its revenues with ſeveral manors and eſtates. In imitation of the Barons and ſome of the Biſhops, particularly his uncle the Biſhop of Saliſbury, he built three caſtles; one at Banbury, another at Sleaford, and a third at Newark. He likewiſe founded two monaſteries; one at Haverholm, for regular Canons and Nuns together, the other at Tame for White-Fryars (c). When King Stephen reſolved to take the caſtles from the Barons [B], that of Newark held out againſt the King's officers, but was forced at laſt to ſurrender. As for the Biſhop himſelf, after ſeven months impriſonment, and being kept to very ſlender diet, he with difficulty obtained his liberty (d). From that time he applied himſelf to the governing and ornamenting his church, which he rendered the moſt ſtately and flouriſhing of any in England. He went twice to Rome, in the years 1142 and 1144. The firſt time, he came back in quality of the Pope's Legate, for the calling a Synod, in which he publiſhed ſeveral wholeſome and neceſſary canons. In Auguſt 1147, he took a third journey to the Pope, who was then in France; where he fell ſick through the exceſſive heat of the weather, and returning with great difficulty to England, he died in the twenty fourth year of his prelacy (e). About a year before his death, he received a letter from the famous St. Bernard [C], who ſeems to have been pretty well acquainted with his temper and character.

[B] King Stephen reſolved to take the caſtles from the Barons.] As a comment on theſe words, we ſhall tranſcribe a ſhort account of this matter from one of our hiſtorians: 'Stephen, having now gotten a little reſpite from his enemies, began to conſult with himſelf how he might eaſe himſelf of ſuch troubleſome conteſts with his ſubjects; and becauſe he now found, that the caſtles he had permitted his nobility to build, were the greateſt impediments of his peace at home, and the readieſt harbour of rebels, he reſolved to forbid that any ſhould be built hereafter, and demoliſhed ſome of the moſt dangerous lately erected; and to this end called a great council at Oxford. Here ſome of his lords, who much envied the magnificent and ſtately caſtles erected by the clergy (whoſe buildings both in number and ſtrength much exceeded thoſe of the nobility) but eſpecially the Biſhop of Saliſbury, who had built ſeveral great caſtles at Saliſbury, the Devizes, Sherburn, Malmſbury, and (3) Newark; whiſpered into the King's ears, who was very jealous and ſuſpicious of ſuch deſigns, That theſe forteſſes were intended for the reception of the Empreſs Maud and her party: and by their ſurmiſes ſo wrought upon the King's fears, that he ſent for the Biſhop of Saliſbury to Oxford. The Biſhop, foreſeeing the danger impending, would have excuſed himſelf from his attendance upon the King, by reaſon of his great age: but that plea would not be allowed, he muſt go. The Biſhop therefore taking with him his nephews Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln, and Nigell Biſhop of Ely, with a retinue of well-armed men, went to Oxford; where at his firſt coming, his ſervants going to take them up lodgings, happened into a quarrel with the ſervants of the Earl of Britain, and killed one of them in the fray, the nephew of the Earl being dangerouſly wounded. This being brought to the King's ears, he calls for the Biſhop, and demands ſatisfaction for the breach of peace made by his ſervants in his court, which was this, that he ſhould immediately yield up the keys of all his caſtles to him, as pledges of his fidelity. The Biſhop refuſed to do it; whereupon he commanded the Biſhops of Saliſbury and Lincoln to be ſeized upon, and kept under a guard. The Biſhop of Ely had made his eſcape, and got into the caſtle of the Devizes. The King preſently took into his hands by force the caſtles of Saliſbury, Sherburn, and Malmſbury; and after three days aſſault, that of the Devizes was ſurrendered to him, whither he ſent the two Biſhops priſoners, and ſeized the Biſhop of Saliſbury's treaſure, which amounted to forty thouſand marks (4).'

(3) Here ſeems to be a miſtake: for it appears by the preſent article, that the caſtle of Newark was built by the Bp. of Lincoln.

[C] He received a letter from the famous St. Bernard.] Among other things, St. Bernard, in his letter, cautions him not to be dazzled with the luſtre of ſecular grandeur, nor to look upon any worldly advantage as permanent; nor value his fortune more than himſelf: to guard againſt the flattery of proſperity, for fear of a turn of misfortune which will laſt longer: not to be charmed with the tranſient ſatisfactions of life; for that ſcene will quickly be ſhut up, and make way for another both laſting and uncomfortable. He adviſes him not to deceive himſelf with any diſtant proſpect of death: for ſuch deluſive hopes lead directly to danger and ſurpriſe, and are the likelieſt way to hurry a man into the other world without preparation (5).

(5) Bernard. Epiſt. 64.

ALEXANDER (WILLIAM) an eminent nobleman, ſtateſman, and poet of Scotland, in the reigns of King James, and King Charles I. His ſirname is ſaid, by the hiſtorians of his own country, to have been taken from the proper name of his predeceſſor Alexander Macdonald; who holding, under the family of Argyle, the lands of Menſtrie, this became the place of his reſidence. Andrew Alexander, in the reign of James V. is obſerved to be the firſt who is mentioned in the records of Scotland. He, by Catherine Graham his wife, had Alexander his ſon and heir; who obtained a grant from Archibald, Maſter of Argyle, of the ſaid lands of Menſtrie, to himſelf and Elizabeth Douglas his wife, in life-rent, and to Andrew Alexander their ſon, in fee, which was ratified under the great ſeal in 1529; whoſe heir and ſucceſſor was this William Alexander (a). He was born in the year 1580, as we compute from an inſcription quoted towards the end of this narrative. He ſoon appeared ſuch a promiſing youth, that the beams of thoſe bright endowments of nature, which ſhone out, and gilded his dawning years, made his friends deſirous of improving them to the height of excellence, by a liberal education; and ſo much was he diſtinguiſhed for both, that they recommended him, in the quality of a tutor, or rather companion, to the Earl of Argyle in his travels. After ſome time ſpent in foreign parts, he returned to Scotland, and betook himſelf a while, it ſeems, to a rural retirement. There he finiſhed his poetical complaint, of the unſucceſsful addreſs he had made to his firſt miſtreſs; which he intitled Aurora. For he had, before he went abroad, and three luſtres were expired, as he expreſſes it himſelf (b), or was fifteen years of age, ſeen ſome rare beauty, who had ſmitten him ſo deeply, that neither the diverſion of travel, nor the ſight of ſo many fair foreigners, as he calls the river Loir to witneſs he had there met with, could remove his affection (*). Wherefore now, after his return, this courtſhip was revived, and he wrote above an hundred ſonnets, &c. upon it; till matrimony diſpoſing of her to another perſon, he alſo had recourſe to the ſame, as a remedy to wean his paſſion for the former object. For he tells us, that the lady ſo unrelenting to him, had matched her morning to one in the evening of his age (c). That himſelf ſhould now change the myrtle-tree for the laurel, and the bird of Venus for that of Juno (d). That he was at laſt bound to one, whereby he ſhould eſcape bondage from all others. That the torch of Hymen had burnt out the darts of Cupid; and that he had thus ſpent the ſpring of his age, which now his ſummer muſt redeem (e). Now, therefore, it was that he removed to the court of King James VI. and lived there in the capacity only of a private gentleman (f), but with the character of a learned and accompliſhed one. He ſtill found occaſion to exerciſe his poetical talents, from the recommendation they made of him even to the King, who might be the readier to encourage thoſe ſtudies in another, which he had ſo publickly profeſſed himſelf. Farther notice of, and perhaps acquaintance with him, might be promoted by the ſituation of his abode, being ſo commodious for thoſe ſports, wherewith his Majeſty was wont, in his journies of pleaſure, there to divert himſelf. But the poetry to which Mr. Alexander now turned his pen, was that ſolid and ſublime ſpecies of it, which would hold up the cleareſt mirror to Princes and Potentates; which would beſt animate the lifeleſs precepts of philoſophy, and render its graveſt leſſons moſt agreeably affecting; for the better government, not only of a people in general, but the paſſions and appetites of the Governors themſelves; by the moſt ſovereign precedents, and harmonious precautions, of the uncertainty of life, and the inſufficiency of its felicities, the vanity of grandeur, the corruption of power, and burden of riches. To this purpoſe he formed himſelf ſomewhat after the plan of the ancient Greek and Roman tragedies, at leaſt in their choruſes between the acts; not ſo much to have his dramatic compoſitions perſonated in mimickry upon the narrow ſtage of a play-houſe, as to be really and more extenſively acted in human life, by thoſe who bore the parts of the greateſt actors in the common theatre of mankind. And to this effect, we find a tragedy of Mr. Alexander's publiſhed, upon the ſtory of Darius, at Edinburgh, in 1603. The choice of his meaſure in this (as in his other plays) is alternate rhyme, which I leave the critics to defend (g) or to blame (h); and as to his ſtyle, if it is not always pure, our author has modeſtly pleaded his country, and allowed in his preface, the preference to our dialect. It was the year after publiſhed again at London, with ſome verſes before it in praiſe of the author, by J. Murray, and Walter Quin, who has here alſo an anagram upon the name of William Alexander, which has been reprinted elſewhere (i). But that preface is not here revived; and there are two poems of our author's at the end of this edition, which were never afterwards printed again; the one, congratulating his Majeſty upon his entry into England; the other, written ſhortly after, upon the inundation of Doven, a water near our author's houſe, upon which his Majeſty was uſed to recreate himſelf with the paſtime of hawking. As it contains a fine compliment, we ſhall here ſubjoin the ſenſe of it [A], and proceed to obſerve, that the ſame year in which this play was reprinted in England, was publiſhed here his Aurora alſo, in quarto, 1604; which, as it was the fruit of, he made an oblation to Beauty, by dedicating it to Agnes Douglas, Counteſs of Argyle. But theſe poems were never after reprinted, though bound up with the ſucceeding augmentation of his plays. In the ſame year laſt mentioned, his Paræneſis to Prince Henry, was here alſo publiſhed: therefore, how truly its publication was deferred till after the death of that Prince, lies upon Mr. Langbain to reconcile (k). In this poem, among other noble inſtructions, he ſhews, how the happineſs of a Prince depends on his chooſing for a council, ſuch as can throw off private grudges, regard public concerns, and will not, to betray their ſeats, become Penſioners. He farther ſhews, the uſe of hiſtories, and how the lives of great men are to be read with greateſt profit: lays open the characters of vicious Kings; thoſe abandoned to avarice, to flattery, and, the moſt contemptible of all, to effeminacy and luſt: diſplays the glories of martial accompliſhments; and hopes, if the Prince ſhould ever make an expedition pedition to Spain, that he might attend him, and be his Homer to ſing his acts there. Whether the author was yet arrived in England, does not appear, by any of theſe writings; and whether he publiſhed any more, ſeparately, till the year 1607, we have not yet directly learnt. But in this year came out his three other plays, which with that beforementioned, are intitled, The Monarchick Tragedies; Cræſus, Darius, The Alexandræan, Julius Cæſar; newly enlarged (*). By William Alexander, Gentleman of the Prince's privy chamber: and with them are bound the poems aforeſaid. Theſe plays are dedicated to King James, in a poem of thirteen ſtanzas, and have a copy of verſes by Sir Robert Ayton before them, expreſſing, that the King himſelf had graced our author's labours with his glorious name; ſo that, patron, ſubject, ſtyle and all, make him the Monarchick Tragedian of our iſland. And though indeed thoſe plays, for the reaſons before given, muſt, to all royal readers of them, adminiſter a kind of terrible pleaſure; yet his Majeſty is ſaid, not only to have been delighted with our author's converſation, but his works (l); and to have called him his Philoſophical Poet: So that no ſtream appears to have more viſibly wafted him to thoſe honours wherewith he was a few years afterwards graced, than what thus flowed through his own hand, from the fountain of the Muſes. We might be endleſs in giving inſtances of his fine ſenſe out of theſe plays; but, to thoſe who have not read him, a few may be here acceptable, and enough to ſhew his preference of Merit to Dignity; his grief that it is not made a guide in the choice of Favourites; his thoughts on the wretched condition of Miniſters, with that of Kings themſelves; and laſtly, who is to be accounted the greateſt Conqueror; as may be ſeen below [B]: and we ſhall refer to other topicks, gathered out of him, in a collection from our old poets, lately publiſhed (m). Beſides the authors beforementioned, others have celebrated theſe performances; as John Davis of Hereford, who, in a book of Epigrams, publiſhed about the year 1611, has one to Mr. William Alexander of Menſtrie, in praiſe of theſe tragedies (n), wherein, though a ſtranger to his perſon, he thinks himſelf obliged in juſtice to applaud his writings; as having made himſelf thereby a Sovereign even over Monarchs; and thinks, Alexander the Great had not gained more glory with his ſword, than this Alexander has acquired by his pen. Michael Drayton calls him my Alexander, whoſe name he would ever have known to ſtand by his; yet attempts but to ſhow the friendſhip that was between them, not the merit of his numbers, which were brave and lofty, ſo like his mind was his muſe (o). We are informed, that not long after, was firſt publiſhed, the ſupplement he wrote to complete the third part of Sir Philip Sidney's celebrated Romance; and that it is to be found in the true fourth, as well as the ſubſequent editions thereof, with the initial letters of his name (p); though Anthony Wood only mentions it in the eighth, as perhaps having only that at hand, when he made this remark (q). This was an exerciſe for his Muſe, ſtill in a kind of poetry, though not in verſe. In the month of July 1613, the ſame year that ſupplement was printed, we find Mr. Alexander mentioned to have been ſworn one of the Gentlemen Uſhers of the Preſence to Prince Charles (†). But now his Muſe laboured with a more ſolemn birth than any of her tragick productions, and brought forth a fruit unuſual to the ſoil of courts, which gave him the title of a Divine Poet; being a ſacred poem, as large as all his others, called Dooms-Day; or, the Great Day of the Lord's Judgment. It was printed at Edinburgh in quarto,

FAVOURITES.

O, more than happy ten times, were that King!
Who were unhappy but a little ſpace,
So that it did not utter ruin bring,
But made him prove, a profitable thing!
Who, of his train, did beſt deſerve his grace;
Then cou'd, and wou'd, of thoſe, the beſt embrace:
Such vultures fled, as follow but for prey,
That faithful ſervants might poſſeſs their place:
All gallant minds, it muſt with anguiſh ſting,
While wanting means their virtue to diſplay.
This is the grief, which burſts a gen'rous heart;

1614, and afterwards in the folio edition of his works; alſo again by itſelf, in a quarto edition at London (r). It is divided into twelve hours, as the author calls them, or books; and the firſt book was, a few years ſince, reprinted in octavo, with intention to give us the remainder of his poetical writings in a correct edition. The editor, A. Johnſtoun, tells us, that having communicated the author's whole works to Mr. Addiſon, for his peruſal; he ſaid, in approbation of them, That he had read them over with the greateſt ſatisfaction; and gave it as his judgment, 'That the beauties in 'our ancient Engliſh poets are too ſlightly paſſed over by the modern writers; who, 'out of a peculiar ſingularity, had rather take pains to find fault, than endeavour to 'excel (s).' In the year above mentioned, the King, looking on him as a wiſe man, made him Maſter of the Requeſts, and conferred upon him the honour of knighthood (t). And now begins the other part of his character; the man of buſineſs, title, and great undertaking; for little more of the Poet appears, except that two years after, came forth a new edition of his plays, in a pocket volume (u). Thus, as it is hard to reſide long in courts, without imbibing ſome of the tincture which prevails there, our Philoſophical, our Divine Poet, ſeems, upon theſe promotions, to have turned Politician! and inſtead of enlarging his flowery acquiſitions on the banks of Parnaſſus, grew ambitious of ſpacious dominions in Terra Firma; having projected the ſettlement of a large colony, and making great plantations at Nova Scotia in America, at his own expence, and that of ſuch adventurers as ſhould be engaged in the undertaking. His Majeſty made him a grant of that country by his royal deed, on the twenty-firſt of September, 1621 (x), and did intend to erect an order of Baronets, for encouraging and ſupporting ſo grand a work: but, to the jealouſies which began to diſturb the two or three laſt years of his reign, the ſuſpenſion thereof is aſcribed, till a more favourable conjuncture of affairs ſhould offer; which that King did not live to ſee. But his ſon, King Charles I. on his coming to the Crown, was very forward to countenance and proſecute the ſame; which, as it was ſchemed or diſplayed, eſpecially in the pamphlet which Sir William himſelf publiſhed, to encourage adventurers, promiſed mighty advantages to the nation. This pamphlet he now ſet forth, is intitled, An Encouragement to Colonies; quarto, London, 1625, and it was publiſhed again with an additional title, or another on the ſame ſubject, five years after (y). The King was ſo won by theſe repreſentations, that he made Sir William Alexander Lieutenant of New Scotland, and founded in the firſt year of his reign the order of Knights Baronet in Scotland, whoſe aid was appropriated for the ſaid plantation and ſettlement, upon the conſideration of each having a liberal portion of land allotted him there. The number of theſe Baronets were not to exceed one hundred and fifty; and they were endowed with ample privileges, pre-eminence, &c. as that, the title ſhould be heritable, and they take place before all Knights, called Equites Aurati; all leſſer Barons, commonly called Lairds; and before all other gentlemen, except Sir William Alexander, his Majeſty's Lieutenant of Nova Scotia; who (with his heirs, their wives and children) is not only excepted, in each of their letters patents, granted to the Knights his companions; but likewiſe the charter granted to himſelf by the King, in the year aforeſaid, did bear expreſsly this exception and proviſion. It was farther provided, that they ſhould have place in all his Majeſty's and his ſucceſſors armies, near and about the royal ſtandard, for the defence thereof; with other honourable diſtinctions of title and precedency, to them, their wives and heirs. But none of them were to be created Baronets, either of Scotland, or Nova Scotia, till he had firſt fulfilled the conditions deſigned by his Majeſty, for the good and increaſe of that plantation; and till he had confirmed the ſame to the King, by his Majeſty's Lieutenant there. Theſe patents were ratified in parliament, and regiſtered in the books of Lyon King of Arms, and the Heralds: but after Sir William ſold Nova Scotia to the French, they were drawn up ſhorter, and granted in general terms, with all the privileges, &c. of former Baronets; and it is now become an honourable title in Scotland, conferred at the King's pleaſure, without limitation of numbers. For a fuller view of the firſt form of theſe patents, with the armorial enſigns granted to the order, and the badge thereof, which they wore about their necks in an orange-coloured ribbon; as alſo of the arms, ſupporters, and motto, of Sir W. Alexander himſelf, we refer to the volumes containing the ſame (z). He had now farther given him, a peculiar privilege of coining ſmall copper money; a grant which was inveighed againſt, even at the time, with great bitterneſs (a); and indeed the whole enterprize, at leaſt as to Sir William's aims and ends, has had but an ill-favoured repreſentation made of it, by ſome of his own countrymen, and eſpecially in a work, otherwiſe deſigned to honour both them and him [C]. But ſuch like reflections are the uſual attendants upon great attempts, when they are not attended with ſucceſs. The

The King, however, continued his encouragements to Sir William; and being fully satisfied of his abilities and fidelity, was pleased, in the year 1626, to make him Secretary of State for Scotland (b), in the place of the Earl of Haddingtoun; and afterwards, in September 1630, a Peer of that kingdom, by the title of Viscount Stirline (c); and in this quality, he had the compliments paid him of his countryman Dr. Arthur Johnston, the King's physician, a noted Latin poet, in an epigram, turning much upon the sense of that before mentioned; and also in a panegyrical epistle, too long to be here recited (d). In less than three years after this, the King advanced him to the honour of Earl of Stirline, by his letters patent bearing date the fourteenth of June 1633, at the solemnity of his Majesty's coronation, in the palace of Holyrood house. His Lordship discharged that office of Secretary of State, with universal reputation, near fifteen years, even to the time of his death; which happened on the twelfth of February 1640 (e); having three years before permitted a new edition of his poetical works, or the greatest part of them, to be published: that is to say, 1. The Four Monarchick Tragedies. 2. Doomsday; before which there are some verses by William Drummond; as in Drummond's book of Poems, there are also others to, and by our author (f). 3. The Parænesis, to Prince Henry. 4, and lastly, Jonathan; an Heroick Poem intended, the first book: which was now, I think, first published. These three poems are written in the Ottavo Rima of Tasso; or, as his friend Drayton describes it, a stanza of eight lines; six interwoven, and a couplet in base (g). The author's style and versification are much polished in this edition, especially of the plays; and the plans, with the subject matter, improved in some of them. The whole is fronted with a new title (h), and the dedication aforesaid, to King James, prefixed; which if Langbain had observed more than he did the date of the book, he had not said it was addressed to King Charles (i). Before one copy of this edition, a good effigies of the author has been found, though missing in many. It was engraved by W. Marshall; and is one of his best performances. It represents his Lordship in a closebodied coat; a full ruff about his neck, and the badge of his new-created order hanging at his breast. Livelineſs and gravity are well tempered in his countenance: his hair is short, and well curled; and his beard tapering gradually

'greater pity; for, by all appearance, had he been 'contented with that mediocrity of fortune he was 'born to, and not aspired to those grandeurs of the 'court, which could not without pride be prosecuted, 'nor maintained without covetousness, he might 'have made a far better account of himself. It did 'not satisfy his ambition to have a laurel from the 'Muses, and be esteemed a King among Poets, but 'he must be King of some new-found-land; and 'like another Alexander indeed, searching after new 'worlds, have the sovereignty of Nova Scotia! He 'was born a Poet, and aimed to be a King; there-'fore would he have his royal title from King James, 'who was born a King, and aimed to be a Poet. 'Had he stopped there, it had been well; but the 'flame of his honour must have some oil wherewith 'to nourish it: like another King Arthur, he must 'have his knights, though nothing limited to so 'small a number; for how many soever, who could 'have looked out but for one day, like gentle-'men, and given him but one hundred and fifty 'pounds sterling (without any need of a key 'for opening the gate to enter through the 'temple of virtue, which, in former times, was the 'only way to honour), they had a scale from him, 'whereby to ascend unto the platforms of virtue; 'which they, treading under feet, did slight the or-'dinary passages; and, to take the more sudden pos-'session of the temple of honour, went upon obscure 'by-paths of their own, towards some secret angi-'ports and dark postern-doors, which were so nar-'row, that few of them could get in, until they had 'left all their gallantry behind them: Yet, such be-'ing their resolution, that in they would, and be 'worshipful upon any terms; they misregarded all 'formerly-used steps of promotion, accounting them 'but unnecessary; and most rudely rushing in unto 'the very sanctuary, they immediately hung out the 'orange colours, to testify their conquest of the ho-'nour of Knight Baronet. Their king nevertheless, 'not to stain his royal dignity, or to seem to merit 'the imputation of selling honour to his subjects, 'did, for their money, give them land, and that in 'so ample a measure, that every one of his Knight Ba-'ronets had, for his hundred and fifty pounds sterling, 'heritably disponed unto him, six thousand good and 'sufficient acres of Nova Scotia ground; which, be-'ing but at the rate of six-pence an acre, could not 'be thought very dear; considering, how prettily, in 'the respective parchments of disposition, they were 'bounded and designed; fruitful corn-lands, watered 'with pleasant rivers, running along most excellent 'and spacious meadows; nor did there want abun-'dance of oaken groves, in the midst of very fertile 'plains (for if they wanted any thing, it was the 'scrivener or writer's fault; for he gave orders, as 'soon as he received the three thousand Scots marks, 'that there should be no defect of quantity, or 'quality, in measure, or goodness of land) and here 'and there most delicious gardens and orchards; with 'whatever else, could, in matter of delightful ground, 'best content their fancies; as if they had made 'purchase among them of the Elysian-fields, or Ma-'hummed's paradise. After this manner, my Lord 'Stirling, for a while was very noble; and, accord-'ing to the rate of sterling money, was as twelve 'other Lords, in the matter of that frankness of dis-'position, which not permitting him to dodge it up-'on inches and ells, better and worse, made him not 'stand to give to each of his champions, territories 'of the best, and the most; and although there 'should have happened a thousand acres more to be 'put in the charter, or writing of disposition, than 'was agreed upon at first, he cared not; half a piece 'to the clerk was able to make him dispense with 'that? But at last, when he had enrolled some two 'or three hundred knights; who, for their hundred 'and fifty pieces each, had purchased amongst them 'several millions of Neocaledonian acres, confirmed 'to them and theirs for ever, under the great seal; 'the affixing whereof, was to cost each of them but 'thirty pieces more; finding that the society was 'not like to become any more numerous, and that 'the ancient gentry of Scotland esteemed of such a 'whimsical dignity as of a disparagement, rather 'than addition to their former honour; he be-'thought himself of a course more profitable for him-'self, and the future establishment of his own state; 'in prosecuting whereof, without the advice of his 'knights (who represented both his houses of par-'liament, clergy and all), like an absolute king in-'deed, disponed heritably to the French for a mat-'ter of five or six thousand pounds English money, 'both the dominion and propriety of the whole con-'tinent of that kingdom of Nova Scotia; leaving 'the new Baronets to search for land amongst the 'Selenites in the Moon, or turn Knights of the 'Sun; so dearly have they bought their Orange 'Ribband, which (all circumstances considered) is, 'and will be more honourable to them, or their 'posterity, than it is, or hath been profitable to 'either.'

to a point, according to the faſhion of the times. The oval frame is encompaſſed with two olive branches; and the inſcription in it is, Vera Effigies Gulielmi Comitis de Sterlin. Ætatis ſuæ 57. So that he was threeſcore years of age at the time of his death, three years after the ſaid publication of his plays and this print, as is above mentioned. We have before referred to a criticiſm made on theſe plays; how judiciouſly, an ordinary critick may perceive [D]. He left by his wife Janet, the daughter and heir of Sir W. Erſkine, 1. William Lord Alexander, his eldeſt ſon; who dying his Majeſty's Reſident in Nova Scotia, during the life-time of his father, his ſon William ſucceeded his grandfather in the earldom, but died about a month after him. 2. Henry Alexander, Eſq; afterwards Earl of Stirline. This is the ſon, who, according to two authorities here followed (k), married a daughter of Sir Peter Vanlore, Alderman of London. 3. Sir Anthony; but this is the ſon, who, according to the order of deſcent, married, if we adhere to another, not the daughter, but the grand-daughter of that Vanlore, and not Vanlove, as his name in the ſaid account is erroneouſly ſpelt; which account is tranſcribed below [E]. 4. John: and two daughters; the Lady Margaret, and Lady Mary; both married, and the latter had iſſue.

[D] A criticiſm made on theſe plays; how judiciouſly, &c.] As it is ſufficiently cenſured in Mr. Addiſon's judgment of them before mentioned, we ſhall only point out a few miſtakes of this critic, ſaid to be Mr. Charles Gildon, who publiſhed a ſort of epitome and continuation of Langbain, before cited. One of his miſtakes is, the intention of our author; who never deſigned to creep after any model of the antients, as to unities of action, or other rules of the drama. He calculated them not for the amuſement of ſpectators, or to be theatrically acted, ſo much as for readers of the higheſt rank; who, by the wiſeſt counſels and cautions that could be drawn from the greateſt examples, of the ill effects of miſgovernment, and confident reliance upon human grandeur, might be taught to amend their own practices, to moderate their own paſſions and their power over all in ſubjection to them: and if they have but this end with ſuch readers; to term them hiſtorical dialogues, or any thing elſe, can be no diſcredit to them. He owns my Lord is a very good hiſtorian; and his Lordſhip has enough in his own writings to prove himſelf a better poet than many whom this critic has more extolled. We ſhall mention only another of his miſtakes; and that is an egregious one: for having told us, my Lord ſeems often to have a peculiar fancy to punning; he cannot give two inſtances of it, without owning he has wronged my Lord in the reader's judgment; becauſe it was the vice of the age, and theſe punning fits come not often upon him (9). Such a critic is he! But, to return his own words, enough of theſe ridiculous quotations.

(9) The Lives and Characters of our Engliſh dramatic Poets, &c. 8*vo.* without date, but printed about the year 1698, or rather the year after, p. 3.

[E] Which account is tranſcribed below.] In a letter written to the Lord Deputy of Ireland, afterwards Earl of Strafford, by G. Garrard, afterwards maſter of the Charterhouſe, and dated December 16, 1637, are theſe words: 'A grandchild of Vanlove's, 'rich Vanlove, was to be married to a ſon of Sir 'Thomas Read's; he who lay ſome years in the 'Fleet, and ſpent but eighteen-pence a week: he 'lives now at Brocket-Hall near Hatfield. Read hath 'eſtated upon this ſecond ſon of his, 1500*l.* a year, 'and the match was intended with Mrs. Vanlove, 'who had a portion of 4000*l.* and 400*l.* a year, 'after the death of her father, young Peter. Mon-'day the 11th of this month, they were to be mar-'ried. The day before, in the afternoon, ſhe ſends 'to ſpeak with one Mr. Alexander, a third ſon of 'the Earl of Sterling, Secretary of Scotland here; 'he comes, finds her at cards, Mr. Read ſitting by 'her; ſhe whiſpers him in the ear, aſking him if he 'had a coach (he was of her acquaintance before); 'he ſaid, yes: ſhe deſired Mr. Read to play her 'game, and went to her chamber. Mr. Alexander 'going along with her. Being there, ſhe told him, 'that to ſatisfy her friends, ſhe had given way to 'marry the gentleman he ſaw, but her affection was 'more to him; if his was ſo to her, ſhe would in-'ſtantly go away with him in his coach, and be mar-'ried. So he carried her to Greenwich, where they 'were married by ſix that evening (10).' O.

ALEYN (CHARLES) an elegant hiſtorical Poet, in the reign of King Charles I.; whoſe works, though written above an hundred years ſince, do ſtill, as they did, when a certain author wrote of them (a), live in fame and reputation [A]. He received his education in Sidney-college Cambridge; and afterwards ſettling in London, was entertained in the quality of an uſher, by Thomas Farnaby, the famous Grammarian and Commentator, at his great ſchool in Goldſmith's Rents, near Redcroſs-ſtreet, in the pariſh of St. Giles's Cripplegate (b). In the former part of King Charles the Firſt's reign, he exerciſed his genius upon a very heroical and renowned ſubject; the two moſt glorious victories obtained by the Engliſh in France, under the auſpicious banners of King Edward III, and his martial ſon, the Black Prince; which, at the inſtance of ſome noble favourers, he publiſhed in two poems, anno 1631 [B]. After he left Mr. Farnaby's ſchool in Cripplegate, he was recommended into the family of Edward Sherburne, Eſq; Clerk of

[A] Do ſtill live in fame and reputation.] For we have lately had ſeveral of his ſelect thoughts revived, in a good collection drawn out, by way of commonplace, from many ingenious poets who flouriſhed in the two laſt centuries (1). By which revival it appears, as well as from many other parts of his poems themſelves, not extracted into the ſaid work, that the author really is, according to the general character which has been given of him, very pithy and ſententious (2).

(1) See the Britiſh Muſe, &c. in three volumes, 12*mo.* 1738, by Thomas Hayward, Gent.
(2) W. Winſtanley, ubi ſupra.

[B] He publiſhed in two poems, anno 1631.] But finding encouragement to make many improvements and enlargements thereof, he publiſhed the ſecond edition of thoſe poems, by the title of The Battailes of Creſcey and Poictiers, under the fortunes and valour of King Edward the third of that name, and his ſonne Edward, Prince of Wales, named the Black. By Charles Aleyn. Printed by Thomas Harper, &c. 8*vo.* 1633. Both poems are written in ſtanzas of ſix lines; four alternate, with a diſtich in baſe, and comprized in an hundred and twenty-five pages. They are dedicated by the author, To the honourable and truly generous the Lord Colerane; to whoſe munificence the public ſeems obliged for this edition, by that expreſſion of the author's to him, wherein he ſays, This piece 'ſtands an humble tabernacle, 'ſacred to honour; and ſhall in this be advantaged, 'that it muſt be entered by the temple of your vir-'tue.' There are five copies of verſes prefixed, in praiſe of him and his work; by Thomas May, John Hall, John Lewis, Gilb. W. and Henry Blount. The firſt is written in Latin, and ſhews how much of his glory King Edward owes to Charles Aleyn. The ſecond commends his juſtice and truth; and tells him, his art ſhall teach ſucceeding ages how to write. The third wiſhes his hopes may not live, of the Ordnance, who lived in that neighbourhood, to be domeſtick tutor to his ſon, afterwards Sir Edward Sherburne (c), who ſucceeded his father in the office of Ordnance; and was Commiſſary-General of the artillery to King Charles, at the battle of Edgehill, &c. and likewiſe of note for ſome poetical performances of his own. How long our author continued in this ſituation we know not, before his Muſe brought forth another elaborate poem, in honour of King Henry VII. and that important battle which gained him the crown of England. This work was publiſhed, with ſome commendatory poems before it (as the other had been), in the year 1638 [C]; and by the judicious deliberation he live, if he can judge which is more rare, the acts of thoſe brave heroes, or his expreſſion of them. The fourth ſays, that men trained in war, ſcarce know which has acted beſt, the ſword or pen; that the author writes ſo clearly, that he who reads the book ſhall ſee the battles; and that he paints the wounds, groans, and death of the enemy, in ſuch ſtrong colours, as would make a coward faint to read them. And the laſt, having told him that his Bayes, and Edward's ſword, mutually advance each other; ſays, that his readers will beſt praiſe his battles, with fearful tremblings, and their hair on end. After theſe encomiums, we may be expected to ſhew out of the author's own performance, as far as a little taſte at leaſt will do it, how far he has deſerved them; and the rather, becauſe his poems are grown more ſcarce than they deſerve to be. In the firſt place then, ſee how the brave Black Prince ſpirits up his army at the battle of Creſſy.

Courageous Edward ſpurs their valour on,
And chears his ſprightful ſoldiers: where he came,
His breath did kindle valour, where was none;
And where it found a ſpark, it made a flame.
Armies of fearful Harts will ſcorn to yield,
If Lions be their Captains in the field (3).

(3) Battle of Creſſey, p. 35.

Then in the engagement, ſee how, by his ſhowers of arrows, the enemies drop, like ripe grapes by a ſtorm of hail.

As when the colder region of the air
Moulds rain to hail-ſhot, the relenting tree
Of the plump god, luſty before, and fair,
Loſeth her rubies with heaven's battery;
Thus fell the foe: for ſhoot, though in the dark,
'Tis hard to miſs, when the whole field's a mark (4).

(4) Id. p. 42.

But after the engagement, ſee what melancholy ſpectacles the French were:

Here a hand ſever'd, there an ear was crop'd;
Here a chap fal'n, and there an eye put out;
Here was an arm lopp'd off, there a noſe dropp'd;
Here half a man, and there a leſs piece fought:
Like to diſmember'd ſtatues they did ſtand,
Which had been mangled by time's iron hand (5).

(5) Id. p. 50.

And then, what a condition the Engliſh pikes and lances were in.

The artificial wood of ſpears was wet
With yet warm blood; and trembling in the wind,
Did rattle like the thorns which nature ſet
On the rough hide of an arm'd porcupine:
Or looked like the trees which dropped gore,
Pluck'd from the tomb of ſlaughter'd Polydore (6).

(6) Id. p. 49.

Out of his ſecond poem, on the battle of Poictiers, we ſhall only offer this deſcription of the Black Prince.

And now my fancy ſees great Edward riſe,
Mars his Enthuſiaſt: his actions were Raptures of valour, and deep extacies
Of man above himſelf; for drawing here,
His ſpirits from their matter, paſſed more
Himſelf, than he ſurpaſs'd the world before.

He, on the ſtage of Aquitaine, did play
That part, which none beſide can perſonate:
In ev'ry courſe, or found, or made a way,
And proſtrates, as infallible as fate.
Like to death's harbinger, his paſſage made;
And there death lodged, where he lodg'd his blade (7).

(7) Battle of Poictiers, p. 81.

In theſe two poems, it may be here farther obſerved, that a man of copious reading might eaſily point out many fine ſentiments, which the author has happily tranſlated, both from the ancients and moderns; and not only from ſome Latin poets, but even from ſome of our moſt celebrated Engliſh authors in proſe; if that may be called proſe in them, which paſſes for poetry, as turned by him into rhyme and meaſure. For Monſ. Dacier would diſpute it; and argue, that a poem tranſproſed, would ſtill be poetry; and that a true piece of proſe, will ſtill continue ſuch, through all the diſguiſe of verſification: for that, it is the thought, and not the ſtructure of the words, which makes it one or the other (8). This may be more true, in the general ſtory of a poem, or ſome ſelect, than in every ſingle ſentiment. For there are few poems ſo continually upon the ſtretch of metaphors, hyperboles, and the language of the gods, as not to deſcend, in ſome parts, to the diction of mere mortal men. Thus that pathetic apoſtrophe to Death itſelf, in Sir Walter Raleigh's Hiſtory of the World (9), has been quoted and admired as one of the fineſt pieces of proſe upon that ſubject, in any ancient or modern author (10); yet thoſe words, tranſplanted into a dramatic poem, have been applauded on the theatre, as fine poetry (11). Thus that beautiful aſſemblage of ideas, accounting for the fears of death, in one of Nat. Lee's tragedies (12), has been preſcribed as a good poetical preſervative againſt thoſe fears, by a critical writer juſt before quoted (13); and yet, when Sir Francis Bacon firſt wrote thoſe very words, he never dreamt of writing poetry; nor have they been taken ever ſince, as they ſtand in his book, for any other than good proſe (14). And thus might we produce, but that it may be thought too tedious or minute, half a dozen, if not half a ſcore diſtichs from this laſt poem of our author, Charles Aleyn's, the Battle of Poictiers, which are viſibly verſified from Lord Bacon's proſe, chiefly in his book before mentioned. Not but our poet has many elegant thoughts and ſentences of his own; ſo that it appears that the foreign helps to invention, which he, as other able poets, made uſe of, proceeded rather from the want of induſtry, to cultivate his own cogitations, and reap in the fruits of his own harveſt, than any ſterility in the field of his fancy. All we ſhall here farther obſerve of theſe two poems is, from a Manuſcript Continuation of them; containing the reigns of Richard II. Henry IV. and Henry V. (15), which has been before cited and made uſe of in another work (16). This learned author, whoever he was, ſays, in the entrance of thoſe poems, that he forbears to recount the glories of King Edward the Third's reign, Creſcy and Poictiers, becauſe they were already drawn by a happy pen.

[C] This work was publiſhed, &c. in the year 1638.] Under the following title: The Hiſtorie of that wiſe and fortunate Prince, Henrie, of that name the ſeventh, King of England. With that famed battaile, fought between the ſaid King Henry and Richard III. named Crook-back, upon Redmore, near Boſworth. In a poem by Charles Aleyn, 8*vo*. printed for Thomas Cotes. This poem, as the others, is written in ſtanzas of ſix lines; and contains an hundred and fifty-ſix pages. It is licenſed by Dr. Thomas Wykes; who ſays, in his Latin Imprimatur, that he has read over this hiſtorical poem, and judges it worthy of being made public. Among the verſes prefixed, there is one copy, to his ingenious friend, Mr. Charles Aleyn, on his learned poem, by Edward Sherburne, his pupil before mentioned; in which he tells our author, that his words yield Henry more honour than did his own weapons; and there is another poem or epigram by his friend Edward Prideaux; which, becauſe ſhort, ſhall here obtain a place.

he took in his publications, we cannot expect to meet with much more of his labours, though ſomething more of his in print does appear [D]; ſince we are informed he was ſo ſoon after called to his laſt reſt: for it is ſaid that he died about the year 1640; and that he was buried in the pariſh of St. Andrew's Holborn (d).

(d) Id. ibid.

When Fame had ſaid thy Poem ſhould come out
Without a Dedication; ſome did doubt
If Fame in that had told the truth; but I,
Who knew her falſe, boldly gave Fame the lye:
For I was certain, that this Book, by thee,
Was dedicated to Eternity.

As this poem is longer than the other two, it is fuller fraught with variety of matter, actions, and characters; and alſo richly adorned with many flowers of rhetoric; alluſions; hiſtorical, poetical, and philoſophical; and many general and comprehenſive maxims, moral and political: ſo that it is animating or inſtructive in moſt parts; and as for verſification, it may vie in elegancy with ſeveral contemporary performances, which have happened to acquire greater fame. If his cadence is not always ſmooth, 'tis generally to make way for ſomething that is nervous and maſculine; which was more regarded by the poets in that age, and before our modern refiners ſacrificed ſtrength to ſoftneſs, and ſenſe to mere ſound. Many quotations having been made from this work, we ſhall content ourſelves here with one ſtanza, of ſeveral he has written upon Empſon and Dudley, thoſe two voracious inſtruments of Henry's avarice, as a ſhort ſpecimen of his genius in this poem; and which may caſually incite the curioſity of ſome ingenious reader, knowing in our Engliſh hiſtory, to peruſe and conſider the poem itſelf, and thoſe before mentioned, with intention, if they ſhall be found deſerving it, of reviving them together, with ſome good hiſtorical illuſtrations:

And as the lower orbs are wheel'd about,
Rapt by the motion of the orb above:
So were inferior agents ſoon found out,
Which mov'd and turn'd, when He began to move:
For 'tis obſerv'd, that Princes ſooner get Men for their humour, than their honour fit (17).

And there was publiſhed, The Hiſtory of Eurialus and Lucretia, by Charles Aleyn, the year before (18) that in which he is reported to have died. It is a tranſlation; and the ſtory is to be found among the Latin epiſtles of Æneas Sylvius. O.

ALFRED. See ÆLFRED.

ALLAM (Andrew) a writer in the XVIIth century, was the ſon of Andrew Allam, a perſon of mean rank, and born at Garſingdon near Oxford, in April 1655. He had his education in Grammar learning at a private ſchool at Denton, in the pariſh of Cudeſdon, near his native place, under Mr. William Wildgooſe of Brazen-noſe college, a noted ſchoolmaſter of that time. He was entered a batteler of St. Edmund's hall, in Eaſter term 1671. After he had taken his degrees in Arts, he became a Tutor, Moderator, Lecturer in the chapel, and at length Vice-principal of his houſe. In 1680, about Whitſuntide, he entered into Holy Orders; and, in 1683, was made one of the Maſters of the ſchools. His works that are extant are: 1. The learned Preface or Epiſtle to the Reader, with a dedicatory Epiſtle, in the printer's name, prefixed to The Epiſtle Congratulatory of Lyſimachus Nicanor, &c. to the Covenanters of Scotland, &c. Oxon, 1684. 2. The Epiſtle containing an account of Dr. Coſins's life, prefixed to the Doctor's book intitled, Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Politeia in tabulas digeſta. Oxon, 1684. fol. 3. The Preliminary Epiſtle, with a review and correction of the book intitled, Some plain Diſcourſes on the Lord's Supper, &c. written by Dr. George Griffith, Biſhop of St. Aſaph. Oxon, 1684, 8*vo.* 4. Additions and Corrections to a book intitled, Angliæ Notitia, or The preſent State of England [A]. 5. Additions to Helvicus's Hiſtorical and Chronological Theatre [B]. Mr. Allam laid the foundation of a work intitled, Notitia Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ, or an Hiſtory of the Cathedral Churches, &c. of England. But death prevented his completing this deſign. 6. He likewiſe tranſlated the Life of Iphicrates, printed in the Engliſh verſion of Plutarch by ſeveral gentlemen of Oxford. Oxon, 1684, 8*vo.* 7. Laſtly, He aſſiſted Mr. Anthony Wood in compiling his elaborate work of the Athenæ Oxonienſes, or Hiſtory of the Oxford Writers; and is mentioned by that author with great commendation and reſpect [C]. He died of the ſmall-pox, the 17th of June 1685, and was buried in the church of St. Peter in the Eaſt at Oxford (a).

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 784, 785.

[A] Additions and corrections to a book intitled, Angliæ Notitia, &c.] They appeared in the edition of that book, printed at London in 1684. But the author of the Notitia never thought fit to acknowledge the aſſiſtance he had received from Mr. Allam (1).

(1) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 785.

[B] Additions to Helvicus's Hiſtorical and Chronological Theatre.] He intended to have finiſhed a ſupplement to that work, from 1660 to 1683, but was prevented by death. His additions, as far as they went, were printed with that author at London 1687, fol. But whereas there was a column in the edition of 1687, intended to contain the names of the moſt famous Jeſuits, from the foundation of the order to the year 1685, this (Mr. Wood tells us) was not done by Mr. Allam; nor that paſſage under 1678, which runs thus; Titus Oates diſcovers a pretended Popiſh plot (2).

(2) Wood, ib.

[C] He aſſiſted Mr. Anthony Wood, ---who ſpeaks of him with great commendation and reſpect.] 'He 'was a perſon (ſays that author) of eminent virtues, 'was ſober, temperate, moderate, and modeſt even 'to example. He underſtood the controverſial writ-'ings between Conformiſts and Nonconformiſts, Pro-'teſtants and Papiſts, far beyond his years, which 'was advanced by a great and happy memory. And 'I am perſuaded, had he not been taken off by the 'ſaid offices (namely thoſe of tutor, moderator, &c.) 'he would have gone beyond all of his time and 'age in thoſe matters. He underſtood the world of 'men well, authors better; and nothing but years 'and experience were wanting, to make him a com-'pleat walking library (3).' B.

ALLEN (JOHN) Archbiſhop of Dublin, in the reign of King Henry VIII. was educated in the univerſity of Oxford; from whence removing to Cambridge, he there took the degree of Bachelor of Laws (a). He was ſent by Dr. Warham, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the Pope, about certain matters relating to the Church. He continued at Rome nine years, and was created Doctor of Laws, either there, or in ſome other Univerſity of Italy. After his return, he was appointed Chaplain to Cardinal Wolſey, and was Commiſſary or Judge of his Court as Legate à latere; in the execution of which office he was ſuſpected of great diſhoneſty, and even perjury. He aſſiſted the Cardinal in viſiting, and afterwards ſuppreſſing, forty of the ſmaller monaſteries, for the erection of his college at Oxford, and that at Ipſwich. The Cardinal procured for him the living of Dalby in Leiceſterſhire, though it belonged to the Maſter and Brethren of the hoſpital of Burton Lazars. About the latter end of the year 1525, he was incorporated Doctor of Laws in the Univerſity of Oxford. On the 13th of March 1528, he was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Dublin, in the room of Dr. Hugh Inge deceaſed; and about the ſame time was made Chancellor of Ireland. He wrote; 1. Epiſtola de Pallii ſignificatione activa & paſſiva; penned by him at the time when he received the Archiepiſcopal pall. 2. De Conſuetudinibus ac Statutis in tuitoriis cauſis obſervandis. He wrote alſo ſeveral other pieces relating to the Church. His death, which happened in July 1534, was very tragical [A]. For being taken in a time of rebellion by Thomas Fitz Gerald, eldeſt ſon to the Earl of Kildare, he was, by his command, moſt cruelly murdered, being brained like an ox, at Tartaine in Ireland [B], in the fifty eighth year of his age (b).

ALLEN or ALLEYN (THOMAS), a famous mathematician in the XVIth century, was born at Uttoxeter in Staffordſhire the twenty-firſt of December 1542, being deſcended, through ſix generations, from Henry Allen or Alan, Lord of the manor of Buckenhall in the ſaid county. He was admitted Scholar of Trinity-college in Oxford, the fourth of June 1561, Fellow in 1565, and two years after, Maſter of Arts. Being much inclined to a retired life, and averſe from entering into Holy Orders, he quitted the college and his Fellowſhip, and retired to Glouceſter Hall, in 1570; where he followed his ſtudies cloſely many years, and at length became an eminent Antiquary, Philoſopher, and Mathematician [A]. Being thus accompliſhed with various ſorts of learning, he was ſeveral times invited to the houſes of Princes and Noblemen, not only of this nation, but of others [B]. Robert Earl of Leiceſter, the great favourite in Queen Elizabeth's reign, had a particular eſteem for Mr. Allen [C], and would have conferred a biſhopric on him; but his love of a retired life made him

[A] He became an eminent Antiquary, Philoſopher, and Mathematician.] The author of his funeral oration (1) calls him not only the Coryphæus, but the very ſoul and ſun of all the Mathematicians of his time. Mr. Selden (2) tells us, he was 'omni eruditionis 'genere ſummoque judicio ornatiſſimus, celeberri-'mæ Academiæ Oxonienſis decus inſigniſſimum; i. e. 'A perſon of the moſt extenſive learning and conſummate 'judgment, the brighteſt ornament of the famous uni-'verſity of Oxford.' And Camden (3) ſays, he was 'Plurimis optimiſque artibus ornatiſſimus; i. e. Skil-'led in moſt of the beſt arts and ſciences.' Mr. Wood (4) gives him the character of an excellent man, the father of all learning and virtuous induſtry, an unfeigned lover and furtherer of all good arts and ſciences. The ſame author, having ſearched in the chapel of Trinity-college, for an epitaph on Mr. Allen's grave, but having found none, gives us, inſtead thereof, part of his character tranſcribed from a certain manuſcript, in the library of the ſaid college, running thus: 'Vir 'fuit elegantium literarum ſtudioſiſſimus, Academicæ 'diſciplinæ tenaciſſimus, apud Exteros & Academicos 'ſemper in magno pretio, eorumque qui in eccleſia 'Anglicana atque in Univerſitate Oxonienſi pro me-'ritis ſuis ad dignitates aut præfecturas ſubinde pro-'vecti fuerunt. [B] He was invited to the houſes of Princes and Noblemen, not only of this nation, but of others.] He was often courted to live in the family of Henry Earl of Northumberland, a great friend and patron of the Mathematicians; which invitation he partly embraced, and ſpending ſome little time at the Earl's houſe, he there became acquainted with thoſe celebrated Mathematicians Thomas Harriot, John Dee, Walter Warner, Nathaniel Torporley, &c. He was alſo ſtrongly ſolicited by Albertus L'aſkie, Count or Prince of Sirade in Poland (who was in England in 1583) to go with him into that country, and reſide there, with a promiſe of preferment. But Allen, being fond of retirement, and an academical life, declined the Count's offer, and, like a true philoſopher, deſpiſed riches and greatneſs (5).

(5) Wood, ubi ſupra.

[C] The Earl of Leiceſter ---- had a particular eſteem for Mr. Allen.] The Earl's intimacy with Allen, and the abovementioned John Dee, expoſed him to the calumnies of the author of a book intituled, Leiceſter's Commonwealth; in which it is ſaid, that they (meaning the Earl, &c. whom he brands with the name of Atheiſts) uſed the art of figuring and conjuring, for procuring the ſaid Earl's unlawful deſigns, and that alſo by their black art, they endeavoured to make a match between Queen Elizabeth and him. This is plainly a fooliſh and malicious charge. However, it is certain, the Earl placed ſuch confidence in Allen, that nothing material in the ſtate was tranſacted without his knowledge; and that the Earl had conſtant information, by letter from Allen, of what paſſed in the univerſity (6).

decline the offer. He was alſo highly reſpected by other famous men of his time, as Sir Thomas Bodley, Sir Henry Savile, Mr. Camden, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir Henry Spelman, Mr. Selden, &c. (a). His great ſkill in the mathematics made the ignorant and vulgar look upon him as a magician or conjurer. He was very curious in collecting ſcattered manuſcripts relating to every faculty, particularly hiſtory, antiquity, aſtronomy, philoſophy, mathematics, &c. Theſe collections have been quoted by ſeveral learned authors, and mentioned to have been in the Bibliotheca Alleniana: but they are now loſt in obſcure hands. His works are: 1. Claudii Ptolemei Peluſienſis, de Aſtrorum judiciis, aut, ut vulgo vocant, quadripartitæ conſtructionis liber ſecundus; cum expoſitione Thomæ Alleyn Angli Oxonienſis; i. e. Alleyn*, &c. [D]. Our author likewiſe wrote notes on many of Lilly's books, and ſome on John Bale's book De Scriptoribus maj. Britanniæ. Having lived to a great age, he died at Glouceſter-Hall the thirtieth of September 1632 (b) [E].

[D] Claudii Ptolemæi Peluſienſis, &c.] Mr. Wood (7), who ſaw theſe two pieces in manuſcript, tells us, they fell into the hands of William Lilly, the famous Aſtrologer, who gave them to Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; in 1652. One of theſe copies was tranſcribed from the original given by Mr. Allen to Sir Thomas Ayleſbury; the other was in the poſſeſſion of John Huniades, the great chymiſt, who gave it to Lilly.

[E] He died at Glouceſter-hall the 30th of September, 1632.] The day after his death, an oration was delivered in praiſe of the deceaſed, by Mr. William Burton (8) of that houſe, in the common refectory, before the Vice-chancellor, heads of colleges and halls, and many of the univerſity then preſent; all of whom accompanied the body to Trinity-College, where, after another oration ſpoken by Mr. George Bathurſt, it was ſolemnly interred. Mr. Allen left his curious collection of manuſcripts to Sir Kenelm Digby, who gave them to the Bodleian library. Some of them, Mr. Wood tells us (9), had, about the time of Allen's death, fallen into the hands of Mr. Richard James, of Corpus-Chriſti college, and were by him depoſited in the Cotton library; and others were in the poſſeſſion of Sir Thomas Ayleſbury, Maſter of the Requeſts. His picture, painted to the life, he gave to the preſident of Trinity-college, and his ſucceſſors, to remain in the ſaid Preſident's dining-room for ever. Another copy he gave to the Cotton library, and a third to his old friend Dr. Thomas Clayton, head of Pembroke college. B.

ALLEN (THOMAS) a learned divine, was born in the year 1573, educated in the King's ſchool at Worceſter, and from thence removed to Brazen-noſe college in Oxford, at ſixteen years of age, anno 1589. He made a great progreſs in philoſophy, and became a moſt noted diſputant. He was elected a Probationer Fellow of Merton-college, in 1593. Afterwards he went into Holy Orders; but, inſtead of frequent preaching, he applied himſelf to the more abſtruſe and critical parts of learning. This recommended him to the eſteem of Sir Henry Savile, by whoſe intereſt he obtained a Fellowſhip of Eton-college. He wrote Obſervations in Libellum Chryſoſtomi in Eſaiam; *i. e. ALLEIN (RICHARD) was the ſon of a Clergyman of the ſame name, Rector of Dichet in Somerſetſhire, which preferment he held fifty years (a). Our Richard was born at the aforeſaid place, in the year 1611 (b). The firſt part of his education under his father, fitted him for the univerſity in 1627 (c). In that year he was entered a Commoner of St. Alban's Hall in Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d). Thence he removed, it ſeems, to New Inn, where having received his Maſter's degree (e), and then taking Holy Orders, he became aſſiſtant to his father, and carried on the work of the miniſtry in his own country (f). His father inclining to what is called Puritaniſm, he fell naturally into thoſe opinions, and being a man of great zeal and competent learning he came early to be much conſidered. In the month of March 1641, he ſucceeded Richard Bernard in the Rectory of Batcomb, in Somerſetſhire, where that Divine had continued twenty-eight years, having for his predeceſſor Dr. Biſs, who lived in the days of the Reformation (g). Mr. Allein diſcharged his duty here, with much induſtry and fidelity, and being a zealous Covenanter, had now and then ſome diſturbance from the King's forces in thoſe parts. He was, however, a great enemy to that enthuſiaſtic ſpirit which broke out in this country, on the ruin of the eſtabliſhed Church, as appears by his ſubſcribing a repreſentation, intitled, The Teſtimony of the Miniſtry

Miniſtry of Somerſetſhire, to the Truth of Jeſus Chriſt, and to the ſolemn League and Covenant, which was printed in 1648 (b). His induſtry and affection to the Cauſe, procured himſelf and his father to be conſtituted Aſſiſtants to the Commiſſioners, appointed by parliament for ejecting ſcandalous miniſters (i). This was in 1654, and Mr. Wood tells us, that they acted in this capacity with ſeverity enough (k). However, upon the Reſtoration, Mr. Allein ſhewed a diſpoſition to yield obedience to the government; but could not, it ſeems, come up to the terms of conformity, which occaſioned his being ejected from his living, after he had held it upwards of twenty years (l). After this misfortune he continued to exerciſe his function privately, preaching ſometimes at his own houſe, and at other times at the houſes of gentlemen in the neighbourhood. Once he was apprehended at the ſeat of Mr. More, who had been a member of parliament, and who had invited him thither to preach to his family, and to ſome of his neighbours. The penalty was five pounds, which that gentleman very honourably paid for Mr. Allein, though he went to priſon for his own fine (m). But if this made him cautious, it did not however make him indolent, he went ſtill on in the way of his profeſſion, notwithſtanding that he was often ſummoned to quarter-ſeſſions, and there ſeverely reprimanded for keeping a conventicle (n). However, he was not impriſoned as other miniſters were; becauſe his great learning, piety, and unblameable life had gained him ſo high a reputation, that it would have been a very unpopular thing, to have ſent a man of his character to a county-gaol (o). After the five miles act took place, he was obliged to leave Batcomb, and to retire to Frome-Selwood, where he lodged at the houſe of Mr. Smith, and continued there in the conſtant exerciſe of his miniſtry, notwithſtanding the dangers to which he was expoſed (p). At length he gave way to fate, on the twenty-ſecond of December 1681, being upwards of ſixty-four years of age (q). He was diſtinguiſhed for his plain, practical, and pathetic manner of preaching; for his great delight in the duties of the paſtoral office, ſuch as catechizing, viſiting the ſick, and inſtructing the ignorant. His writings alſo, of which in the notes we ſhall give a particular account, were much eſteemed, and often printed [A]. As he choſe to leave his living rather than ſtrain his conſcience, ſo his Nonconformity was no way tinctured, either with ſpleen to the eſtabliſhed Church, or diſloyalty to his Prince. On the contrary, he lived in a fair correſpondence with the Clergy in his neighbourhood, and had much reſpect paid him by the gentry of his acquaintance, though of oppoſite ſentiments (r). The reverend Mr. Richard Jenkins, M. A. and Vicar of Frome-Selwood, preached his funeral ſermon, and therein gave full and fair teſtimony to his piety, meekneſs, and moderation (s), of which he was the better judge, from his long acquaintance with him, and frequent viſits to him, in his laſt ſickneſs. However, the meek and charitable Anthony Wood, to deſtroy, as far as in him lay, the credit of Mr. Jenkins, ſtyles him a lukewarm Conformiſt, on the ſtrength of theſe facts.

[A] Much eſteemed and often printed.] The firſt (1) work he publiſhed ſo far as I know, or can learn, was, A Letter to a Friend, proving 1. That valid ordination ought not to be repeated; and, 2. That ordination by Preſbyters is valid. It was addreſſed to Mr. John Humfrey, 1661, 4*to*. But as this hath not his name, we begin with 1. Vindiciæ Pietatis, Or, a Vindication of Godlineſs in the greateſt Strictneſs, and Spirituality of it, from the Imputations of Folly and Fancy. Mr. Wood ſays, that it was printed in 8*vo* in the year 1664, and again 1669. He then ſpeaks of Directions for attaining and maintaining of a godly Life, as if they had been added to the laſt edition. The godly Man's Portion and ſanctuary, being the ſecond part of Vindiciæ pietatis, Mr. Wood makes a diſtinct book (2); but the edition I have varies from all theſe. It conſiſts of two parts, the Vindiciæ Pietatis, and the Directions for a godly Life, printed together at London, without a Printer's name, in 1665, with a dedication to the inhabitants of the pariſh of B —— in the county of S ——; i. e. Batcomb in the county of Somerſet. The godly Man's Portion, is joined thereto, but is printed in 1663, whence I conceive the firſt edition to have been in that year, if not in the year before it. The reaſon the book is without the Printer's name, is, becauſe it was not licenſed. On its publication, the book was greedily bought up, and the King's bookſeller having notice where there was a parcel of them lodged for ſale, cauſed them to be ſeized; in conſequence of which, they were ſent to the King's Kitchen, there to be employed for other purpoſes than reading. Thence, however, he took care to purchaſe them at the rate of waſte paper, bound them up and ſold them. But this artifice being diſcovered, he was brought on his knees at the council-table, and the books ſent once again to the King's kitchen, there to be biſk'd; that is, ſtruck over with ink, ſo as to be illegible (3). 2. Heaven opened, or a brief and plain Diſcovery of the Riches of God's Covenant of Grace. Mr. Wood calls this the third part of the Vindiciæ Pietatis (4), but it is not ſo ſtyled in the edition I have, which is printed in 1665, with a preface to the reader, wherein it is ſaid, that the author intended to have added it to his other book, but that he found it growing to too great a bulk. 3. The World conquered, or a Believer's Victory over the World laid open, being the fourth Part of Vindiciæ Pietatis, London 1668, 8*vo*. All which pieces, Mr. Wood ſays, were printed together in 1671, under the title of the Works of Mr. Allen, in four Parts (5). 4. Godly Fear, or the Nature and Neceſſity of Fear, and its Uſefulneſs, &c. London, 1674, 8*vo*. This is no more than a collection of ſermons on ſeveral texts. 5. A Rebuke to Backſliders, and a Spur for Loiterers, in ſeveral Sermons lately preached to a private Congregation, London, 1677, 8*vo*. There was another edition in 1684, which is ſaid, in the title-page, to have been publiſhed for the awakening a ſleepy Age. From the preface to this book it appears, that the author when he wrote it was ſickly, and in a declining ſtate of health. 6. A Companion for Prayer, or Directions for Improvement in Grace, and practical Goodneſs, in Times of extraordinary Danger, London, 1680, in 12*mo*. 7. Inſtructions about Heart-work, what is to be done on God's part and ours, for the Cure and Keeping of the Heart, that we may live in the Exerciſe and Growth of Grace here, and have a comfortable Aſſurance of Glory to Eternity, London, 1681, 8*vo*. This is a poſthumous work, and before it there is an epiſtle to the reader, by Dr. Anneſley. Wood places the firſt edition of this book in 1682 (6), but therein he is certainly miſtaken (7). The ſecond edition came out in 1684, and then his Companion for Prayer was added to it by way of appendix. He alſo wrote A brief Character of Mr. Joſeph Allen, which makes the third chapter in the account of his life publiſhed in 1672. He was related to our author, and ſeveral pieces written by Joſeph, are inſerted in the works of Richard Allein, as the reader may ſee by conſulting the notes upon that life, in this work.

ALLEIN (JOSEPH) the ſon of Mr. Tobias Allein, was born in the Devizes in Wiltſhire in 1633 (a). An extraordinary tincture of religion diſcovered itſelf in all his actions, even in his childhood, inſomuch that at eleven years of age he was much addicted to private prayer, and on the death of his brother Edward, who was a worthy Miniſter of the Goſpel, he earneſtly intreated his father, that he might receive ſuch an education as might fit him for the ſame work. In the ſpace of four years he acquired a competent knowledge of the Latin and Greek tongues, and was by his maſter declared fit for the univerſity (b). His father kept him however ſome time at home, where he was inſtructed in Logick, and at the age of ſixteen, was placed in Lincoln college at Oxford. There he continued to the eighth of November 1651, when he was admitted of Corpus Chriſti college, a Wiltſhire Scholarſhip being then vacant. He was very remarkable while at college, for his great aſſiduity in his ſtudies, a ſettled gravity in his temper, and a chearful readineſs to aſſiſt others. He might, in a little time, have attained a Fellowſhip, which he declined for the ſake of the office of Chaplain, being exceedingly pleaſed with the opportunity this gave him of exerting his gifts in prayer. In July 1653 (c), he was admitted Bachelor of Arts, and became a tutor. In this arduous employment he behaved himſelf with equal ſkill and diligence, ſeveral of his pupils becoming very eminent Nonconformiſt Miniſters, and not a few attained to good preferment in the eſtabliſhed Church (d). In 1655, being then in the one and twentieth year of his age, he became aſſiſtant in the miniſtry, to Mr. George Newton, in Taunton Magdalen, in Somerſetſhire. There, on the fourth of October in the ſame year, he married his beloved wife, and ſettled himſelf in the world (e). His income was very ſmall, at firſt not above forty, never above eighty pounds a year, which, however, was ſomewhat increaſed by the pains of his wife, who kept a boarding-ſchool (f). During ſeven years that he lived in this manner, he diſcharged his paſtoral duty with incredible diligence; for beſides preaching and catechizing in the church, he ſpent ſeveral afternoons in a week, in viſiting the people of the town, and exhorting them to a religious life. Theſe applications were, at firſt, far from being welcome to many families; but his meekneſs, moderation, and unaffected piety, made him by degrees the delight of his pariſhioners (g). He was deprived in 1662, for Nonconformity. He preached, however, privately, generally ſix or ſeven, ſometimes fourteen or fifteen times a week. His zeal and induſtry in this courſe, brought him at length into trouble; ſo that on the twenty-ſixth day of May 1663, he was committed to Ivelcheſter jail, where at that time there were ſeven Miniſters, and fifty Quakers, confined in one room, where they ſuffered great hardſhips: however, they ſtill continued to preach till the aſſizes (h). Theſe were held before Mr. Juſtice Foſter, and at them, viz. on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, he was indicted for preaching on the ſeventeenth of May preceding, of which indictment he was found guilty, ſentenced to pay a hundred merks, and to remain in priſon till his fine was paid. At the time of his receiving ſentence, he ſaid; That he was glad that it had appeared before his country, that whatſoever he was charged with, he was guilty of nothing but doing his duty; and that all that did appear by the evidence was, that he had ſung a pſalm, and inſtructed his family, others being there, and both in his own houſe. He continued in priſon a whole year wanting three days, which broke his conſtitution (i). However, when he was at liberty, he applied himſelf to his miniſtry as earneſtly as ever, which brought upon him a grievous ſickneſs. The five miles act taking place, he retired from Taunton to Wellington, where he continued but a ſmall time, Mr. Mallack, a merchant, inviting him to lodge at a houſe of his at ſome diſtance from Taunton (k). In the Summer of 1665, he was adviſed to drink the waters near the Devizes, for his health. But before he left Mr. Mallack's houſe, viz. on the tenth of July in that year, ſome friends came to take their leaves of him: they were ſurprized praying together, and for this were ſentenced to ſixty days impriſonment, which himſelf, ſeven Miniſters, and forty private perſons, ſuffered in the county jail. This hindered his going to the waters, and his diſeaſe returning, he loſt another Summer (l). At length, in 1667, he went, but was far from receiving that benefit he expected. After ſome time he went to Dorcheſter, where he grew better; but applying himſelf again to preaching, catechizing, and other duties, his diſtemper returned with ſuch violence, that he loſt the uſe of his limbs. His death was then daily expected; but by degrees he grew ſomewhat better, and at length went to Bath, where the ſtate of his health altered ſo much, that his friends were in hopes he would have held out ſeveral years; but growing ſuddenly worſe again, he finiſhed his life there, in the month of November 1668, being then ſomewhat above thirty-five years old (m). He was a man of great learning, and greater charity, zealous in his own way of worſhipping God, but not in the leaſt bitter towards any Chriſtians who worſhipped in another manner (n). He preſerved a great reſpect for the Church, notwithſtanding all his ſufferings, and was eminently loyal to his Prince, notwithſtanding the ſeverities of the times. His writings breathe a true ſpirit of piety, for which they have been always and deſervedly eſteemed [A]. Anthony Wood has treated (o) his memory very rudely [B], and betrayed trayed that ſpleen he had againſt the Nonconformiſts, in ſpeaking ill of one, who ſpake ill of no man. The body of our author lies interred in the chancel of the church of Taunton St. Magdalen, and on his grave-ſtone ſtand the following lines (p):

[A] His writings are deſervedly eſteemed.] The moſt remarkable of his printed books were theſe which follow: 1. A moſt familiar Explanation of the Aſſembly's Shorter Catechiſm. Wherein their larger anſwers are broken into leſſer parcels, thereby to let the light by degrees into the minds of learners, 8*vo.* 1656,

(p) Ibid. col. 421.

Here Mr. Joſeph Allein lies,
To God and you, a ſacrifice.

1656, with two appendixes. 2. A Call to Archippus; being an earneſt motive to the ejected miniſters to continue in their miniſtry, 4*to.* 1664. This was written during his impriſonment, and the intent of it was to ſtir up his Nonconformiſt brethren, to preach and pray, notwithſtanding the ſeverities they laboured under (1). It is very probable this might give offence though in writing it he diſcharged his conſcience. 3. An Alarm to the unconverted, publiſhed in 8*vo.* in 1672, as alſo in 12*mo*; at which time there were twenty thouſand of them ſold. It was afterwards printed under the title of A ſure Guide to Heaven, in 1675, and with this title, there have been fifty thouſand ſold (2). However, in 1720, there was a large impreſſion publiſhed with the firſt title, An Alarm to unconverted Sinners. It has a long epiſtle before it by Richard Baxter, and a ſhorter by our author's friend Richard Allein. I have been very careful in examining all the editions of this book, and find moſt of them vary in ſome particulars. There was an edition in 12*mo.* 1689, with a preface To the reader that would be ſafe and happy, which differs from both theſe prefaces. Mr. Wood tells us, it was printed under the title of A true Way to Happineſs: but as he makes this a different book from the Sure Guide to Heaven, and yet the ſame with the Alarm to unconverted Sinners (3), he is certainly miſtaken. 4. Chriſtian Letters full of ſpiritual Inſtruction, 8*vo.* London, 1672. They are forty in number, and were afterwards added as an appendix to his life. In 1677, there was another edition, with five new letters. Amongſt theſe, ſeveral are directed to his wife, and the reſt to his friends, and to his flock; moſt of them during his impriſonment at Ivelcheſter. 5. Caſes of Conſcience, &c. London, 1672, 8*vo.* Theſe are added to the laſt edition of the Alarm to unconverted Sinners. 6. Remains, being a Collection of ſundry Directions, Sermons, ſacramental Speeches, and Letters, not heretofore publiſhed, 8*vo.* 1672. Beſides theſe, he wrote ſeveral little practical pieces, which are inſerted in the books of Mr. Richard Allein. Such as the Synopſis of the Covenant (4). A Form of Words, expreſſing a Man's Covenant with God, &c. (5). Beſides theſe, he left behind him imperfect, a Body of Natural Theology, under eight heads, written in a good Latin ſtile, wherein were laid down; firſt, the Chriſtian Doctrine, and then by way of annotation was added, the teſtimonies of the ancient Philoſophers (6). One ſection of this, viz. De Providentia, was fitted for the preſs, and licenſed; but Anthony Wood ſays, that being Latin and Greek, and ſuch books having too few buyers in England, there were none yet found, who would be at the charge of printing it (7). To this account of his writings, we may add what is very often printed with them, the life and death of that excellent miniſter of Chriſt, Mr. Joſeph Allein, &c. This was firſt printed in 8*vo.* 1671. It conſiſts of ſeveral parts, 1. An introduction written by Mr. Richard Baxter. 2. A brief relation of what paſſed at his childhood, and at the univerſity, by an eye-witneſs. 3. A ſhort character of him by Mr. Richard Allein. 4. An account of his godly life and practice, by the Reverend Mr. Newton, to whom he was aſſiſtant. 5. A further account of his miniſtry, by an intimate friend. 6. A narrative of his life by his widow, Mrs. Theodoſia Allein. 7. Some notes by a perſon, in whoſe houſe he lodged. 8. His character, under the title of, A Compleat Picture of a Goſpel Miniſter. 9. A few additions to this character, by Mr. Richard Fairclough. The ſecond and eighth, were written by miniſters of the Church of England. There is, likewiſe, annexed a funeral ſermon, preached by Mr. George Newton, from Luke xxiii. 28. (8)

[B] Anthony Wood has treated his memory very rudely.] Moſt of the facts mentioned in this article, are taken out of the life of Joſeph Allein, mentioned in the foregoing note, and all the Oxford Antiquary has done, is to give them a malicious turn. He ſays, he deſired the office of chaplain, though inferior in value to a fellowſhip, that he might ſhew his excellencies in public twice in a day (9). A miniſter of the Church of England, who knew him at college, ſays his prayers were grave, ſuccinct, and premeditated, and (10) therefore, the times conſidered in which he executed this office, one may ſafely ſay, the college was the better for it; nor do we know whether he did not take this place to prevent the ill uſe that ſome fiery enthuſiaſt might have made of it. After mentioning his call to Taunton, Wood ſays (11), our author Joſeph received another call to take to wife, a fair and holy ſiſter, which being effected, he would as in jeſt complain to an intimate friend of his, of the inconveniencies of marriage, viz. that whereas he uſed to riſe at four of the clock in the morning, or before, his loving ſpouſe would keep him in bed 'till about ſix; alſo, whereas he uſed to ſtudy fourteen hours in a day, ſhe would bring him to eight or nine. And laſtly, that whereas he uſed to forbear one meal a day, at leaſt for his ſtudy, ſhe would bring him to his meat, &c. Mr. Wood cites no authority for this, and, therefore, one would ſuppoſe he had been told it; but the truth is, that in the ſecond chapter of Mr. Allein's life, we are told, that an intimate friend of his, having written to him to know the inconveniences of marriage, he, in a familiar anſwer, wrote back what Mr. Wood has mentioned (12); but how this can be called his complaint, is not eaſy to be underſtood. Our Oxford writer tells us, that he had a third call for the propagation of the Goſpel, and that he would by all means go into China to fulfil it, but was diſſuaded from it by the brethren (13). All which is built on ſome expreſſions which fell from Mr. Allein at the time he was ejected, when he ſaid, that if he found it impracticable to diſcharge the work of the miniſtry in his own country, he would go and preach Chriſtianity in China. This was only a declaration of the duty he thought incumbent upon him of preaching (14): but he actually formed another deſign, which Mr. Wood does not mention; and that was, to go and preach in Wales, which nothing but his ſickneſs hindered (15). After having taken his materials from the life of Joſeph Allein, he gives this account of it: From which acting Farce or Life, eſpecially that ridiculous diſcourſe of Theodoſia, the reader may eaſily underſtand what a grand zealot for the cauſe this our author Joſeph Allein was, and how his life was ſpent, in actions buſy, forward, (if not pragmatical) and meddling without intermiſſion. The ſaid Theodoſia, a prating goſſip, and a mere Xantippe, finding Joſeph Allein to be a mere ſcholar, and totally ignorant of women's tricks, did flatter, ſooth him up, and woo, and ſoon after married and brought him to her lure (16). Much more to the ſame purpoſe, we meet with in this author, whoſe account is thus cenſured by Dr. Calamy: 'Wood, the Oxonian, fancied himſelf among 'his boon companions paſſing away the tedious mi- 'nutes of the lingering glaſs, in its circular returns 'with a wanton tale, when he compoſed that farce 'to which this good man's name is prefixed (in his 'Athenæ Oxonienſes). But it is no diſgrace at all to 'any one to be ridiculed in ſuch a way as makes 'the actor infamous, in the eſtimation of all ſuch as 'have any relics either of honour, or honeſty (17).' There is a very honourable character given of him in Moreri's Dictionary (18), though he is not mentioned in any of the works of the ſame kind, which have hitherto appeared in our language (19).

ALLESTRY or ALLESTREE (RICHARD), Provoſt of Eton-college in the reign of King Charles II. was the ſon of Mr. Robert Alleſtry, a gentleman of an ancient family in Derbyſhire [A], and was born in March 1619, at Uppington near the Wreken in Shropſhire (a). He was educated firſt at a country free-ſchool in the neighbourhood, and afterwards at one of greater note at Coventry (b), where Philemon Holland the Tranſlator taught (c). In 1636, being then ſeventeen years of age, he was carried by his father to Oxford, and entered a Commoner in Chriſt-Church, under the tuition of Mr. Richard Buſby (d). Six months after his ſettlement in the univerſity, Dr. Fell, Dean of Chriſt-Church, obſerving the parts and induſtry of young Mr. Alleſtry, made him a ſtudent of that college; where he applied himſelf to academical learning with uncommon improvement and ſucceſs. After he had taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was choſen Moderator in philoſophy; which office he continued to diſcharge, till the diſturbances of the kingdom interrupted the ſtudies and repoſe of the univerſity. In 1641, Mr. Alleſtry, among other Oxford ſcholars, engaged in the King's ſervice, and continued therein till Sir John Biron (e), who was ſent with a party of horſe to countenance and ſupport the ſcholars in arms, withdrew from Oxford; upon which he returned, with many others, to his gown and his ſtudies. Soon after, a party of the rebels having entered Oxford, and plundered the colleges, Mr. Alleſtry narrowly eſcaped being ſeverely handled by them [B]. In October following he took arms again, and was preſent in the battle fought between King Charles and the rebels, under the command of the Earl of Eſſex, in Keinton-field in Warwickſhire: after which, underſtanding that the King deſigned immediately to march to Oxford, and take up his reſidence at the deanery of Chriſt church (f), he haſted thither to prepare for his Majeſty's reception; but in his way was taken priſoner by a party of horſe from Broughton-houſe, which was garriſoned by the Lord Say for the parliament. His confinement was very ſhort, the garriſon ſurrendering itſelf to the King's forces, who ſummoned it in their march. And now Mr. Alleſtry ſettled himſelf again to his ſtudies, and in the next ſpring (g) took his degree of Maſter of Arts; and the ſame year his life was greatly endangered by a peſtilential diſtemper, which raged in the garriſon of Oxford. Soon after his recovery, he entered a third time into his Majeſty's ſervice, and carried a muſket in a regiment formed out of the Oxford ſcholars [C]. In this ſervice he continued till the end of the war, and then went into Holy Orders, at a time when he had no proſpect of worldly advantage. He was tutor to ſeveral young gentlemen and ſtudents, and diſcharged the office of Cenſor of the college. He bore a part in that ſignal teſt of loyalty, which the univerſity of Oxford gave in their decree and judgment againſt the Solemn League and Covenant; for which, in July 1648, he was proſcribed and expelled the univerſity by the parliament viſitors [D]. Being thus driven from

(1) Preface to Dr. Alleſtry's Sermons, printed at Oxon in 1684.

[B] Mr. Alleſtry narrowly eſcaped being ſeverely handled by the rebels.] The occaſion was this: Some of the rebels, having attempted to break into the treaſury of Chriſt-Church, and after a day's labour having forced a paſſage into it, met with nothing but a ſingle groat, and a halter, at the bottom of a large iron cheſt. Enraged at their diſappointment, they went to the deanery; where having plundered as much as they thought fit, they put it all together in a chamber, locked it up, and retired to their quarters, intending the next day to return and diſpoſe of their prize. But when they came, they found themſelves again diſappointed, and every thing removed out of the chamber. Upon examination it was diſcovered that Mr. Alleſtry had a key to the lodgings, in the abſence of the Dean and his family; and that this key had been made uſe of upon this occaſion. Upon this he was ſeized; and, notwithſtanding all the defence he could make, would probably have been very ſeverely handled by the rebels, had not the Earl of Eſſex called away the forces on a ſudden, and by that means reſcued him from their fury (2).

(2) Ibid.

[C] He carried a muſket in a regiment formed out of the Oxford ſcholars.] The exigency of the King's affairs requiring the aid of all his loyal ſubjects, a regiment was raiſed out of the Oxford ſcholars, who ſerved as volunteers without pay or reward, and performed all duties not only in the garriſon, and ſallies for the defence of it in caſe of attacks or ſieges; but were alſo commanded upon parties abroad, and endured the fatigue of marches, and the inconvenience of bad quarters; differing in nothing from mercenary ſoldiers, except in their civility and juſtice to the country people while they ſtaid with them, and paying them at their departure: things ſo unuſual, that when, upon leaving their quarters, they offered their landlords money, they believed it was done in jeſt and to abuſe them, but were convinced of the contrary by its being left with them. In this regiment Mr. Alleſtry bore arms, being forward upon all occaſions to put himſelf upon action, and thinking it no diſgrace, though a Maſter of Arts and Fellow of a College, to perform the duties of a common ſoldier. Nor did he in the mean time neglect his ſtudies, frequently (as our author expreſſes it) holding his muſket in one hand and book in the other, and making the watchings of a ſoldier, the lucubrations of a ſtudent (3).

(3) Ibid.

[D] He was proſcribed, and expelled the univerſity by the Parliament viſitors.] Soon after the decree of the univerſity againſt the Solemn League and Covenant, viſitors were ſent down by the Parliament to require the ſubmiſſion of that body to its authority. Thoſe who could proſtitute their allegiance to their Prince, and oaths to the univerſity, and comply with the luſt of the uſurpers, were received into favour: all others, however deſerving, were without farther regard proſcribed; which was done by writing their names on a paper, and affixing it on the door of St. Mary's Church; ſignifying therein, that ſuch perſons were by the authority of the viſitors baniſhed the univerſity, and required to depart the precincts thereof within three days, upon pain of being taken for ſpies of war, and proceeded againſt accordingly. By this practice often repeated, the men of the greateſt hopes and merit in the univerſity were ſpoiled of all things; ſo that, within the compaſs of a few weeks, Oxford was purged of its moſt loyal members. In this diffuſive ruin Mr. Alleſtry had an early ſhare; and though he had the care of ſeveral perſons of quality his pupils, and accounts of his own and theirs to make up, he with difficulty obtained of Lieutenant-Colonel Kelſy, governor of the town, a ſhort reſpite, for ſettling his affairs, and doing juſtice to thoſe for whom he was concerned; the viſitors utterly refuſing his requeſt, for this reaſon, as Dr. Rogers one of their number was pleaſed to phraſe it, becauſe he was an eminent man (4).

(4) Ibid.

Oxford,

Oxford, he retired into Shropshire, and was entertained as Chaplain to the honourable Francis Newport, Esq; (b); and, upon the death of Richard Lord Newport (i) that gentleman's father, he was sent over into France to clear accounts, and take care of that nobleman's effects. Having dispatched this affair with good success, he came back to his employment, and continued in it till King Charles II.'s march into England with the Scotch army, and his wonderful escape at Worcester: at which time, the managers of the King's affairs wanting an intelligent and faithful person to send over to his Majesty, Mr. Allestry was desired to undertake the journey; which accordingly he did, and having attended the King at Roan, and received his dispatches, he returned into England. Here he found his friends Mr. Dolben and Mr. Fell (k), who had likewise been banished the university, residing privately there, and performing the offices of the Church of England to the Loyalists: upon which he joined them, and continued with them, till Sir Anthony Cope, a loyal young gentleman of considerable quality and fortune in Oxfordshire, prevailed upon him to live in his family; where he continued several years, with liberty of going or staying as occasion required: and by this means he was enabled, without being taken notice of, to convey messages to the King from his friends. After several difficult journies successfully performed, he was sent over, in the winter before his Majesty's Restoration, into Flanders; from whence returning with letters, he was seized, upon his landing at Dover, by a party of soldiers; but had the address to secure his letters, by conveying them to a faithful hand. Being guarded up to London, he was examined by a committee of the Council of Safety, and sent prisoner to Lambeth-house (l), where he contracted a dangerous sickness. After six or eight weeks confinement, he was set at liberty [E], and returned into Oxfordshire; from whence, after a short stay, he went into Shropshire to visit his relations [F]. Soon after the Restoration, Mr. Allestry was made a Canon of Christ-Church, and readily concurred in repairing the injuries and decays that church and college had suffered during the Usurpation. At the same time he undertook one of the lectureships of the city of Oxford, with a view to instil principles of loyalty into the minds of the citizens: yet he never received any part of the profits, but constantly distributed it among the poor. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, on the third of October 1660 (m), and was appointed one of the King's Chaplains in ordinary; and soon after, upon a vacancy (n) of the Divinity-chair, he was chosen Regius Professor. In 1665, the King conferred upon Dr. Allestry the Provostship (o) of Eton-college [G], which he held to his death. In 1679, finding his health, and particularly his sight, much impaired, he resigned the Professorship of Divinity, and had the satisfaction to be succeeded therein by Dr. Jane, of whose abilities he had perfect knowledge. And now, the decay of his constitution terminating in a dropsy, he removed to London, to be nearer the advice of physicians; but, medicines proving ineffectual, he died [H] in January 1680-1, and was buried in Eton-chapel (p), under a monument of white (q) marble, on which was put the under-

[E] He was set at liberty.] The means of his enlargement were owing to the prospect of an approaching revolution; for some of the heads of the republican party, seeing things tend towards his majesty's restoration, were willing by kindnesses to recommend themselves to the loyal party, in case matters should take that turn. Among these was the Earl of Shaftsbury, who used to value himself that Mr. Allestry owed his preservation to him (5).

(5) Ibid.

[F] He went into Shropshire to visit his relations.] In his return from thence, designing to visit his worthy friend Dr. Hammond at Westwood near Worcester, he had the mortification to meet, at the gate, the body of that great man carrying to his burial. This circumstance deserves the rather to be mentioned, because that eminent light of the English Church gave at his death, this testimony of his esteem for Mr. Allestry, that he left him his valuable library of books, well knowing that in his hands they would be useful weapons for the defence of that cause he had during life so vigorously asserted (6).

(6) Ibid.

[G] The King conferred upon Dr. Allestry the Provostship of Eton-College.] It was with some difficulty that he was prevailed upon to accept of this benefice: but the consideration that great interest was made for it by a lay-man, who might possibly succeed upon the advantage of his refusal, induced him to comply with his Majesty's gracious offer. For the Provost of Eton being actually parson of the parish, and presented to the Cure, and instituted by the Bishop of Lincoln the Diocesan, nothing (he thought) could be more sacrilegious and irregular than such an usurpation of a lay-person; nor any thing a greater disservice to the Church, than by an unseasonable modesty to make way for it. Upon these motives it was, that Dr. Allestry became Provost of Eton-College; and for the same reason it was, that, during his life, he continued so, never hearkening to any offer of preferment, which might occasion a vacancy. And it may be truly said, that this was the greatest secular care which attended him to his last moments, it being his dying request to his friends, to interpose with the King, that he might be succeeded by a person lawfully qualified, and who would promote the welfare of the college (7). It is remarkable, that his wishes were answered; for Dr. Zachariah Cradock of Cambridge, who had been installed Canon Residentiary of Chichester, succeeded him in the Provostship, being elected thereto by the Fellows; so that Mr. Waller the Poet, who, according to Anthony Wood, struggled hard for it, was disappointed (8).

(7) Ibid.

(8) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 678.

[H] His death.] Having taken a private lodging in London, he submitted to the methods prescribed by his physicians, more out of compliance with the request of his friends, than in expectation of a cure; in the mean time settling his temporal concerns, and employing the intervals his sickness allowed in attending to the offices of the church constantly read to him, and his private devotions. In his last moments he received the Eucharist, having desired those friends of his who were in town to communicate with him; namely, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Bishop of Exeter, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Reverend Dr. Busby; and Mr. Fell one of the Fellows of Eton, who continued with him all the time of his sickness. He took his last leave of them, and waited the hour of his release with great serenity and composure of mind (9).

Which may be thus tranſlated: Here lies RICHARD ALLESTREE, Regius Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford, Canon of Chriſt-Church, and Provoſt of this College of Eton; in the ſeparate diſcharge of which offices he diſcovered abilities ſuperior to the execution of them altogether; in diſputations invincible, an orator in the pulpit, ſkilful in the management of affairs, of great integrity and piety: he declined the epiſcopal character as induſtriouſly as others ſeek it; thinking it a more worthy employ to defend, inſtruct, and adorn the Church, than to govern it. Exhauſted at length with conſtant labour and ſtudy, this valuable man was taken away by too early a death, January 27, 1680, in the 60*th year of his age. In his lifetime he erected to himſelf a noble monument, in building from the ground at his own expence, the weſt ſide of the adjacent Quadrangle* (10). His heirs erected this ſmall monument to his memory.

[K] An extract of Dr. Alleſtry's character.] 'His mind, that nobler part of him, was compoſed by 'an extraordinary indulgence of nature; thoſe faculties, which in others uſe to be ſingle, and are 'thought neceſſarily to be ſo, were united in him. 'Memory, fancy, judgment, elocution, great modeſty and no leſs aſſurance, a comprehenſion of 'things and fluency of words; an aptneſs for the 'pleaſant, and ſufficiency for the rugged parts of 'knowledge; a courage to encounter, and an induſtry to maſter all things, make up the character 'of his happy genius. — From his firſt childhood he 'had a ſtrong impreſſion of piety, and the duties 'owed to God and men.——In his conſtitution he 'had a great deal of warmth and vigour, which made 'him apt to take fire upon provocation; but he was 'well aware of it, and kept a peculiar guard upon 'that weak part: ſo that his heat was reſerved for 'the great concerns of the honour of God, and the 'ſervice of his Prince and country, wherein he was 'altogether indefatigable, and in the moſt diſmal appearances of affairs would never deſert them, nor 'deſpair of their reſtauration. There was not in the 'world a man of clearer honeſty and courage; no 'temptation could bribe him to do a baſe thing, or 'terror affright him from the doing a good one. 'This made his friendſhips as laſting and inviolable 'as his life, without the dirty conſiderations of profit, 'or ſly reſerves of craft; not the pageantry of ceremonious addreſs, or cold civility; much leſs the 'ſervile falſeneſs of obſequious flattery.——His converſation was always chearful and entertaining, 'eſpecially in the reception of his acquaintance at 'his table, and friendly viſits.——He was exceeding 'tender of ſaying any thing that might adminiſter 'offence, or reflect upon any one's reputation.—— 'There was no perſon who more literally verified the 'ſaying of the Wiſe Man, that much ſtudy was a wearineſs of the fleſh. After his day's work, he 'was uſed to be as faint and ſpent, as if he had been 'labouring all the time with the ſcythe or flail; and 'his intention of thought made ſuch waſte upon his 'ſpirits, that he was frequently in hazard, while at 'ſtudy, to fall into a ſwoon, and forced to riſe from 'his ſeat and walk about the room for ſome time before he could recover himſelf.——His contempt of 'the world was very extraordinary, as in his large 'and conſtant charities, both by ſettled penſions to 'indigent perſons and families, and occaſional alms, 'ſo alſo his bounteous hoſpitality.——But the uncontroulable proof of contempt of the world, is, 'his dying poor; he having never during his life 'purchaſed an inch of ground, nor any annuity, or 'leaſe, to the value of a penny; nor did he take care 'to renew the patrimonial eſtate which he held by 'a leaſe for life (11).——His greateſt treaſure was 'his library, which was indeed a conſiderable one, 'both for the number of books and choice of them; 'but theſe he diſpoſed of by deed before his death to 'the univerſity of Oxford for the uſe of his ſucceſſors 'in the chair.——Though he hung thus looſe from 'the world, he neither was negligent in ſecular affairs, nor unſkilful in the managery of them; which 'was made manifeſt by his dextrous diſcharge of the 'private truſts committed to him in behalf of his 'dead friends, and the adminiſtration of his public 'employments. He was for ſeveral years treaſurer of 'Chriſt-Church, in a buſy time of their repairing the 'ruins made by the intruding uſurpers; and amidſt 'the neceſſary avocations of ſtudy, found leiſure for 'a full diſcharge of that troubleſome employment.— 'In the managery of the buſineſs of the chair of divinity, as he performed the ſcholaſtic part with 'great ſufficiency in exact and dextrous untying the 'knots of argument, and ſolid determination of controverted points, ſo he was not oppreſſed by the 'fame of any of his moſt eminent predeceſſors: his 'prudence was very remarkable in the choice of ſubjects to be treated on; for he waſted not time and 'opportunity in the barren inſignificant parts of 'ſchool-divinity, but inſiſted on the fundamental 'grounds of controverſy between the Church of England and the moſt formidable enemies thereof.— 'By his judicious care herein, though he found the 'univerſity in a ferment, and a great part of its 'growing hopes ſufficiently ſeaſoned with ill preposſeſſions, he ſo brought it to paſs, that during the 'whole tract of ſeventeen years that he held the 'chair, there was no factious bandying of opinions, 'nor petulant ſidings on account of them; which 'things diſturbed the peace of the laſt age, and 'helped forward to inflame thoſe animoſities, which 'ended in the execrable miſchiefs of the civil 'war (12).'

(11) It is proper to remark, that Dr. Alleſtry died a bachelor.

(12) Preface.

[L] He was a conſiderable benefactor to Eton-college.] The weſt ſide of the outward court of the college was built from the ground, and finiſhed, at Dr. Alleſtry's ſingle expence. And whereas, at his coming to Eton, he found the ſociety greatly in debt, by an ill cuſtom introduced by the late Republican Occupants, who at the year's end divided whatever money remained after the ordinary payments were made, incidental charges and debts contracted being ſtill thrown off to the future year; which in time grew to ſuch a bulk as endangered the college's becoming bankrupt: to remedy this evil, Dr. Alleſtry, by an exemplary retrenchment of his own dues, prevailed on the ſociety to do the like; inſomuch that, within a few years, the college paid off above a thouſand pound debt, and expended above two thouſand pounds which he found in a very low condition. There are extant Forty Sermons (r) [M] of Dr. Alleſtry's, whereof the greateſt part were preached before the King, and upon ſolemn occaſions. It is much to be regretted, that he could not be prevailed upon to publiſh his Lectures [N], which, when firſt delivered, were heard with the greateſt ſatisfaction and applauſe. Mr. Wood mentions a ſmall tract (s) written by Dr. Alleſtry, intitled, The Privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford in point of Viſitation, in a Letter to an honourable Perſonage (t) [O].

pounds in repairs. Another conſiderable ſervice he did the college and ſchool, as alſo King's college in Cambridge, whoſe ſeminary it is, was this; that whereas formerly the fellowſhips of Eton were generally diſpoſed of to perſons of foreign education, the King was pleaſed, at the inſtance of Dr. Alleſtry, joined with the petition of the Provoſt and Fellows of King's-college, to paſs a grant under the broad ſeal, that for the future five of the ſeven fellows ſhould be ſuch as had been educated at Eton-ſchool, and were fellows of King's-college (13).

[M] His ſermons.] The firſt eighteen ſermons in this collection were originally publiſhed on a charitable account. For his ingenious kinſman Mr. James Alleſtry the bookſeller (*), from a plentiful fortune being by the fire of London reduced to great poverty, Dr. Alleſtry, beſides other aſſiſtances, beſtowed upon him the copies of theſe eighteen ſermons, to make ſome reparation of his loſſes. Afterwards twenty-two more were added to them, being as many as were thought neceſſary to make up a volume. 'The 'variety of auditors (ſays my author) for whom they 'were firſt deſigned, makes them not to be all of 'the ſame fineneſs of ſpinning and cloſeneſs of tex-'ture: but in them all there will appear the ſame 'ſpirit of perſuaſive rhetoric and ardent piety, 'whereby though dead he yet ſpeaketh (14).'

[N] He could not be prevailed upon to publiſh his lectures.] Having, a little before his death, communicated to the Biſhop of Oxford ſeveral particulars concerning his intentions for the diſpoſal of his goods and papers; the Biſhop obſerved, that there was no mention made of his Lectures, and knowing how his modeſty, during his life, had reſiſted all importunities for the publiſhing of them, ſuſpected that the ſame motive might be more prevalent at his death: therefore he wrote to Dr. Alleſtry, requeſting that his Lectures might be preſerved, which had coſt him ſo much ſtudy and labour, and would be proportionably uſeful to others. The doctor's anſwer by letter bearing date January 19, 1680, was; That having not had opportunity to reviſe what he had written, which was not every where conſiſtent with his preſent imaginations, though in nothing material, yet in ſome particulars which he ſhould have better examined; eſpecially divers of the Act-Lectures, which being upon the ſame head, the thread of them was not right nor didactical, and Nectarius's Penitentiary, not expounded the ſame way in one place as in another, and the firſt blundering and not true: therefore he adds, that if the Biſhop had not writ, and for that he himſelf would not go out of the world without ſatisfying him in every thing, he had reſolved to have ſent for his papers and burnt them; but now he gave them up all to the Biſhop upon this inviolable truſt, that nothing of them ſhould be publiſhed as a ſcheme of his, but to be made uſe of to ſerve any other deſign the Biſhop ſhould think fit. Dr. Alleſtry's words are here tranſcribed, becauſe the plaineſt account of things is always the moſt ſatisfactory (15).

[O] A ſmall tract —— intitled, The Privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford, &c.] Upon the publication of this piece, William Prynne came out with his Univerſity of Oxford's Plea refuted, &c. and in anſwer to that R. Waryng wrote An Account of Mr. Prynne's Refutation, &c. and Mr. Bagſhaw ſenior publiſhed his Short Cenſure, &c. Mr. John Fell, one of the fellows of Eton-college, was by ſome taken to be the author of this pamphlet concerning the Univerſity's Privileges (16). B.

[A learned correſpondent hath obſerved, that in Dr. Alleſtry's Sermons, p. 92, 93. there is a long ſtory, from the 19th chapter of Mendez Pinto's Voyages, which the Doctor ſeems to have believed, and upon which he hath made ſuch remarks as ſhew his ignorance and credulity with regard to the matters there mentioned. Perhaps it may be urged in the Doctor's favour, that the error was as much the fault of the times as of the man; for a diſcerning and philoſophical ſpirit, in the diſquiſition both of natural phænomena and hiſtorical facts, had not then been greatly cultivated; and eſpecially among the generality of Divines. Notwithſtanding what is ſaid in the note [I], it is evident, from a compariſon of dates, that Dr. Alleſtry was nearly ſixty-one years of age, when he died.] K.

ALLESTRY (Jacob), a Poet [A] of the laſt century, was the ſon of James Alleſtry, a bookſeller of London, who loſt moſt of his ſubſtance in the dreadful fire, which happened there in the beginning of September 1666. He was educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, entered at Chriſt-church in Oxford in the Act-Term 1671, being then eighteen years of age, and the next year was elected ſtudent of that college. Afterwards he took the degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts, was Muſic-reader in 1679, and Terræ Filius in 1682; both which offices he executed with very great applauſe, being

What art thou, Love! whence are thoſe charms!
  That thus thou bear'ſt an univerſal rule!
For thee the ſoldier quits his arms,

In vain we chaſe thee from the field,
  And with cool thoughts reſiſt thy yoke:
Next tide of blood, alas! we yield,
  And all thoſe high reſolves are broke.

Can we e'er hope thou ſhould'ſt be true,
  Whom we have found ſo often baſe?
Cozen'd, and cheated, ſtill we view,
  And fawn upon the treacherous face.

In vain our nature we accuſe,

To get our likeneſs! what is that?
  Our likeneſs is but miſery:
Why ſhould I toil to propagate

He had alſo the chief hand (as Mr. Wood had been informed) in the Verſes and Paſtorals, which were ſpoken in the Theatre at Oxford, May 21, 1681, by Mr. William Savile, ſecond ſon of the Marquis of Halifax, and George Cholmondley, ſecond ſon of Robert Viſcount Kellis (both of Chriſt-church), before James Duke of York, his Ducheſs, and the Lady Anne. [B] He died.] This perſon, James Alleſtry (to uſe Mr. Wood's own words) being exceedingly given to the vices of Poets, his body was ſo emaciated and worn away by his juvenile extravagances, that he retired to an obſcure houſe in Fiſh-Row, in St. Thomas's Pariſh, in the ſuburbs of Oxford; where he continued incognito, under the care of a nurſe, about ſeven weeks, and then died in a poor condition, and of a loathſome diſtemper. His body was carried to its burial by four poor men (3). B.

ALLEY (WILLIAM), Biſhop of Exeter, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (a), was born at Great Wycomb in Buckinghamſhire, and educated at Eton-ſchool. He was removed from thence to King's-college in Cambridge in the year 1528, and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in that univerſity. Soon after, he went to Oxford, where he ſpent ſome time in academical ſtudies. Afterwards he married, was preſented to a benefice, and became a zealous Reformer. Upon Queen Mary's acceſſion to the Crown, he quitted his cure, and travelled from place to place in the north parts of England, where he was not known; gaining a comfortable ſubſiſtence for himſelf and his wife, by practiſing phyſic, and undertaking the inſtruction of youth. When Queen Elizabeth mounted the throne he came to London, where he acquired ſuch reputation by reading the Divinity Lecture at St. Paul's, that he obtained the biſhoprick of Exeter, and was conſecrated to that See, July 14, 1560. In November 1561, he was created Doctor of Divinity in the univerſity of Oxford. He wrote: 1. The Poor Man's Library, being a Rhapſody or Miſcellany in two volumes; the firſt containing ſeven Lectures upon the firſt Epiſtle of St. Peter, read publickly in St. Paul's cathedral in London, anno 1560; the ſecond conſiſting of five Lectures upon the ſame Epiſtle, read in the ſame place. Lond. 1571, fol. 2. An Hebrew Grammar: but whether it was ever printed is uncertain. When the verſion of the Bible was undertaken by the command of Queen Elizabeth, this Biſhop tranſlated the Pentateuch. He died the fifteenth of April 1570, and was buried at Exeter in the middle of the choir [A]. He left behind him one ſon, who was Archdeacon of Cornwall. [Three Epiſtles of Alley to Matthew Parker, in Latin, are preſerved in the Manuſcripts of Corpus Chriſti College, Cambridge. His Judgment concerning the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church has been publiſhed by Strype, in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth. Wood and Godwin agree in placing Biſhop Alley's death as ſtated above; but Tanner ſays, that it was on the 15th of April 1571, and Fuller carries it down ſo low as 1576 (b).]

ALLEYN (EDWARD) a celebrated Comedian in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, and King James I. and a laudable benefactor, by his charitable foundation of a college in the county of Surry; which flouriſhes with great improvements to this day. He was born of reputable parents, who lived in good faſhion and credit. There is a picture in the ſaid college, which has long paſſed for that of his father, with the age of fifty-nine inſcribed upon it. It is attired in the genteel garb of his time, but was indeed painted for his father-in-law; as a curious and ingenious member of the ſaid college has informed me (a). His father has been alſo reported to have had ſome eſtate in Yorkſhire: it is certain that his ſon died poſſeſſed of lands in that county, of his own purchaſing; as may be ſeen under his own hand (b). But he was born in the city of London; in the pariſh of St. Botolph, without Biſhopſgate, on the firſt day of September, anno 1566, as we collect from a memorandum of his own writing [A]; and more particularly according to Dr. Fuller, near Devonſhire-houſe, where now, ſays he, is the ſign of the Pye (c). The ſame author adds, that he was bred a Stage player; which is not improbable, though in his younger days his father might be in good circumſtances, if his ſon proved intractable to a more ſevere education, or ſerious courſe of life. For it does not appear, by what he has left of his writing, that he had ever engaged himſelf very deeply in ſcholaſtic ſtudies; though he was, as may be gathered from the ſeveral teſtimonies which have been given of him, a man of excellent natural parts; flexible genius, corporal agility, lively temper, faithful memory, fluent elocution; and in perſon, as appears by the picture preſerved of him (d), of a ſtately port and aſpect; all which might well induce a young man, to initiate and exert himſelf in that gay and popular profeſſion. And indeed, there are not wanting other authorities, whereby it ſeems to be confirmed, that he was engaged betimes in that vocation. For if before Chriſtopher Marloe, the Poet, died, Alleyn did not only act in ſeveral of his tragedies, but was [A] As we collect from a memorandum of his own writing.] This date is calculated from a note written with the ſaid founder's own hand, where he ſays, that, 'On the firſt of September, 1622, being the 'feaſt of his birth-day, he was full fifty-ſix years of 'age (1).' From whence might, and ſhould be rectified, the erroneous date of his age upon his tomb-ſtone; and alſo that, which ſeems to have been thence copied, upon his picture.

arrived to that ſuperlative degree, of being inimitable, or peerleſs therein; as it has been aſſerted in ſome verſes we ſhall preſently recite (e), it may be concluded, that Alleyn was upon the ſtage ſome time before the year 1592, in which year the ſaid Poet Marloe died; as it may be found among the manuſcript papers of the Lord Keeper Puckering, ſtill in being (f). For he had then ſo captivated the town, and ſo monopolized the favour of his audience, by thoſe agreeable varieties he could ſo readily command, in his voice, countenance, and geſture; and ſo judiciouſly adapt to the characters he played, as even to animate the moſt lifeleſs compoſitions, and ſo highly improve them, that he wholly engaged thoſe who heard and ſaw him, from conſidering the propriety of the ſentiments he pronounced, or of the parts he perſonated; and all the defects of the Poet were either beautified, palliated, or atoned for, by the perfections of the player. Thus much is intimated in a little curious tract, written by a noted ſatiriſt of thoſe times [B], and printed but the year following that beforementioned; as well as by the atteſtations of ſeveral ſucceeding authors. And not only in proſe but in poetry we find ſome very high commendations of him as an actor, by thoſe who alſo knew, and could beſt judge of him [C]. Thus have many writers for, and concerning the ſtage, beſtowed ſome fine general characters upon him, for his ſingular and eminent qualifications in that ſphere of life; but for any hiſtorical particulars of his own real and proper life, (which ſurely muſt have produced, in a man of his figure, fortune, public character, prudent œconomy, and long converſation with perſons of diſtinction, ſome worthy of preſervation) except what his foundations and endowments have, of themſelves, forced into public view and record; or may be gleaned from ſome detached notes and minutes he left of his own private affairs, it is much that none among thoſe, who were nearly concerned, and lived near enough in time, to have collected ſufficient materials, ever compiled ſome ſuch monument to his memory, as might have done juſtice to gratitude, ſervice to virtue, honour to their founder, credit to his profeſſion, and every other way have anſwered the expectations of the world. Some corporations indeed, have ſecreted the generous and exemplary acts of their founders

(f) In Biblioth. Harleiana.

[B] By a noted ſatiriſt of thoſe times, &c.] This was Thomas Naſhe; one of the moſt comical, bantering authors of his age; who having had ſeveral public controverſies with Dr. Gabriel Harvey, and his two brothers, of Saffron-Walden, the ſaid Doctor publiſhed a pamphlet (2), in which he expoſes that Thomas Naſhe, and his acquaintance Robert Greene very plentifully. Naſhe ſmartly replied upon him, in a tract, now grown very ſcarce; which contains many curious particulars, concerning ſeveral learned and ingenious men in thoſe days, and it was publiſhed the next year after Dr. Harvey's; who having had ſome epiſtolary correſpondence with Edmund Spenſer; this famous Poet uſed modeſtly to ſubſcribe himſelf at the end of his letters, Immerito; intimating, as if he thereby had acknowledged himſelf unworthy of the eſteem, or compliments, his ſaid correſpondent paid him. Naſhe turns this word upon the Doctor thus: 'Signior Immerito; ſo called, be-'cauſe he was, and is, his friend undeſervedly, was 'counterfeitly brought in, to play a part in that his 'enterlude of Epiſtles, that was hiſt at; thinking 'his very name, as the name of Ned Allen, on 'the common ſtage, was able to make an ill matter 'good (3).' Thus we ſee how early this our player was famous upon the Theatre. But he uſually played in the moſt excellent dramatic pieces; and even the capital parts in them. He certainly was one of the original actors in the renowned Shakeſpeare's plays; and of this Poet's writing, there were no leſs than twelve publicly known, and probably acted ſo early as 1598, as from certain contemporary writings it may be certified. In ſome of Ben Johnſon's plays he was alſo a principal performer; but what characters he perſonated in the plays of either of thoſe Poets, is difficult now diſtinctly to nominate, through the inaccuracy of their editors; who printed not the names of the players oppoſite to the characters they performed, as the modern cuſtom is; but either gave us one general liſt of actors to the whole ſet of plays, as in the old folio edition of Shakeſpeare; or divided one from the other; ſetting the Dramatis Perſonæ before the plays, and the catalogue of performers after them; as in Jonſon's (4). As to the diſtinction therefore of Mr. Alleyn's talents; all we can add, is from Dr. Fuller, and others, in a general manner. We are informed by him, that Alleyn 'made any part, eſpecially a 'Majeſtic one, become him (5):' for which, indeed, the portly and graceful figure of his perſon ſeemed well adapted. Another author ſays, 'He was an ornament both to Black-Friars, and to his profeſ-'ſion (6).' And, 'he was as well famous for his 'honeſty, as for his acting,' according to Sir Richard Baker (7). This laſt author, who had doubtleſs been a ſpectator and auditor of him on the ſtage, alſo calls Alleyn and Burbage, 'The beſt actors of 'our time;' and adds, 'What plays were ever ſo 'pleaſing, as where their parts had the greateſt 'part (8)!' And in another more noted work of his, joining our Edward Alleyn with Richard Burbage again, he ſays, 'They were two ſuch actors as no 'age muſt ever look to ſee the like (9).'

If Rome, ſo great, and in her wiſeſt age,
Fear'd not to boaſt the glories of her ſtage;
As, ſkilful Roſcius, and great Æſop; men,
Yet, crown'd with honours, as with riches, then;
Who had no leſs a trumpet to their name
Than Cicero; whoſe ev'ry breath was fame:
How can ſo great example die in me,
That Alleyn, I ſhou'd pauſe to publiſh thee?
Who, both their graces, in thyſelf, haſt more Outſtrip'd, than they did all who went before.
And, preſent worth, in all, doſt ſo contract,
As others ſpake, but only thou doſt act.
Wear this renown: 'tis juſt, that who did give

Alſo Thomas Heywood before mentioned, who both wrote for, and acted on the ſtage; ſetting forth in print, an old play of Marloe's, has, in his prologue thereto, ſpoken of that poet, and this player, as follows:

We know not how our play may paſs this ſtage:
But by the beſt of Poets in that age,
The Malta Jew had being, and was made;
And he, then, by the beſt of actors play'd.
In Hero and Leander (11), one did gain
A laſting memory: in Tamerlane, from publication; and we hear too often, that the ſuperintendents of other charitable inſtitutions have preſcribed themſelves alſo a rule of reſervation as to thoſe particulars; and choſe rather to bury in oblivion all honours which might be paid to their donors, than hazard the cenſure, or ſuſpicion, of being unproportionable partakers of the donation: and therefore may have ſhown themſelves averſe to the encouragement of any ſuch memorialiſts as were ambitious of tranſmitting the merits of their benefactors, in the moſt efficacious manner to poſterity. In ſome of thoſe communities, the miſ-application of ſuch public charities has been ingeniouſly reflected on by Mr. Selden (g); as the ſhyneſs of ſuch communication has been cenſured, the ill conſequences diſplayed, and the cauſes detected by others (b). And thus much upon that topic is the rather obſerved in this place, becauſe as we are made moſt ſenſible of the virtue or value of ſome things, by a knowledge of their oppoſites, ſo the dark conduct in thoſe ſocieties, may ſerve here as a foil, to heighten the luſtre of that at Dulwich College, founded by this our famous Player, Edward Alleyn. For by the uſeful anecdotes and other material pieces of intelligence, which have been moſt candidly and obligingly imparted to us, out of the founder's own papers, and other antiquities in his college, we have been much aſſiſted, to clear the ſaid founder from that obſcurity in which he has been ſo long clouded, diſcharge him of ſome miſrepreſentations wherewith he has been unjuſtly diſguiſed, and produce him in a fairer and ſtronger light, at leaſt than he has yet appeared in, to the public. To this end, we have been principally deſirous of learning, by what means the ſaid founder was enabled, or was ſufficiently enriched, to undergo the expence of erecting ſuch a commodious edifice, and ſo liberally to endow it, for the handſome and decent maintenance of ſo many perſons. And thus much we may gather in anſwer to that queſtion; that beſides ſome paternal inheritance, whatever it was, which might deſcend to him, and lay ſome foundation to his future affluence; it is preſumed, that the benefits he made even by acting of plays, muſt, to a man of his provident and managing genius, and one who drew ſuch numerous audiences to the plays he acted in, being accounted the Protodramatiſt of his time, have alſo conſiderably improved his fortune. But he was not only an actor of plays; he was likewiſe maſter of a playhouſe of his own building, and over a company of players of his own conſtituting [D], by which he is ſaid to have amaſſed no ſmall treaſure. He was alſo keeper of the King's wild beaſts, or maſter of the royal bear-garden (i); either one or both of thoſe ſituated on the bank-ſide in Southwark; for there were two, which ſeem to have been reſorted to by great numbers of ſpectators (k): and the profits which accrued from theſe rough games, are reported to have amounted ſometimes to no leſs than five hundred pounds per annum. But a little before his death, he ſold his ſhare and patent, as we are informed, to his laſt wife's father, for five hundred and fourſcore pounds (l). But matrimony itſelf has often empowered men, ſo diſpoſed, to perform as expenſive acts of liberality; and he was twice or three times married [E], to women, whoſe dowries, they leaving no iſſue to inherit, might probably contribute to the charge of

[D] Maſter of a play-houſe of his own building; and a company of players, &c.] This was the Fortune Play-houſe near Whitecroſs-Street, by Moor-Fields, which Mr. Alleyn built, or perhaps rebuilt; for there is mention made by Mr. Prynne, of the fearful burning to the ground of the Fortune Play-houſe (13), by ſome unknown accident; and alſo of its being lately re-edified and enlarged (14). There is a tradition in the neighbourhood where this theatre ſtood (on the ground whereof the founder's ſucceſſors have built many tenements) that in demoliſhing the old houſe, or digging to lay the foundation of the new one, which was rebuilt in its place, there was found a conſiderable treaſure of money. If this happened while Mr. Alleyn was proprietor there, it might fall, or the greateſt part of it, to him. There is an author who ſpeaks of him and this houſe in theſe words: 'He was maſter of a company of his own, for whom 'he built the Fortune Play-houſe from the ground; 'a large round brick building (15);' and a little further, that herein, as in others of their Play-houſes, 'They always acted by day-light (16).' And at this time, as well as long after, they had neither women actors, nor ſcenes. For, upon Sir William Davenant's firſt opening, by virtue of his patent, the Duke of York's Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-fields, in the ſpring of the year 1662, with one of his own plays, the Siege of Rhodes, then ſcenes made their firſt appearance upon the Engliſh ſtage (17); and about the ſame time, ſeemingly alſo by him, were actreſſes firſt introduced; and they grew ſo expert, not only in their own parts, but thoſe of the actors, that before the end of King Charles the Second's reign, ſome plays (and particularly the Parſon's Wedding) were repreſented all by women; as in his father's reign, and before, they were all by men (18). When the Fortune Play-houſe was in vogue, there were four more companies, which all got money, and lived in reputation. And one of my authors laſt quoted, to the queſtion, How five companies could then be maintained by the town, when in his time two could hardly ſubſiſt? anſwers, 'That though 'the town was then, perhaps, not much more than 'half ſo populous as now; yet then the prices were 'ſmall, there being no ſcenes, and better order kept 'among the company that came; which made very 'good people think a play an innocent diverſion for 'an idle hour or two; the plays themſelves being 'then more inſtructive and moral. Whereas of late 'the play-houſes are ſo extremely peſtered with vizard-maſks, and their trade, occaſioning continual 'quarrels and abuſes, that many of the more civilized 'part of the town are uneaſy in the company, and 'ſhun the Theatre, as they would a houſe of ſcandal. 'It is an argument of the worth of the plays, and 'actors of the laſt age; and eaſily inferred, that they 'were much beyond ours in this; to conſider, that 'they could ſupport themſelves merely from their 'own merit, the weight of the matter, and goodneſs of the action; without ſcenes and machines: 'Whereas the preſent plays, with all their ſhew, 'can hardly draw an audience; unleſs there be the 'additional invitation of a Signior Fideli, a Monſieur L'Abbé, or ſome ſuch foreign regale expreſſed in the bottom of the bills (19).'

[E] He was twice or three times married.] They have had a conſtant tradition at Dulwich-college, that the founder had three wives: but among their records, they can find only the names of the two laſt. The former of theſe was named Joan Woodward, and ſhe was the daughter of that gentleman whoſe portrait before mentioned, has been miſtaken for the founder's father's. There is a ſeal-ring upon one of his fingers, which, on a curious inſpection, made by the gentleman of this benefaction. Thus the means by which he was enabled to eſtabliſh it, might be derived from various ſources. But for the motives to this eminent act of beneficence, we have good reaſon to believe, they have been much miſgrounded, or derived from a very falſe and fooliſh pretence, greatly detracting from their true deſerts. For to whom ſhould this humane, charitable, and pious foundation be aſcribed, as it has with moſt injurious abſurdity been related, but, in effect, to the Devil [F]! But this idle tradition has been ſufficiently refuted, in the animadverſions it has occaſioned below. And man in that college who has obliged us with this information, diſcovered to him the miſtake; for he found it to contain the ſame coat of arms with that of the founder's ſaid wife, which is impaled with his own, upon his tomb, viz. In the firſt coat, he bears argent; a Chevron, between three Cinquefoils, Gules: In the ſecond coat; ſhe bears Gules; a Lion Paſſant, Or; on a chief Azure; Fleurs-de-Lys of the ſecond. It alſo appears among ſome of the founder's memorandums, that he was married to this wife on the 22d day of October 1592. They lived above thirty years in harmony together; and when ſhe died, on the 28th of June 1623, aged fifty-one years, he directed, in the memorials of her, which he cauſed to be inſcribed upon her tomb, &c. that ſhe ſhould be called, his religious and loving wife (20). His laſt wife, who ſurvived him, was Conſtance, the daughter of that Mr. Hinchtoe, to whom the founder ſold, a little before his death, his ſhare and patent of the bear-garden, as is above obſerved in the text. There appears alſo upon one of the organ-pipes in the college chapel, the founder's arms, impaled with another coat, viz. Azure; a Wolf Rampant, Ermin; which is very probably ſuppoſed to belong to the family of Hinchtoe (21).

[F] To whom ſhould this pious foundation be aſcribed, &c. but, in effect to the Devil.] My author, Mr. Aubrey; or his editor; but it may be rather thought the former, who ſo much laid open his own credulity himſelf (22), that there needs no more be ſaid of it; ſpeaking of Dulwich-college, founded by Mr. Alleyn, ſays, 'The tradition was, that playing a dæmon, with ſix others, in one of Shake-'ſpear's plays; he was, in the midſt of the play, ſurpriſed by an apparition of the devil; which ſo 'worked on his fancy, that he made a vow, which 'he performed at this place (23).' Enquiring once of the oldeſt actor of our time, the late Mr. John Bowman, what he had heard, or thought of this ſtory, he pleaſantly anſwered to this effect: That we had been pretty even with the father of lies, in having ſo often belied him with frequenting of plays; for he thought it very inconſiſtent with any probability, that the devil ſhould make his perſonal appearance at the play-houſe, and never go into the boxes, but always expoſe himſelf on the ſtage; and then, only to diſconcert his humble imitators in a dance; thump the muſic out of tune with his cow heels; make the people's hair ſtand an end, and drive them away in confuſion; before they had made any aſſignation for their leſs innocent entertainments: and ſo make his friends curſe him for his unſeaſonable diſturbance, worſe than ever his enemies did. Then, as for this fooliſh tradition in particular, it had made the devil ſuch an egregious fool, as to frighten a man out of a vain courſe of life into a religious one! where he draws a train after him, from generation to generation, out of a deſtitute, or perhaps diſorderly courſe, and teaches them to attach themſelves to the love of God, and renounce the Devil himſelf and all his works! Surely, he never was ſuch a wretched politician, as to conſpire ſo againſt his own intereſt, the diminution of his own votaries; as many might otherwiſe have been; and thereby, if he ſhould make a practice of ſuch plots, the deſtruction of his own kingdom of darkneſs! If the Devil has, by this tradition, ſuffered in his character, the inconſiſtence of it, may, upon theſe conſiderations, clear him from being maſter Alleyn's prompter to good works; and ſuggeſt to us, ſome more ſublime motive to his making this oblation of his fortune to the ſervice of God, than being terrified to it, by any apparition of the Devil.——But, let us look into matter of fact, and we ſhall find maſter Alleyn no ways concerned in, or affected with this tradition. The ſtory was ſtale, long before he left the ſtage. It ſeems to have ſome little relation to a play that was acted in Queen Elizabeth's time; but no play of Shakeſpeare's; therefore the account in Mr. Aubrey is faulty. The firſt hint we have met with of it, is, in an old pamphlet printed in the beginning of her ſucceſſor's reign; wherein Lucifer, prowling about the town in diſguiſe, meets with a Debauchee in a houſe of ill-repute; of whom giving ſome deſcription, he ſays, 'He had a head of hair, like one 'of my devils in Doctor Fauſtus; when the old the-'atre cracked, and frighted the audience (24).' Here the audience appear to have been more alarmed by the cracking of the old houſe, while ſome harmleſs devils were performing their parts in that play, than by any ſupernumerary devil appearing in it; but if there was one, we may account naturally enough for that. Mr. Prynne makes a great enlargement upon this narrow ground; but as he quotes no authority, and diſagrees in the playhouſe where it happened, he is exceptionable too; where he mentions, 'The viſible apparition of the Devil upon 'the ſtage at the Bell-Savage playhouſe, in Queen 'Elizabeth's days, to the great amazement both of 'the actors and ſpectators, whilſt they were there, 'profanely playing the hiſtory of Fauſtus; the truth 'of which, I have heard from many now alive, who 'well remember it; there being ſome diſtracted with 'that fearful ſight (25).' So that the Devil appeared in one of Shakeſpeare's plays, as we find in Aubrey; and in a play that was not one of his, according to the Black Book; and in a playhouſe that was not the Old Houſe, according to Prynne: But ſtill in Queen Elizabeth's days; and no mention made of Mr. Alleyn by either of theſe two laſt authors, who both mention the event, and lived in his own time. Nor is it to be believed that ever any ſuch tradition was ſubſiſting of Mr. Alleyn, when Mr. Prynne was accumulating his ſaid unwieldy bundle of invectives againſt ſtage-players: For as he was many years ſcraping up materials, and buſying himſelf in them, he could not have been ignorant of ſuch an extraordinary incident; nor would he have been ſilent, in what might have ſo directly ſerved his purpoſe; but would, to be ſure, have made a triumphant example of ſuch a notable convert. In the reign of King Charles II. the town was alarmed again with ſuch another viſitation, as the aforeſaid Mr. Bowman has alſo informed me; and, I think it was at the houſe in Dorſet-Gardens; where in a dance of devils again, there appeared one too many; ſome comical fellow among the comedians, having got into ſuch a horrid dreſs, as made him a much more infernal figure than the reſt, and ſo unexpectedly ſtarted up among them, that they took him for the Devil indeed, were ſtruck with a kind of panic, which ſoon infected the audience, and diſperſed it in conſternation. And after the like manner, may all the other apparitions of the Devil on the ſtage be probably accounted for. But laſtly, to put it beyond all doubt, that the Devil never appeared in any play, or any playhouſe, that deterred Mr. Alleyn from repairing to them; or that he was, by any other cauſe or means, induced to withdraw or abſtain from them, even to the latter part of his life; we find he reſorted to, and carried on the buſineſs of his own playhouſe in London, even after he had built, and was ſettled in his college at Dulwich; and this is to be proved by no leſs authority than a memorandum he left written in his own hand; wherein it appears, that having one day received the profits of a play acted in that houſe, at which there was a very ſlender audience, he entered it down, that his whole receipt amounted to no more than three pounds and ſome odd ſhillings (26).

Theſe idle ſtories, the reſult of weakneſs and ſuperſtition, are occaſionally revived, and applied to different perſons and times. It hath juſtly been remarked to us, that it is abſurd to ſuppoſe that Alleyn ſhould have played the dumb part of a Dæmon.] K.

we are perſuaded, if the author who fathered it upon Mr. Alleyn, had been in any degree converſant with his private papers, he would have found reaſon to attribute this dedication of his ſubſtance to the poor, not to any ſudden turn of mind, but to a conſtituent principle, maturely ſettled and grounded upon the ſtrongeſt baſis of piety and benevolence. For therein he appears, by many expreſſions, a man who had been habituated to devotion; ſo that, when he came to town about his ſecular affairs, he would, as if it were the chief part of his buſineſs, make it in his way to call at ſome church or other, and partake of the divine ſervice (m). The ſtage, therefore, was ſo far from having preſented any cauſe of remorſe, that it ſeems to have rather proved a ſchool of religion to him; where he had imitated imaginary characters of virtue, till he determined, now providence had enabled him, to become himſelf imitable in real ones. And we may conclude, by the ejaculations he makes, acknowledging ſo devoutly, cordially, and conſtantly, as at the ends of his quarterly accounts, &c. all he was poſſeſſed of to be the Gift of God (n), that he had deliberately reſolved upon the moſt grateful and acceptable ways of reſtoring it, through the hands of innocent and indigent men. He reſolved alſo, as we ſee by the event, to make himſelf an uncommon example, in preferring time preſent, and not poſtponing the execution of his deſign. It adds a great luſtre to the act, that it was not truſted to the hearts, hands, and eyes of others; that it was not left to poſthumous direction, but performed by himſelf, while he was in health and ſtrength, and before he was forty-eight years of age. He well knew that the value of a gift is then greateſt, when made in the life of the giver. Hence, he was under a neceſſity of withdrawing from the leſſer ſtage, that he might perform the part he had caſt off for himſelf, upon the great and real theatre of the open world. If any ſecondary motives were to be admitted, they might ariſe from the thoughts of being a leading pattern, the firſt of his profeſſion, who had adorned his country with ſuch a monument of munificence; or from the hopes of inſpiring an emulation in ſome theatrical deſcendants or other, who might be as fortunate as himſelf, in like manner to advance their character and calling into higher repute; or from ſeveral other inducements. But from his motives, let us proceed to his execution of this work. He began the building of his college at Dulwich in Surry, on the borders of Kent, about five miles ſouthward of London-bridge, after the deſign and direction of Mr. Inigo Jones, who was a witneſs to his deed of ſettlement, ſo early, that it appears to have been in ſome forwardneſs in 1614, the year in which he is commonly thought to have firſt ſet about it; as we learn, with other particulars of this College at Dulwich, from one of his own acquaintance, who has given the firſt printed account of it [G]. It has been preſumed, that eight or ten thouſand pounds were expended by him upon this college, chapel, &c. before the buildings and gardens were finiſhed, which was about the year 1617; for then he began (o), on the twenty-ninth of September, [G] Particulars of this College at Dulwich, from one of his own acquaintance, who has given the firſt printed account of it.] This is Mr. Edward Howes, who, in his edition and augmentation of Stowe's Chronicle, having given ſome account of Mr. Sutton's hoſpital, which may be perceived to be written in the middle of the year 1614, by his mentioning the death of Henry (Howard) Earl of Northampton, proceeds in theſe words: 'Edward Allen, 'alias Allein, of Dulwich, Eſq; at this time build-'ed a very fair hoſpital at Dulwich in Surrey, for 'ſix poor men, and ſix poor women, and for twelve 'poor children, from the age of four to ſix, to be 'there kept and maintained, and taught, till they 'come to the age of fourteen or ſixteen years; their 'ſchoolmaſter to have his diet, lodging, and a 'competent ſtipend. He intends alſo to have a 'maſter to reſide in the ſame hoſpital, whoſe name 'ſhall be Allen, or Alleyne; and by that name, to 'be choſen to that government of his hoſpital for 'ever; as the place ſhall grow vacant. This ſaid 'founder told me, that he intends, and alſo forth-'with, to build thrice twelve poor folks lodgings (*) 'in London, viz. Twelve lodgings, or rooms, in 'three ſeveral pariſhes; and give unto every of them 'ſome maintenance. Within two years, this houſe 'will be finiſhed, and the poor in poſſeſſion; and 'then there is more to be ſaid of it: in the mean 'time, thus much deſerves thanks and memory (27).' For it is, as this author above deſcribes, a very fair hoſpital; containing the chapel, maſter's apartments, &c. in the front, and the lodgings of the other inhabitants, &c. in the two wings; whereof that on the eaſt ſide was handſomely new built, in 1739, at the expence of the college. They have a little library of books; and had a good collection of plays given by old Mr. William Cartwright, an excellent comedian, and acquaintance of the founder's; who was alſo a bookſeller, and lived at the end of Turnſtile-alley by Lincoln's-Inn-Fields (28). He publiſhed the learned Vindication of Actors, hereafter quoted, written by Thomas Heywood, Fellow of Peter-houſe, Cambridge; who was alſo a noted actor, and was concerned in writing two hundred and twenty plays, as we have it under his own pen (29). He had long before publiſhed that vindication himſelf, under a title ſomewhat different (30), for which he was called the Atlas of the ſtage; and having improved and enlarged it, it was ſoon after his death publiſhed, by the ſaid Mr. Cartwright, without date, but in Oliver's time, as we take it; by the diſcouragements mentioned of his profeſſion, in his dedication, under the two firſt letters of his name, to Henry Marquis of Dorcheſter. But to return: not far from the library, there is in the weſt wing, a long gallery full of pictures; the beſt of which were thoſe left by the Founder himſelf; and to theſe were added alſo Mr. Cartwright's collections, and among them a curious picture of London, from a view ſaid to be taken by Mr. John Norden, the Topographer, in 1603, with the repreſentation of the City-proceſſion on the Lord-Mayor's day (31). The founder's picture is at full length, in a robe or gown; but the reſemblance of his face is ſaid to have been drawn when he lay dead in his coffin. There is a portrait alſo of his former wife; beſides Mary Queen of Scots, Henry Prince of Wales, Sir Thomas Greſham (32), and both the Cartwrights, elder and younger, with many other perſons of note; as appears by an old catalogue preſerved of them: but the little pictures of the Kings of England are, I think, diſcreetly enough hung in no very good light. It has been formerly publiſhed (33), what the ſalaries were, and what the allowance of the poor men and women; which we do not repeat, becauſe as the revenue is conſiderably increaſed, the ſalaries and allowances are ſo likewiſe.

(*) They were alms-houſes, for twenty poor people, as he appointed in his Will. See note [L]. And they were afterwards increaſed to thirty.

to keep a Diary of all ſuch collegiate accounts, proceedings, and occurrences, or other perſonal and domeſtic affairs, as might aſſiſt his memory, by recurring to any paſt particulars he had regiſtered, or adminiſter hints in his mind, of making future regulations in his plan or model of that fellowſhip or ſociety, he was now incorporating to participate of his Chriſtian hoſpitality. And in leaving that Diary behind him, he gave his ſucceſſors opportunity of ſeeing, not only how the ſettlement began, but, by noting down ſo many little events, tranſactions, and obſervations, alſo of better ſeeing how he was pleaſed with the progreſs that was made, and what his inclinations were in carrying the government on, than if he had left them, without ſuch experience, an whole volume of meditations on the ſubject. After the founder had built this college, he met with ſome difficulties in obtaining a charter for ſettling his lands in mortmain; that he might more abſolutely endow it, as he propoſed, with eight hundred pounds per annum; for the ſupport and maintenance of one Maſter, one Warden, and four Fellows; three of whom were to be Eccleſiaſtics, and the other a ſkilful Organiſt; alſo ſix poor men, as many women, beſides twelve poor boys; to be educated in good literature, till the age of fourteen or ſixteen years, and then put forth to honeſt trades and callings. That obſtruction aroſe from the Lord ChancellorBacon; who would have had King James ſettle part of thoſe lands for the ſupport of two academical lectures, which were then propoſed to be founded by two of his friends; and he wrote a letter to the Marquis of Buckingham, dated from York-houſe in the Strand, Auguſt 18, 1618, intreating him to perſuade his Majeſty to that purpoſe [H]. But, at length, Mr. Alleyn's benefaction was allowed to be made entirely in his own way; and it appeared ſo above competition and objection, that it obtained the royal licence, and he had full power and liberty given him to eſtabliſh his foundation, by his Majeſty's letters patent, under the Great Seal, bearing date at Weſtminſter, the twenty-firſt of June 1619 (p); by virtue whereof, Maſter Alleyn did, in the chapel of the ſaid new hoſpital at Dulwich, called The College of God's Gift, on the thirteenth of September following, publickly and audibly read and publiſh one writing quadrupartite in parchment, dated the ſaid day and year; whereby he created, eſtabliſhed, and confirmed the ſaid college, according to the power and authority above (q). When he had read and publiſhed the ſaid writing, he ſubſcribed it with his name, and fixed his ſeal to every part of the quadrupartite writing, in the preſence of many honourable perſons; and then ordered thoſe writings to four ſeveral pariſhes [I]. [H] Intreating him to perſuade his Majeſty to that purpoſe.] This letter written by the ſaid Lord Chancellor Bacon, to the Marquis of Buckingham, is as follows:

'I Now write to give the King an account of a patent I have ſtayed at the ſeal. It is of licence, to give in mortmain eight hundred pound land, though it be of tenure in chief, to Allen that was the player, for an hoſpital. I like well, that Allen playeth the laſt act of his life ſo well; but if his majeſty give way thus to amortize his tenures, his courts of wards will decay; which I had well hoped ſhould improve. But that which moved me chiefly, is, that his majeſty, now lately, did abſolutely deny Sir Henry Savile (34), for 200*l.* and Sir Edward Sandys (*), for 100*l.* to the perpetuating of two lectures; the one in Oxford, the other in Cambridge; foundations of ſingular honour to his majeſty, and of which there is great want; whereas hoſpitals abound, and beggars abound never a whit the leſs. If his majeſty do like to paſs the book at all; yet, if he would be pleaſed to abridge the 800*l.* to 500*l.* and then give way to the other two books for the univerſity, it were a princely work: and I would make an humble ſuit to the King, and deſire your Lordſhip to join in it, that it might be ſo (35).'

There was a remark made on this letter, by the firſt editor of it, with ſome others of the ſaid Lord Bacon's, which is here tranſplanted in this edition, to the bottom of the page; part whereof, which concerns the ſaid letter, is as follows: 'It were to be 'wiſhed this obſervation did not hold true to this 'day: for though the foundations of hoſpitals are 'to be commended, which Sir Francis Bacon hath 'done, both in this letter (36), and other his writ'ings (37), yet it ſhews that ſome more adequate 'remedy for ſupporting the poor, than what ariſes 'from theſe charities, or even from the laws enacted 'for their relief, was then, and yet is to be deſired. 'And as the defect thereof is no ſmall reproach to 'the government of a country, happy in its natural 'product, and enriched by commerce; ſo it would 'be an act of the greateſt humanity, to provide for 'the poor; and that idleneſs and beggary, the ſuc'ceſſive nurſery of rogues, might as far as poſſible 'be extirpated (38).'

equality in it, may be gathered from the words of one of his contemporaries and acquaintance; who, ſpeaking of ſome eminent players deceaſed, goes on thus: 'Among 'ſo many dead, let me not forget the moſt worthy, famous Mr. Edward Alleyn, who 'in his life-time erected a college at Dulwich, for poor people, and for education of 'youth. When this college was finiſhed, this famous man was ſo equally mingled 'with humility and charity, that he became his own Penſioner; humbly ſubmitting 'himſelf to that proportion of diet and cloaths, which he had beſtowed on others (r).' And how perfectly ſatisfied he was with this diſtribution and ſettlement of his ſubſtance, may plainly appear, by this memorial of his own writing, which is preſerved among his papers, ——— 'May 26, 1620, my wife and I acknowledged the fine at the Com-'mon-Pleas Bar, of all our lands to the College: Bleſſed be God, that hath given us life 'to do it (s).' Many other like circumſtances might be picked out of his papers and his Diary aforeſaid, which might farther confirm, if it were needful, his hearty benevolence to this work; which Diary ending on the twenty-ninth of September 1622, comprehended juſt five years (t). We are informed alſo, that there remains no book of his account after that time. His wife, with whom he had ſo long affectionately lived, died about ſix months after, in the year 1623, as is before obſerved; and he might find it inconvenient, as the college had been uſed to the inſpection and government in ſome part or degree alſo of a miſtreſs, to live the remainder of his life a widower; for we find that within about a year or two afterwards, he married his laſt wife Conſtance *. Some improbable ſtories have been raiſed upon this occaſion; but the ſlighteſt conſideration of them will ſhew their falſehood [K]. That ſhe was well pleaſed with the courſe of life he had preferred, and lived with him, alſo, for the ſhort time they lived together, in conjugal harmony, appears probable from the ſums of money he left her in his will, beſides jewels, &c. as may be ſeen in the extract thereof, here ſubjoined [L]. [K] But the ſlighteſt conſideration of them will ſhew their falſehood.] 'Tis ſaid in a work (before quoted) whether by the author, or his editor, is not diſtinguiſhed, that, 'Notwithſtanding all the ſolemnity 'of this deodand, the founder lived to change his 'mind, upon a ſecond marriage; when he was very 'deſirous of revoking his charity, but was not 'ſuffered. In his original endowment he has excluded all other augmentation, from future benefactions; and has conſtituted the church-wardens 'of St. Giles's without Cripplegate, St. Mary-'Overy's, and St. Botolph's Biſhopgate, viſitors; 'who, upon any diſagreement, which they cannot 'compromiſe, are referred to their dernier reſort, 'the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (40).' As to that aſſertion of his revoking; it appears nothing more than an envious or malicious ſuggeſtion, for which there is no authority produced, or to be found. And there appears enough by what has been already ſaid, and what hereafter follows by the founder himſelf, in his own Will, which was made ſome time after his marriage, and not a fortnight before his death; that he was ſo far from ever having had any thoughts of repenting or revoking his charity, that he appears there, augmenting it to his laſt moments. And as for his excluding all other augmentation; 'There 'is no ſuch thing to be found or intimated in his 'ſtatutes; indeed he had thereby excluded himſelf 'from all power of making any additional members, 'or augmenting them, their number being fixed 'and limited, both by the letters patent, and the 'deed of incorporation; as the late Lord Chancellor 'King expounded and decreed, in a trial concern-'ing the members of the ſaid college (*).' But as to what the late Sir John Lade has been heard to report; it is much more incredible, and impoſſible, than any other tale, which has been ever ſpread of the Founder. As if, 'after he had appointed him-'ſelf to be the firſt maſter of his own college, and 'reſtrained all the maſters by ſtatute to be unmarried, 'he ſhould alter his own reſolution of celibacy, and 'therefore was, upon his marriage, deprived of his 'office by Archbiſhop Abbot; to whom, when 'Archbiſhop Laud ſucceeded, being better ſkilled in 'civil and canon-law, he, declaring that no found-'er could commit any offence againſt ſtatutes of 'his own deviſing, did, as ſoon as poſſible, reſtore 'him (41).' But the founder could make no reſolution of celibacy, being married when he made the ſtatutes; nay, the firſt Maſter and Warden he choſe himſelf, and were his ſucceſſors, were married men: ſo that the miſapplication of that ſtory to the founder, might ariſe from the objection therefore made to them by the ſociety; but it was over-ruled by the Viſitor, and the Archbiſhop himſelf. But chronology will quite clear the founder of ſuch expulſion and reſtoration; for Laud was not Archbiſhop of Canterbury till September, in the year 1633, which is almoſt ſeven years after the death of maſter Alleyn.

And after his juſt debts paid, ſo ſpeedily as may be, after his deceaſe, he, the ſaid Edward Alleyn and Matthias Alleyn, a perſon by him put in truſt, for and in aſſurance of one thouſand five hundred pounds, to and for his dear and loving wife, Conſtance Alleyn, after his death, have by two ſeveral deeds dated the 29th of June laſt, ſet over unto Sir Nicholas Carew of Beddington, and Sir Thomas (43) Crymes of Peckham in Surry, Knights, &c. One capital meſſuage, or inn, called the Unicorn, in St. Saviour's pariſh in Southwark, in the county of Surrey, and all other meſſuages and tenements there: and alſo certain tenements called the Barge, the Bell, and the Cock, on the bank-ſide, in St. Saviour's pariſh aforeſaid. He was buried in the chapel of his own college; and has a tomb-ſtone over his grave on which there is an inſcription, which, with the other monumental inſcriptions in memory of him, his wife, &c. having already, in what was material, been made uſe of, we refer thoſe who are farther inquiſitive after them, to the author by whom they are printed (w). As for the inſcription over the door, which we have before alſo cited, it was written by Mr. James Hume, late Schoolmaſter of the college, and is alſo printed in the author laſt referred to, and concludes with theſe words; Beatus ille qui miſertus eſt Pauperum: Abi tu, & fac ſimiliter.

And in teſtimony of his further love to his wife, leaves her for her preſent uſe, one hundred pounds more, which he had already, on the 26th of September laſt, delivered for her to Sir T. Crymes; and gives her moreover, all her jewels and other ornaments, whereof ſhe is poſſeſſed. Item, He gives to the corporation of God's Gift-college, his ſeal-ring with his arms, to be worn by the maſter and his ſucceſſors; and appoints a common ſeal to be made for the college; both to be repaired by the college as oft as they need; alſo all his books and inſtruments, with the pictures, hangings, and other furniture therein. And all the furniture in the twelve poor ſcholars chambers, together with ſeveral parcels and ſets of his own houſehold linen, and other utenſils; all the implements of huſbandry, and two teems of horſes and oxen. Item, He wills that his executors, within two years after his deceaſe, ſhould build ten alms-houſes in the pariſh of St. Botolph without Biſhopſgate, London, for ten poor people of that pariſh, to be members of the aforeſaid college; and likewiſe, ten other houſes in St. Saviour's pariſh in Southwark aforeſaid, for other ten poor people of that pariſh, to be likewiſe members of the ſaid college; which ſaid twenty poor people being placed in their ſeveral houſes ſhall have ſuch maintenance, as in the ſtatutes of the foreſaid college is appointed. Item, He gives to Thomas Alleyn, the ſon of John Alleyn, late of Willen, in the county of Bucks, being his couſin, and next heir at common law, 50*l.* Item, To Edward Alleyn, jun. of Newport, 20*l.* and to his two ſiſters, Elizabeth Newman, and Anne Aſhpoole, 20*l.* a-piece. [The ſubjoined anecdote is entertaining in itſelf, and ſhews the high eſteem in which Mr. Alleyn was held as an actor: 'Edward Alleyn, the Garrick 'of Shakeſpeare's time, had been on the moſt 'friendly footing with our poet, as well as Ben 'Johnſon. They uſed frequently to ſpend their 'evenings together at the ſign of the Globe, ſome-'where near Black Friars, where the playhouſe 'then was. The world need not be told, that the 'convivial hours of ſuch a triumvirate muſt be pleaſ-'ing as well as profitable, and may truly be ſaid to 'be ſuch pleaſures as might bear the reflections of 'the morning. In conſequence of one of theſe 'meetings, the following letter was written by 'G. Peel, a Fellow of Chriſt-church college, Ox-'ford, and a dramatic poet, who belonged to the 'club, to one Marle, an intimate of his:

"Friend Marle,

"I Muſt deſyre that my ſyſter hyr watche, and "the cookerie book you promyſed, may be ſente "bye the man.——I never longed for thy com-"pany more than laſt night: we were all very "merrye at the Globe, when Ned Alleyn did not "ſcruple to affyrme pleaſauntely to thy Friende "Will, that he had ſtolen his ſpeeche about the "Qualityes of an actor's excellencye in Hamlet hys "Tragedye, from converſations manyfold whych "had paſſed betweene them, and opinyons given by "Alleyn touchinge the ſubjecte.——Shakeſpeare "did not take this talke in good ſorte; but Johnſon "put an end to the ſtrife with wittylye remarkinge, "This affaire needeth no Contentione; you ſtole it from "Ned, no doubte; do not marvel: Have you not ſeen "him act tymes out of number?

ALLIX (PETER) a very learned and eminent Divine of the Church of England, though a native of the kingdom of France, and well known in the republic of letters by his numerous and his excellent writings. He was born ſome time in the year 1641, at Alençon (a), and having received a liberal education, which highly improved his great natural parts, he became Miniſter of the Reformed Church at Rouen, where, before he was thirty-five, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by publiſhing ſome very learned and curious pieces [A], by which he acquired a great reputation (b). It was owing to this that he was

[A] Some very learned and curious pieces.] At the time our author came abroad into the world, the controverſy about the Euchariſt was very warm; and the ableſt Proteſtant Divines were employed in writing on that ſubject. His earlieſt performance was intitled, I. Reſponſe à la Diſſertation ſur Bertram & Jean Scot, ou Erigene, qui eſt à la fin du premier Tome de la Perpetuité de M. Arnaud; *i. e. was called from Rouen to Charenton, which was the principal church the Reformed had in France; the village in which it ſtood lying little more than a league from Paris, at the confluence of the rivers Seine and Marne, and whither the moſt conſiderable perſons in France, of the Proteſtant religion, conſtantly reſorted (c). We are, therefore, to conſider this removal of our author, as the higheſt teſtimony of reſpect that could be paid him by thoſe of his communion, in the circumſtances in which they then were. As he was now in the zenith of preferment, and ſaw himſelf in a condition of doing great ſervice to the Church, he applied himſelf to the taſk with all imaginable zeal, and preached ſeveral moſt excellent ſermons in defence of the Faith, againſt the artful attempts of the Biſhop of Meaux, who was then labouring to overturn the Reformed Religion, by ſeeming conceſſions to its profeſſors (d). Some of theſe ſermons were afterwards printed in Holland, and met with deſerved commendations from the famous Bayle, who teſtified a very high eſteem for the learning and abilities of their author (e) [B]. Upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes, Mr. Allix found himſelf obliged to quit France, as well as the work of the miniſtry in that kingdom, and had prepared a moſt moving and pathetic diſcourſe, which he intended to have delivered as his farewel to his congregation; which however he was obliged to omit, though the ſermon was afterwards printed, and deſervedly admired (f) [C]. This edict was revoked, and the Reformed Religion baniſhed France

The firſt eleven books of theſe Contemplations had been long before publiſhed (9), and theſe were earneſtly deſired, to render his work complete. The Papiſts were at that time very aſſiduous in publiſhing the Chriſtian Fathers, and the moſt learned Proteſtants took care to examine their editions, and to give the world early notice of any attempt to conceal, or to obtrude, under colour of publiſhing theſe valuable monuments of antiquity.

VIII. Douze Sermons de P. A. Miniſtre du S. Evangile ſur divers textes. A Rotterdam chez Reinier Leers, 1685, 12*mo*. i. e. Twelve Sermons by Peter Allix, Miniſter of the Holy Goſpel, upon ſeveral Texts. Of theſe ſermons Mr. Bayle gives the following account (10). 'I ſhall only ſay, in reference to theſe 'diſcourſes, that they turn all of them on matters 'of great importance; and that in the firſt four, the 'author labours to eſtabliſh the true principles on 'which an anſwer can be grounded, to the Paſtoral 'Advertiſement, addreſſed to thoſe of the Religion by 'the Clergy of France, in 1682. It is with this 'view, that it is ſhewn with great force of argu'ment, that every man is obliged to examine atten'tively, the doctrine taught him by his Paſtors, and 'to reject whatever appears to him falſe. In them, 'the words, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock, &c. 'are explained with wonderful perſpicuity, and are 'ſet in very new and ſingular lights. In them alſo we 'find explained, the promiſe made by JESUS CHRIST 'to his diſciples, that he would ſend them a ſpirit, 'That ſhould conduct them in all truth, and it is ſhewn 'that this does not prove the Church ſhould be in'fallible. The nature of the Church is treated in 'the eleventh ſermon, and one may venture to ſay, 'that it is one of the moſt important places in the 'book. One may alſo without hazard aſſert, that 'the ſermons on the Deſcent of Chriſt into Hell, on 'the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, on the Miſeries 'of final Impenitence, on the taking away the Cup, 'on the Incarnation of the Word, &c. contain a 'thouſand beautiful paſſages, equally ſtrong in 'ſentiment, and delicate in their turn and expreſ'ſion.' Such an elogium from ſuch a writer, is ſufficient to eſtabliſh the character of any author, above the reach of minor critics.

France in 1685, on which our author resolved to follow the advice of his friends, and retire into England, which accordingly he did, either in that or the following year. He met here with a most favourable reception, on account of his extensive learning, and more especially his singular knowledge in Ecclesiastical History, for which he was particularly esteemed (g). On his first coming, he applied very closely to learning our language, which he attained to a surprising degree of perfection, as appeared by a book he published in defence of the Christian religion, and which he dedicated to King James II. in very respectful terms, acknowledging at the same time, not only his personal obligations to that Prince (h), but also his kindness and charity to the distressed refugees in general, which is a very singular and remarkable piece of history [D]. He was very soon complimented here with the degeee of Doctor in Divinity, and in 1690 he had the treasurership of the Church of Salisbury (i) given him; but I do not find that he was ever Canon of Windsor, as is asserted in some foreign memoirs. It was proposed that he should have published here an authentic History of the Councils, for which laborious and important work unquestionably there never was any man better qualified; but by some accidents intervening, and for want of encouragement, this great and useful undertaking miscarried (k). He wrote and published, however, several Treatises relating to Ecclesiastical history, equally learned and entertaining, which were wonderfully well-timed, and very useful to the Protestant cause, which was then

XI. Reflexions upon the Books of the Holy Scripture, to establish the Truth of the Christian Religion. In Two Volumes, London 1688. This treatise we find licensed for the press by Dr. H. Maurice, Chaplain to Dr. William Sancroft, then Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, January 12, 1687-8. There is a large extract from the first edition of the first volume of this work, and a good character given of it in a Literary Journal published jointly by Messieurs Le Clerc and La Croze (12). But the whole was completely published in English, on account of the countenance the author met with from King James, to whom he wrote the following dedication, which however is missing in some copies.

To the KING.

'Great Sir,

'THE gracious acceptance which your Majesty 'was pleased to allow the first volume of my 'reflections upon the Holy Scriptures, to establish the 'truth of the Christian religion, encouraged, and al'most necessitated me to the further presumption of 'laying these two volumes at this time at your Ma'jesty's feet. Your Majesty did me the honour to say, 'That you were pleased to see Divines apply themselves 'to the clearing of subjects so important. And after 'this judgment given by so great a Prince, which is 'so evident a demonstration of your zeal, for the 'fundamental truths of the Christian religion, it had 'been unpardonable in me, not to have gone on 'with the work; and I had reason then to conse'crate it wholly to your Majesty, who, I was as'sured, would approve of my intentions, and for 'that reason would pardon the imperfections of the 'performance. As your Majesty continues still to 'give such illustrious instances of your clemency and 'royal protection to those of our nation; so I con'fess, Sir, I thought myself under an obligation to 'lay hold upon this opportunity of publishing what 'all those, who find so sure a protection in your 'Majesty's dominions, feel and think as much as 'myself upon these new testimonies of your royal 'bounty. When your Majesty had taken us into 'your particular care, and had granted us several 'privileges, and so made us sharers in all the ad'vantages, which those who live under your go'vernment enjoy; your Majesty did yet something 'more, and inspired all your subjects with the same 'compassion towards us, with which your royal 'breast was already touched. You saw our miseries, 'and resolved to give us ease; and this generous 'design was executed, and your royal clemency dif'fused in the hearts of all your subjects. The whole 'world, Sir, which has received upon all its coasts, 'some remainders of our shipwreck, is filled with 'admiration of the unexampled effects of your Ma'jesty's clemency. There is no place so barbarous, 'where the renown of that mercy, which has been 'so gloriously extended towards us, has not been 'carried; and the resemblance will be ever dear to 'the remotest ages of posterity. We must, Sir, be 'wholly insensible, if we had not all of us the 'highest sense of so great a bounty; and we should 'justly appear to the whole world, to be unworthy of 'this your Majesty's paternal care; if notwithstanding 'that low condition, to which we are now reduced, 'we should not prostrate ourselves before your au'gust throne, with the humblest demonstrations of 'thankfulness. When God showers down the 'greatest blessings upon mankind, he requires this 'just tribute, which is also their greatest honour, 'by opening to them an access unto the throne of 'glory. And this sacred pattern we crave leave to 'follow, when we solemnly pay the like tribute to 'your Majesty, who can receive nothing from us 'again, that can answer the greatness, or the num'ber of those favours, which have so very much ex'ceeded all our desires. I could wish, Sir, that this 'work which I now present to your Majesty, might 'be so happy as to pass to posterity with this cha'racter of our acknowledgment: and that it might 'stand as a faithful record for ever, to perpetuate 'the memory of that lively sense of your bounty, 'which is imprinted on all our hearts. If this could 'be hoped for, it must be wholly owing to your 'Majesty's glorious name, which latest ages will re'ceive with reverence. But, Sir, though I dare 'not hope that these reflections can obtain that ho'nour, yet our age at least may see, that they bear 'these public marks of gratitude for all your Ma'jesty's royal favours. This, Sir, is my whole aim, 'in the dedication of this work to your Majesty; and 'may your sacred Majesty be pleased to approve of 'these poor testimonies of our thankfulness in ge'neral, and to look upon them as instances of mine 'in particular; and of that profound respect, with 'which I am,

SIR,

Your Majesty's most dutiful,

London, May 7, 1688.

attacked by the arts of Romiſh Prieſts, as well as by the arms of Popiſh Princes. Theſe pieces were remarkably well received, and Dr. Allix became in as great credit here, as ever he had been in France (l), for his ingenious and ſolid defences of the Reformed Religion, from reaſon and authority, from the practice of early ages [E], as well as the precepts of the Goſpel. In the year 1699, he wrote a very learned book in defence of the Trinity, which had very conſiderable effects, and has been always looked upon as a piece of great value in reſpect to Hebrew literature [F]. He wrote, beſides the works already mentioned, ſeveral other learned and ingenious Treatiſes on curious and [E] From the practice of early ages.] It appears plainly, that ſoon after Dr. Allix's coming over to England, he was acknowledged both here and abroad, for one of the ableſt writers in defence of the Proteſtant religion, that his country had produced; of which abundant proofs might be given, if the teſtimony of Bayle, and the authorities cited in the laſt note (where we report the elogia beſtowed on him) were not more than ſufficient. But the particular manner in which he galled the Roman Church, was by attacking her with her own weapons, and proving that, while ſhe treated others ſo freely with the opprobrious name of Heretics, ſhe had herſelf invented new articles of faith (13). In ſupport of this charge, he publiſhed the following treatiſe that had been ſent him from Paris.

XII. Determinatio F. Joannis Pariſienſis de modo exiſtendi Corpus Chriſti in Sacramento Altaris, alio quam ſit ille quem tenet Eccleſia. Nunc primum edita ex MS. Cod. S. Victoris Pariſienſis; cui prefixa eſt Præfatio Hiſtorica de Dogmate Tranſubſtantiationis. Londini 1686, 8*vo*. i. e. The determination of brother John Paris, Jacobin, as to the mode of our Lord's Body exiſting in the ſacrament of the altar; different from that held by the Church. Now firſt printed from a MS. at St. Victor's in Paris; to which is prefixed, an hiſtorical preface, as to the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation. This hiſtorical preface, is entirely the work of our author, in which he inconteſtably proves, that this point of Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament, was quite unſettled in the earlieſt ages of the Chriſtian Church, and never conſidered as an article of faith, even in the Church of Rome, till declared ſo, for particular reaſons, by the council of Trent (14).

XIII. Some remarks upon the eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the ancient Churches of Piedmont, by P. Allix, D. D. London 1690. 4*to*. This treatiſe was licenſed for the preſs, September 23, 1689. by Dr. Z. Iſham, Chaplain to Dr. Henry Compton, Lord Biſhop of London. Our author dedicates this work to King William, and pays him very high compliments on his zeal for the Proteſtant Religion; to ſupport and defend which, he tells him, God had raiſed his Majeſty up in that critical conjuncture. The deſign of this very learned and accurate performance was to refute what the Biſhop of Meaux had advanced on this ſubject, in his famous book, intitled, The Hiſtory of the Variations of the Proteſtants in Matters of Faith (15): a book that did then, and has ſince, done more hurt to the Proteſtants, than any thing elſe that has been publiſhed on that ſide. The aim of our author in this admirable performance (which contains twenty-eight chapters) was to ſhew the true ſtate of the caſe, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion of doctrines, in ſeveral parts of Italy, but more eſpecially in the vallies of Piedmont from the ſecond century; which with great labour and induſtry he collected, and with laudable candour and ingenuity has publiſhed to the world, by which it plainly appears, that he did not intend to amuſe them with an affected diſplay of learning, but to vindicate the truth, by ſetting the Hiſtory of theſe Churches in its proper light. It was by doing this, that he has fully proved the Romiſh Prelate's book can affect none, but ſuch as do not inquire into the truth of the facts he reports; and proves farther, that all inquiries of this nature, are injurious to the Popiſh cauſe, in as much as they tend to render it evident, that the errors and power of the Romiſh Church, had in all ages, contrary to what they would perſuade the world, been detected and oppoſed. It was in proſecution of the ſame view, and to continue what he had ſo happily begun, that he ſent abroad

XIV. Remarks upon the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Ancient Churches of the Albigenſes. By Peter Allix, D. D. Treaſurer of the Church of Sarum, London 1692. 4*to*. This treatiſe the author dedicated to the Queen; i. e. to Queen Mary, daughter to his firſt patron King James; and in that dedication, he lays open the deſign of this treatiſe, and the reaſons of his ſubmitting it to her Majeſty's view, very fairly and freely. In the book itſelf, there is all the good ſenſe and ſound learning, that the ſevereſt critic could expect upon the ſubject. In it he very ſtrenuouſly and judiciouſly defends the Albigenſes from the charges of hereſy and ſchiſm, which the Biſhop of Meaux had brought againſt them, and with great force retorts upon him his own arguments; by ſhewing, that a conſtant and vigorous oppoſition of the power of the Church of Rome, founded not only on a diſavowal of her authority, but on a difference from her alſo in opinion, is far from proving either hereſy or ſchiſm in the opponents, but rather ſhews perſecution on one ſide, and a great zeal for truth on the other. He examines likewiſe, in the courſe of his remarks, abundance of curious and important queſtions, with much freedom, learning, and impartiality, traces the progreſs of the ſentiments maintained by the Albigenſes into Spain, and diſcovers how far, and in what degree, the ſame notions were diffuſed here in England, by the famous Wickliff and his diſciples. By way of appendix, there are added to this work, an extract of ſeveral trials of pretended heretics, taken from the regiſter of Sarum; which ſerve to confirm the facts laid down in the diſcourſe itſelf, as to the conformity of the religious ſentiments of the Albigenſes, with thoſe of the Lollards; a kind of reproachful term beſtowed on the Wickliffites here, as Hugonot was on the profeſſors of the Proteſtant Religion in France.

[F] A piece of great value in reſpect to Hebrew literature.] Our learned author having already diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his excellent treatiſes, in ſupport of the Chriſtian Religion in general, and of the Proteſtant Religion in particular; now thought it highly requiſite to draw his pen in vindication of the Holy Trinity, againſt the Unitarians, which he did in that very learned work, of which we propoſe to give an account in this note.

XV. The Judgment of the Ancient Jewiſh Church, againſt the Unitarians in the Controverſy upon the Holy Trinity, and the Divinity of our bleſſed Saviour: With a Table of Matters and a Table of Texts of Scripture occaſionally explained. By a Divine of the Church of England, London 1689. 8*vo*. In order to underſtand clearly the nature and deſign of this work, it is requiſite to obſerve, that the Unitarians, in anſwer to Biſhop Bull's learned vindication, had publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes, in which they aſſerted that Juſtin Martyr, who lived 140 years after Chriſt, was the original author of the notion of our Saviour's divinity, and conſequently of the Trinity. To eſtabliſh this paradox, they maintained, I. That ſince the Jews had aſſerted the Meſſiah to be no more than man, as appears from the dialogue between Juſtin Martyr and Trypho the Jew, it muſt neceſſarily follow, that all the Jewiſh authors, cited by Dr. Bull, againſt the opinion of the Socinians, muſt have lived after the publication of the goſpel. II. That the Books of the Jews, which he cites againſt the Socinians, are the pious frauds of ſome Chriſtians, who have lived ſince Juſtin Martyr; and this is believed to be particularly true of the books of Philo the Jew, and of that of Wiſdom. III. That the Jews could not ſpeak of the Trinity, or of the Divinity of the Meſſiah, becauſe they knew nothing and important ſubjects, ſo that he was for upwards of thirty years an active as well as illuſtrious member of the Republic of Letters, and a very able as well as affectionate defender of the eſtabliſhed Church. Some of theſe pieces expoſed him to very ſevere cenſures, and amongſt the reſt from Mr. Bayle (m), who had formerly complimented him ſo highly; but conſidering the ſubject, and the impoſſibility of writing about it with certainty, our author's miſtakes ought not to have drawn upon him any ſevere uſage, or contemptuous language [G]. One would have imagined that theſe curious and laborious works would at leaſt have done honour to the orthodoxy of their author, and have ſecured him from the opprobrious imputation of Hereſy: but the nothing of either; and therefore we muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe, that whatever is found in their works, and which ſeems to favour theſe doctrines, muſt have been inſerted by Chriſtians, who lived after the time of Juſtin Martyr. IV. In fine, that if after all there be any thing, either in the Scripture, or in the writings of the ancient Jews, conformable to theſe doctrines, it very probably proceeded from the Platonics, from whoſe writings the Jews and Chriſtians borrowed many notions, which they mingled with the doctrines of the goſpel, in order to render them more acceptable to the Pagans. The great deſign therefore, of our author's book is, to refute theſe aſſertions; and not only ſo, but to examine the matter to the bottom, and to prove that the ancient Jewiſh Church had, with reſpect to the Trinity, and the Divinity of the Meſſiah, the very ſame ideas at the bottom, that the Chriſtian Church hath at this day, only leſs clear and leſs exact. This was a great undertaking, and required a moſt extenſive knowledge in Greek and Hebrew literature, which every body muſt allow our author has ſhewn, and managed this whole controverſy with equal perſpicuity and erudition (16). It ſeems he had before written in ſupport of Biſhop Bull, but without putting his name to the treatiſe; and, therefore, I have not been able to diſcover its title.

(16) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres par Barnard, Vol. ii. p. 518.

Theſe treatiſes created the doctor a great many enemies, and amongſt the moſt furious, Mr. Stephen Nye, Rector of Hormead, who wrote an anſwer, in which, amongſt other things, he ſays what follows (17): 'If I have not here anſwered with all 'the reſpect and tenderneſs that I would, the doctor 'is to thank himſelf for it, as having given a pro'vocation that could not be diſſembled. He has 'now written two books, one after another, profeſ'ſedly againſt Mr. N. imputing to him ſeveral 'books, that were written not by Mr. N. but by 'Mr. S. and ſome others I could name, as has been 'all along known to ſeveral gentlemen, and to ſome 'bookſellers; and at the time that Dr. A. pub'liſhed the Judgment, it was ſo commonly known 'that his forwardneſs and raſhneſs in libelling and 'delating Mr. N. to the whole nation, and to his 'ſuperiors, as the undoubted author of them, admits 'no excuſe. Of ſo many, eminent for learning and 'dignity, as have written againſt thoſe books; 'though without doubt they had heard the cackle of 'report, concerning Mr. N. and other reputed au'thors of Mr. Firmin's prints, as well as Dr. A. 'yet in their anſwers, none of them charged thoſe 'books on Mr. N. or the other ſuppoſed writers, 'ſave only this ſtranger; who of a Refugee for re'ligion, was not aſhamed to turn Informer. He 'that will take on him the infamous character of an 'Informer, is ready without doubt to go much far'ther, if circumſtances and opportunity invite him. 'Every body knows what Name is intended by Mr. 'N. Should not an adviſed and an honeſt man 'have firſt enquired, whether there be not more 'perſons of that name; that if perhaps there be, he 'might avoid doing wrong to innocent perſons, by 'an indefinite, uncertain ſignification, what parti'cular perſon he meant? When thoſe books to 'which Dr. A. points were written, there were no 'fewer than three Mr. N.'s clergymen, all of them 'beneficed within forty miles of London, and two 'of them acquaintances of Mr. Firmin. The In'formant therefore ſhould have ſome way notified, 'which of the Mr. N.'s he intended to accuſe, and 'wiſhed to ſee a public ſacrifice. I can tell him, 'there are divers witneſſes among the Socinians 'themſelves, that will at any time aſſure Dr. A. 'or any other, that neither of the Mr. N.'s friends 'of Mr. Firmin, were ever in the ſentiments of 'Socinus. Though it be true alſo, that they diſ'approved, and oppoſed the Tritheiſm of ſome 'modern writers, that contended for a Trinity of 'diſtinct (infinite) Beings, Minds, and Spirits, which 'might bring on them the imputation of Socinianiſm, 'with a great number of other fooliſh calumnies, 'from their adverſaries, or from the Tritheiſtic 'party.

(17) Doctrine of the Holy Trinity, &c. p. 164.

'But when ſuch an imputation or report was up: 'I pray how would it recommend the books of 'Dr. A. to tell every body (or the whole nation) 'that they are written againſt Mr. N., more than if 'he had ſaid, they are written againſt ſome anony'mous pamphlets, that are gotten into too much 'credit and reputation?

'I have heard it confidently reported, that Dr. 'A. himſelf is author of one of Mr. Firmin's 'principal books: The Defence of the brief Hiſtory 'of the Unitarians: and ſome gentlemen of his na'tion (Refugees alſo for religion) ſay, Dr. A was 'always reputed a Sabellian. I believed both theſe 'reports, and ſo did many others: he has convinced 'me by the Judgment, it was a ſlander, or at beſt a 'miſtake; for he is a Tritheiſt. It will be a new 'warning to me, and ought to be to him, not to 'publiſh flying reports, for certain News; eſpe'cially to a whole nation, and to the poſſible pre'judice of perſons who never wronged me.'

[G] Any ſevere uſage, or contemptuous language.] In this note, we propoſe to give a ſuccinct account of the remaining pieces publiſhed by our author, in their natural order, which will afford us ample opportunity of explaining, proving, and juſtifying, what has been already delivered in the text, and particularly, allow us occaſion to ſhew how he came to loſe in ſome meaſure, the good graces of Mr. Bayle, though there never happened any open breach between them.

XVI. De Meſſiæ duplici adventu Diſſertationes duæ adverſus Judæos. Londini 1701, 12*mo. i. e. Of the two Advents of the* MESSIAH, in as many Diſſertations againſt the Jews. It was this treatiſe, that hurt the author with many people, on account of ſome extraordinary things that are advanced in it. He had, for example, mentioned ſome computations, according to which, the ſecond coming of Chriſt was fixed to the year 1720, or to 1736, at the lateſt: in this, no doubt, he was miſtaken, and deceived, but what then? Can it be truly aſſerted, that other learned men never err in their ſpeculations; or, if they do, is he bound to be more perfect, or exact? If mens failings in computations draw any imputation on the principles of ſcience, it may be doubtful, whether there be any certainty in the world. But in regard to our author, the apology for him is ſoon made. He did not pretend to prophecy, or revelation, he did not ſet up for new lights, or ſupernatural gifts, but proceeding on ſuch grounds as had been thought ſure by ſome as great men as ever this church or nation bred; he was ſo unlucky to apply their principles wrong, or miſtook for principles, what in reality were no more than conjectures, by which he came to advance, as things probable, what, in effect, experience has proved falſe. But does this ſmall fault affect his other learning? Muſt we ruin the fair ſtructure of his reputation, after all the pains he took to raiſe it, becauſe one ſtone is miſplaced? Shall we ſuppoſe he knew nothing, becauſe he did not know when the day of judgment was to come? No ſurely, this would be too hard meaſure. Let us admit he had weakneſſes, but let us ſtill be juſt to his known merits, and grateful for the ſervice he has done us in his other learned works.

The true cauſe why Bayle expreſſed ſome contempt on the ſubject of this treatiſe, was, his being engaged in a diſpute with M. Jurieu, who doubtleſs had uſed him very ill, and deſerved all the ſeverity he met with from him. This M. Jurieu, had ſet up for an expounder of prophecy, and even for a kind of Prophet, in which he notoriouſly failed. It was impoſſible for ſuch an adverſary as Bayle, to overlook an opportunity like this of triumph, and it was as the fact is quite otherwiſe; for a vehement Engliſh writer charges him with Tritheiſm (n), and a collection of lives lately publiſhed abroad, leaves his memory under the reproach of Socinianiſm, than which, without queſtion, there never was a charge more groundleſs or incredible (o). Our learned author, however, continued ſteady and fixed to his principles, and was ſo well known to be a zealous defender of the doctrine of the Church of England on that ſubject, that the famous Mr. Whiſton thought proper to conſult him, when he firſt propoſed writing in ſupport of his own opinions, as appears by what himſelf delivers on this ſubject, in one of his moſt remarkable pieces (p). But our author conceiving this account of that converſation ſomewhat diſingenuous, thought it requiſite to give himſelf a ſhort relation of that affair, to which he adds many things equally curious and important (q) [H]. He enjoyed a very uncommon ſhare of health and ſpirits, as appears by his lateſt writings, in which there is not only all the erudition, but all the quickneſs and vivacity that appeared in his earlieſt pieces. Thoſe who knew him found the ſame pleaſure in his converſation, that the learned will always find in his productions; for with a prodigious ſhare of learning, he had a wonderful livelineſs of temper, and expreſſed himſelf on the dryeſt ſubjects with ſo much ſprightlineſs, and in a manner ſo out of the common road, that it was impoſſible to flag or loſe one's attention, to what was the ſubject of his diſcourſe. He was impoſſible for him to uſe it, without involving, more or leſs, all, who by giving that turn to their ſtudies, ſeemed in any degree to countenance Jurieu. It was this that engaged him to write the article of Frederick Braunbom, a German enthuſiaſt, in order to have an opportunity of falling on Jurieu, and to avoid the glare of perſonal reflection, on almoſt all ſuch as had written on like ſubjects. Upon this occaſion he brings in our author, notwithſtanding Jurieu's want of ſucceſs, ſays he, Dr. Allix has taken the field, to aſſure us, that Antichriſt will be extinct in 1716, in 1720, or, at the lateſt, in 1736 (18). XXII. Preparations a la Cene, 8*vo. i. e. Preparations for the Lord's Supper.* This practical piece was often printed at Geneva, and is commended as a very excellent performance in its kind.

[H] Many things equally curious and important.] This little treatiſe of our author, which is now become extremely ſcarce, bears the following title: XXIII. Remarks upon ſome Places of Mr. Whiſton's Books, either printed or in Manuſcript. By P. Allix, D. D. Lond. 1711, 8*vo.* The account he gives us of his converſation with Mr. Whiſton is very particular, and very worthy of the reader's notice; and therefore, as well as in regard to the ſcarceneſs of this tract, which is but a pamphlet, I will give the whole paſſage in the author's own words, eſteeming it a very entertaining part of his perſonal hiſtory (*). 'The late Dr. Payne, as Mr. Whiſton ſaith (for 'I think they both joined in the queſtion), having 'aſked me, Whether the Holy Spirit was addreſſed 'to in the public prayers of the primitive Church? 'I anſwered, that if they had ever read the works 'of St. Baſil the Great, they would have found a 'ſatisfactory anſwer to their queſtion; for that he 'had writ a large diſcourſe on that very ſubject, in 'which he not only ſuppoſes, that all their public 'prayers were directed to the Father by the interceſſion of the Son in the Holy Spirit; but proves 'likewiſe, that the Deity of the Spirit was generally ſuppoſed by the Church in that form, 'though it was not formally directed to him alone. 'I adviſed him to read that piece of St. Baſil, who 'had a natural occaſion of examining this matter, 'by the complaint which was made againſt him; 'that in the Doxology he uſed indifferently, theſe 'words: Glory be to the Father, with the Son, and in, or with, the Holy Ghoſt. And indeed, St. Baſil 'writing near fifty years after the riſe of Arianiſm, '(which gave the hint to Macedonius, Biſhop of 'Conſtantinople, to deny the Divinity of the Holy 'Ghoſt, and to do all he could to ſupport his hereſy) had ſolidly defended the ſenſe of the primitive Church, in all times and places, concerning 'the Deity of the Holy Spirit; and confuted all 'the arguments of the Macedonians. This is the 'ſubſtance of that converſation; and, I am ſure, 'the Divines, and Miniſters, who were there and 'then preſent, little thought, I had therein given 'any occaſion for ſuch a charge as Mr. Whiſton has 'now, at the diſtance of twelve or thirteen years, 'publicly brought againſt me. He has given me, 'indeed, the title of The very learned Doctor, &c. 'But, as he doubtleſs has his reaſons for what he 'does, I ſuppoſe, he might deſign, at the ſame 'time, that it ſhould ſerve for the juſtification of 'himſelf. Timeo Danaos & Dona ferentes. Some 'months ago, one of Mr. Whiſton's friends told 'me, he had heard from Mr. Whiſton, ſuch an 'account of that converſation, as he has ſince 'printed. I then told the gentleman the whole 'truth of the matter, and what then paſſed between 'us: but I thought it of ſo little importance, that 'though Mr. Whiſton came afterwards to viſit me, 'in company with ſome friends of his, I did not 'think it neceſſary to take any notice of it, after 'the explanation I had given his friends, and which 'in all probability came to his ears; eſpecially, 'ſince I could not have done it, without blaming 'him for his incivility, in making his own uſe of 'what I had ſaid, by changing the ſtate of the 'queſtion, and ſuppreſſing a part of my anſwer: 'an incivility ſo much the greater, becauſe I had 'referred them to St. Baſil's book, de Spiritu Sancto, for an account of my ſentiments about the 'queſtion they propoſed. I have had ſeveral opportunities of converſing with Mr. Whiſton, and 'I am ſatisfied he never looked upon me as one 'who inclined in the leaſt to his opinions. I 'thought him a ſtudious man, aud had a reſpect for 'him as ſuch; and he will do me the juſtice to 'acknowledge, that I always ſpoke my mind to 'him very freely and ſincerely; but that I never 'approved of the liberties he took, which indeed 'were more than could be well borne with.'

conſulted by the greateſt men of his age, on the deepeſt and moſt intricate parts of learning, and was acknowledged for a genius of the firſt order, by thoſe whom the world have eſteemed, not only the moſt capable but the moſt unbiaſſed critics (r) [I]. It was not any ſingle branch of literature, or a few related to each other, that could occupy his thoughts, but the whole circle of ſciences which fall under the cognizance of a general ſcholar and ſound Divine. All theſe he had not only taſted but digeſted, as appears by his excellence in different and almoſt oppoſite ſtudies. His ſermons ſhew him to have been an admirable orator, and at the ſame time a profound ſcholar. The ſeveral ancient authors he publiſhed teſtify his ſkill in criticiſm, and his perfect acquaintance with antiquity. His Treatiſes on Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory diſcover a prodigious fund of reading, an exact comprehenſion of his ſubject, and his ſincere zeal for the Proteſtant religion. He laboured alſo to ſerve it by the tracts he reſcued from duſt and oblivion, to ſhew (as they effectually did) that the charge of novelty on which the Papiſts inſiſted ſo loudly, was not barely unreaſonable, but at the ſame time groundleſs. His thorough acquaintance with Hebrew and Rabbinical learning, with whatever depends thereupon in Greek and other languages, was diſplayed in his laborious performance in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity, in which his ſincerity is as conſpicuous as his learning. If in the proſecution of theſe deep and recondite ſtudies, he ſomewhat miſtook his way, and erred a little in his computations, it was no more than had befallen the greateſt men who have travelled this road before him, particularly Joſeph Mede, and Biſhop Lloyd; neither have theſe examples convinced other Ornaments of the Commonwealth of Letters that the roads are impaſſable, ſince the very learned Dean Prideaux, and the indefatigable Sir Iſaac Newton, have devoted many of their hours to like inquiries. Our author continued his application to the laſt, and having ſpun out the thread to an extraordinary extent, died at London, February 21, 1717, in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age, leaving behind him the reputation of a man, equally aſſiduous in the right diſcharge of all the offices of public and private life, and every way as amiable for his virtues and ſocial qualities, as venerable from his uprightneſs and integrity, and famous for his various and profound learning.

(r) See the Teſtimonies cited from Bayle, Le Clerc, &c. in the notes.

[I] Not only the moſt capable, but the moſt unbiaſſed critics.] One need ſcarcely either conſult or quote on this occaſion any other than Mr. Bayle, who in all his pieces, public and private, does him the utmoſt juſtice, and applauds his learning, candour, and abilities, with a zeal, that evidently proves his commendations were ſincere, and proceeded entirely from the warmth of his heart. I may, I think, take the liberty of obſerving, that Bayle and he were in oppoſite ſentiments in regard to very many, or perhaps to moſt things; ſo that his applauding him was purely out of love to truth, and from that ſtrict regard to juſtice, which is incident to men of true ſcience. An accident happened in the beginning of our author's reputation, which afforded ſufficient teſtimonies of the eſteem and regard ſhewn towards him by other learned men. In the year 1683, came out at Amſterdam, a book with the following title, 'L'Ouverture de l'Epitre de St. Paul 'au Romains par l'explication du vers et 27 du 'chap. iii. & un Lettre en forme du Traité touchant 'la juſtification & la lecture des Peres, 12*mo.*' i. e. An Opening of the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Romans, by the Explanation of chap. iii. 27, of that Epiſtle, together with a Letter in form of a Tract, on Juſtification and the reading of the Fathers. Mr. Bayle, it ſeems, had been informed that Mr. Allix handed it to the preſs, on which he inadvertently mentioned him as its author. But the book giving great offence, Mr. le Clerc wrote to Mr. Bayle on the ſubject, who in his anſwer gives the higheſt character of our author, confeſſes his miſtake, and owns the work to have fallen from the pen of M. le Cene (21). In another letter to the celebrated Mr. Lenfant he ſays the ſame thing (22), which ſhews how uneaſy thoſe learned men were, for fear any imputation ſhould light on a character hitherto unſpotted. Mr. Bernard, in his Literary Journal, ſpeaks very reſpectfully of Dr. Allix; ſo does M. le Clerc in ſome pieces of the like kind, and ſo alſo does the learned Abbé Houtteville, in his copious diſcourſe on ſuch as have defended the Chriſtian Religion (23). It would be no difficult thing to add to theſe many more inſtances of the ſame nature, but that it ſeems to ſo little purpoſe, ſince the world will always ſee enough in his writings, to juſtify his learning, prudence, and application.

ALMARUS, ELMARUS, ELMERUS, ÆLMERUS, was Abbot of the monaſtery of St. Auſtin at Canterbury, at the time when Ælfegus, or as he is commonly called Alphage, the Archbiſhop, was barbarouſly murdered by the Danes, in the year 1011 (a). At this time, our hiſtorians report the city to have been betrayed, by one Elmerus an Archdeacon (b). As for our Almerus, the Danes ſuffered him to go at liberty, and in the year 1022, being, according to the Saxon Chronicle, the ſixth of King Canute's reign, Almerus became Biſhop of Sherburn (c)[A] in Dorſetſhire, which biſhoprick was afterwards transferred to Saliſbury. Godwin hath his name in his account of the Biſhops of that See, but he tells us, that beſides his name he knew nothing concerning him (d), which is highly probable, for he makes him to have ſat there in 1009, and cites no authority in ſupport of that date. Elmerus it ſeems did

[A] Almarus became Biſhop of Sherburn.] The great Patron of this Biſhop was King Canutus, who though in his father's life-time, and even ſome years afterwards, he was fierce and cruel towards the Engliſh; yet when he was ſeated on the throne, and eſtabliſhed by force of arms, he endeavoured to gain the people's affections by a milder and more moderate behaviour. Inaſmuch as the cruel ſlaughter made at Canterbury, and eſpecially the martyrdom of Archbiſhop Alphage, had rendered the Danes odious; Canutus thought proper not only to tranſlate the body of the martyr, with all imaginable reſpect and magnificence, which he performed eleven years after his death (1), but alſo took the Monks at Canterbury under his ſpecial protection, which accounts for his extraordinary kindneſs to our Biſhop Almar. This parade of piety, however it might deceive the people of that age, is, not without cauſe, treated as downright hypocriſy by later hiſtorians; who, by comparing the actions of this Prince, have diſcovered moſt of his politic contrivances were gloſſed with ſuch ſanctified pretences; in ſpight of which, he remained ambitious and rapacious to the laſt (2). It ſhould ſeem did not incline either to leave his Abbey, or to become a Biſhop: however, he was prevailed upon at laſt to take upon him that dignity, and when he had ſo done, he diſcharged it with great conſtancy and vigour, till ſuch time as it pleaſed God to render him quite blind. Upon this he reſigned his biſhoprick, much more readily than he had accepted it, and returning back again to his Abbey, lived there in a cell in the infirmary, in great innocency and devotion to his laſt hour (e). There is one thing very remarkable related of him, and it is this, One day as the boy who attended him was bringing him his dinner, a kite came ſuddenly down, and carried away the victuals in its talons. The boy amazed at ſo odd and unexpected an accident, firſt told Almerus, and then went back to the kitchen for more meat. Almerus reſolved within himſelf not to eat fleſh, unleſs the kite brought back the fleſh it had taken, ſuppoſing that this was a ſign of its being unlawful. The boy, who knew nothing of this, was ſurpriſed a ſecond time; for, before he got to the kitchen door, the kite ſtooping again, dropped the victuals into his platter; he returning, reported the thing to Almerus, who giving thanks to God, ſat down to his dinner without ſcruple. When he came to die, he directed that he ſhould be buried, not as a Biſhop, but as a Monk, which was accordingly done (f). He was interred in the church of the monaſtery, before the altar of St. John, and his memory held in great veneration, though our author tells us, that without the authority of the Holy See, they could not pay their devoirs to him as a ſaint (g).

ſeem that our Biſhop had not very different thoughts, ſince he ſo unwillingly accepted ſo great a dignity, and ſo readily reſigned it, when his infirmity gave him an opportunity of ſo doing (3). His humility and greatneſs of ſoul ought to commend his name to poſterity, as a pious and worthy man, which is full as much to his honour, as if he had been a Romiſh Saint. C.

ALPHERY (MIKEPHER) born in Ruſſia, and of the Imperial line (a). When that country was torn to pieces by inteſtine quarrels, in the latter end of the XVIth century, and the Royal Houſe particularly was ſo ſeverely perſecuted by impoſtors (b), this gentleman and his two brothers were ſent over to England, and recommended to the care of Mr. Joſeph Bidell, a Ruſſia merchant. Mr. Bidell, when they were of age fit for the univerſity, ſent them all three to Oxford, where the ſmall-pox unhappily prevailing, two of them died of it. We know not whether this ſurviving brother took any degrees or not, but it is very probable he did, ſince he entered into Holy Orders, and, in the year 1618 (c), had the Rectory of Wooley in Huntingtonſhire, a living of no very conſiderable value, being rated at under ten pounds in the King's books (d). Here he did his duty with great cheerfulneſs and alacrity, and notwithſtanding he was twice invited back to his native country, by ſome who would have ventured their utmoſt to have ſet him on the throne of his anceſtors; yet he choſe rather to remain with his flock, and to ſerve God in the humble ſtation of a pariſh Prieſt. Yet, in 1643, he underwent the ſevereſt trials from the rage of the Fanatics, who, not ſatisfied with depriving him of his living, inſulted him in the moſt barbarous manner. For having procured a file of muſqueteers to pull him out of his pulpit, as he was preaching on a Sunday, they turned his wife and ſmall children out into the ſtreet, into which alſo they threw his goods. The poor man in this diſtreſs raiſed him a tent under ſome trees in the church-yard, over-againſt his houſe, where he and his family lived for a week. One day having gotten a few eggs, he picked up ſome rotten wood and dry ſticks, and with theſe made a fire in the church-porch in order to boil them; but ſome of his adverſaries, to ſhow how far they could carry their rage againſt the Church, for this poor man was ſo harmleſs they could have none againſt him, came and kicked about his fire, threw down his ſkillet, and broke his eggs (e). After this, having ſtill a little money, he made a ſmall purchaſe in that neighbourhood, built him a houſe, and lived there ſome years. He was encouraged to this by a Preſbyterian Miniſter who came in his room, who honeſtly paid him the fifth part of the annual income of the living, which was the allowance made by parliament to ejected miniſters, treated him with great humanity, and did him all the ſervices in his power. It is a great misfortune that this gentleman's name is not preſerved, his conduct in this reſpect being the more laudable, becauſe it was not a little ſingular. Afterwards, probably on the death or removal of this gentleman, Mr. Alphery left Huntingtonſhire, and came and reſided at Hammerſmith, till the Reſtoration put him in poſſeſſion of his living again. He returned on this occaſion to Huntingtonſhire, where he did not ſtay long, for being upwards of eighty, and withal very infirm, he could not perform the duties of his function. Having, therefore, ſettled a curate, he retired to his eldeſt ſon's houſe at Hammerſmith, where ſhortly after he died, full of years and of honour (f). It muſt be owned that this article is very imperfect; but the ſingularity of a Ruſſian Prince's being a country Miniſter in England, will, we hope, atone for thoſe deficiencies, which it was not in our power to prevent [A]. [A] Which it was not in our power to prevent.] [Mrs. Alphery, the laſt deſcendant of the family, married one Mr. Johnſon a cutler at Huntingdon. She was living in 1764, and had eight children. By her the facts contained in the preceding article were confirmed to Lord Sandwich, and they were likewiſe known to be true by old people in the neighbourhood. His Lordſhip informed Dr. Campbell, that ſuch was the reſpect paid this woman on account of her illuſtrious deſcent, that no perſons, let their ſtation be what it would, choſe to be ſeated in her preſence, if ſhe was ſtanding. On the contrary, they roſe, and remained ſo, till ſhe had taken her chair (1).]

ALREDUS, ALFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, of Beverley, an ancient Engliſh hiſtorian: he is ſaid to have had his education in the univerſity of Cambridge, where he acquired not only great ſkill in divinity, but became alſo an able Philoſopher, and a good Hiſtorian (a). He returned afterwards into his own country of Yorkſhire, where he became a ſecular Prieſt, one of the Canons, and Treaſurer of the church dedicated to St. John of Beverley (b). Bale, and after him, Pits, poſitively affirm, that he flouriſhed under King Stephen, and that he continued his Annals to the year 1136 (c). Voſſius, though a foreigner, comes nearer the truth; he tells us that he flouriſhed in the reign of Henry I. and that he died in the year 1126, in which year alſo, according to him, he ended his Annals (d). The hiſtory he wrote however agrees with none of theſe, it ends in the twenty-ninth of Henry I. and conſequently he died, in all probability, in the year 1128, or 1129 (e). He was, as we may gather from the preface to his work, a man devoted to his ſtudies, and rather in narrow circumſtances than rich. He intended at firſt no more than an abridgment of the Britiſh hiſtory, that is, the hiſtory of the ancient Britons, which was at that time much talked of, and ſome time afterwards publiſhed more at large by Jeffrey of Monmouth. But when our author had gone through this, a deſire of purſuing the thread of his ſtory led him to add the Saxon, and then the Norman hiſtory, ſo that at length he brought it down to his own times (f). This, for any thing that appears, was the only piece he wrote, notwithſtanding a crowd of great authorities, which aſſert him to have been the author of four other books; a groſs miſtake, as we hope to prove to the ſatisfaction of every reader, in the notes [A]. This abridgment of our hiſtory from Brutus to Henry I. is one of the moſt valuable pieces that has eſcaped the rage of time, and the indiſcretion of the firſt Reformers. It is written in a conciſe, elegant, Latin ſtyle, with great perſpicuity, and a more than ordinary attention to dates and authorities. One may, without ſtraining the compliment, call Alured of Beverley our Engliſh Florus, his plan being nearly the ſame, neither is he leſs happy in its execution. One may juſtly wonder that ſo judicious a perſon as Leland, did not give him a place amongſt the Britiſh writers, eſpecially ſince it appears from another work of his, that he had ſeen our author's hiſtory (g). The true reaſon ſeems to have been, that Leland conſidered him only as the author of an abridgment of Jeffrey of Monmouth's Britiſh Hiſtory, which miſtake (for the greateſt men may ſometimes miſtake) was owing to the hurry with which he read this book. Otherwiſe he could not but have ſeen, that our author is not a bare tranſcriber of the Britiſh Hiſtory; and ſecondly, that he went much farther than the author he is ſaid to have copied. After all it is very doubtful, notwithſtanding the poſitive aſſertions of ſo many great men, whether Alured ever ſaw that verſion of the Britiſh Hiſtory, which we now have of Jeffrey of Monmouth, many circumſtances making it probable, that it was not publiſhed before our author wrote his Compendium, as will be ſhewn in another place (b). If he had, it is not eaſy to aſſign a reaſon, why he ſhould not mention his author, ſince in this reſpect he is very exact in other places, and even here he calls it the Britiſh Hiſtory, and ſays very candidly at the concluſion, that he only tranſcribed what he met with therein, and that he could not pretend to account for the ſilence of the Latin writers, and even of the Engliſh ones, concerning the acts of King Arthur, who fought not only againſt the Pagans in Britain, but alſo againſt the Romans themſelves in Gaul (i). If this had really been Jeffrey of Monmouth's tranſlation, why ſhould he have concealed it, rather than Henry of Huntington who abridges the ſame hiſtory, and adding it by way of Appendix to his own, doth not diſſemble whence he took it? The manuſcripts of this work were always ſcarce, and very few who mention it had ſeen it. Mr. Joſcelin, in his catalogue of the writers of Engliſh hiſtory whoſe works he had met with, gives us ſome account of him; but then it appears plainly that he truſted to Bale, and did not conſult the MS. itſelf (k), which he aſſures us was in the hands of Mr. Netleton. I do not find that the induſtrious Stowe had ever met with this hiſtory, otherwiſe I think he would certainly have quoted it, as would later compilers of our general hiſtory, if at any time it had come to their hands. The MS. from which Mr. Hearne publiſhed it at Oxford in 1716, belonged to the famous Thomas Rawlinſon, Eſq; (l) and Mr. Hearne himſelf acknowledges, that it was the only one he ever ſaw. The title he gave it was, The Annals of Alured of Beverley, to which I conceive he was inclined, on account of his books being quoted by this title by ſome ancient writers, and indeed the title is proper enough, though the book is not divided after the manner of the Abbey Chronicles; but inaſmuch as dates are conſtantly preſerved, and as the latter part is particularly exact, as to the years of the Kings reigns in which the facts therein recited fell out, it may well enough be ſtyled Annals. John Withamſted, a very ancient writer, ſpeaking of our author, ſays, that he wrote a Chronicle of what happened from the ſettlement of Brutus, to the time of the Normans, in which alſo he treated of the cities anciently founded in this kingdom, and ſet down the names by which London, Canterbury, and York, were called in old times, when the Britons inhabited them (m). This authority is much to the honour of our hiſtorian; for Withamſted flouriſhed in the XVth century, and was a man of a critical turn, as appears by his attacking the hiſtory of Jeffrey of Monmouth. This teſtimony agrees exactly with the book as we now have it, and therefore I make no queſtion, but that this piece, with the hiſtory of St. John of Beverley, are all that fell from the pen of our author. As to this hiſtory of St. John of Beverley, it is alſo in being, and it is a loſs to the learned world that we have it not printed [B]. To this edition Mr. Hearne has added ſome notes, and a very complete index. He has alſo prefixed a preface, wherein he vindicates his author from the charge of plagiariſm, under which he has ſo long laboured (n). To this there are ſome objections made by Mr. Aaron Thompſon, in his Preface to the Engliſh tranſlation of Jeffrey of Monmouth's Britiſh Hiſtory (o), to which, as alſo to ſome remarks of Biſhop Nicolſon (p), we have given anſwers in their proper place [C]. [B] It is a loſs to the learned world it is not printed.] We have no account at all of this piece of our author's, farther than the ſhort title above mentioned, either in Bale, Pits, or Mr. Hearne's preface to our author's hiſtory; yet the book itſelf is in the Cotton Library, though not ſet down in the catalogues as being contained in a volume of tracts. I ſhall ſet down the title at large, in which the reader will perceive, that this is quite a different thing from what he might expect, which will ſerve to ſupport what has been advanced in the former note, concerning the careleſſneſs of Bale and his tranſcribers. 'Libertates Eccleſiæ S. Johannis de Beverlik, cum 'Privilegiis Apoſtolicis, & Epiſcopalibus, quas 'Magiſter Alueredus Sacriſta ejuſdem Eccleſiæ, de 'Angiico in Latinum tranſtulit. Thus it appears, that this is not a life of St. John of Beverley, but a collection of records.

[A] To the ſatisfaction of every reader in the notes.] As we are greatly obliged to Biſhop Bale for his collections concerning Britiſh writers, notwithſtanding they are very full of errors, ſo we ought certainly to be very careful how we charge him with greater defects than really are in his writings. As to our author, we ſhall ſtate the caſe fairly, and with many circumſtances, omitted even by the induſtrious Mr. Hearne, who was not aware that Bale had given more than one account of Alfred of Beverley. The firſt edition of this writer's hiſtory of Britiſh authors, was printed in 4*to.* in 1548, and therein his account of Alfred of Beverley is very ſhort; all he ſays of his works being compriſed in the following lines, which I cite, becauſe the book is extremely ſcarce, in his own words. 'De variis eventibus, continuaque ſucceſſione ab origine Britannorum ad ſuum 'Ætatem uſque contexuit, Hiſtoriam perpulchram, 'Lib. 1. de Naturis Rerum, Lib. 1. De cæteris 'nihil ex aliorum Scriptis comperiri potui, quamvis id ſedulo tentarim; i. e. He wrote an elegant 'hiſtory of the various events, and of the ſeveral ſucceſſions from the origin of the Britons to his own times, 'in one book. Of the Nature of Things, one book; 'as to the reſt of his writings I have been able to learn 'nothing, though I have made a ſtrict enquiry (1).' He farther tells us, that he ſuppoſed him to have flouriſhed in the reign of William the Conqueror, about the year 1086. But afterwards, as if from better informations, he gives us the following catalogue of his works: 'Defloratione Galfredi, 'Lib. v. Brytannia major, quæ nunc Anglia. 'De Geſtis Regum Angliæ, Lib. 1. Finito Regno 'Brytonum, Brytanniæ. De geſtis Regum Brytanniæ, Lib. 1. Aggreſſus ſum Laborem, itaque 'mihi. Hiſtoriam ampliorem, Lib. 1. in Diebus 'ſilentii noſtri occur. Vitam D. Joannis Archiepiſcopi, Lib. 1. & alia quædam; i. e. Extracts from 'Geoffrey, five books, beginning Brytannia major, '&c. Of the Acts of the Kings of England, one book. 'Of the Acts of the Kings of Britain, one book. A 'larger hiſtory in one book. The Life of Archbiſhop 'John, in one book, and ſome others (2).' Pits tranſcribes this account verbatim (3); and therefore, if we can account for Bale's miſtake, we account for his at the ſame time, as alſo for Mr. Joſcelin's, mentioned in the text, who likewiſe tranſcribes Bale exactly (4). In the firſt place it muſt be obſerved, that ſo much of Alfred's work as relates to the Britons, is compriſed in five books; but that theſe were called by the author himſelf, extracts from Jeffrey, is impoſſible; becauſe though he mentions Cæſar, Trogus Pompeius, Eutropius, Lucan, Beda, and many others, yet he never mentions Jeffrey, but calls the book from whence he took the facts he ſets down, the Britiſh Hiſtory, which, without doubt, is the ſame that Jeffrey tranſlated, though our author adds many things from other writers; but the firſt words of this treatiſe, properly ſpeaking, are, Primus in Britannia regnavit Brutus (5). The ſixth book in Mr. Hearn's edition begins with the words, Bale aſſigns for the beginning of the hiſtory of the Engliſh Kings, viz. Finito Regno Britonum, Britanniæ Regnum ad Anglos eſt tranſlatum (6), which plainly ſhows that it is in fact the ſame treatiſe. As to the third book mentioned by Bale, it is certainly the ninth of the annals, of which our author ſpeaking in his preface, makes uſe of theſe words, Aggreſſus ſum itaque laborem mihi quidem difficilem, &c. (7), which therefore Bale makes the beginning of it. The larger hiſtory is nothing more than a ſhort preface, which Alfred ſet before his work, in order to ſhow the occaſion of his writing it, which begins with, In Diebus Silentii noſtri, &c. (8); ſo that here, all theſe four different works are fairly ſhewn to be no more than ſeveral parts of Alfred's Annals, as we have it now in print, and as for the remaining book mentioned by Bale, it will be accounted for in the next note.

[C] We have given anſwers in their proper place.] Mr. Thompſon, out of zeal for the credit of Jeffrey of Monmouth, maintains that our Alfred, according to the common opinion, really tranſcribed his book, or abridged it. But foreſeeing the dates were againſt him, all ancient authors placing Jeffrey later in point of time than our author, he ventures to aſſert, that Jeffrey's hiſtory was publiſhed ſome time between the years 1123 and 1128, becauſe, ſays he, Alfred copied it in this laſt year (10). By this method a man may prove any thing; for, in ſhort, he does nothing more than ſuppoſe what he ſhould prove to be true, and then offers his ſuppoſition as a proof to his readers. I will, in few words, ſhow firſt, that his ſuppoſition is groundleſs, and ſecondly, that there is good authority to prove (11), our author was not thought a tranſcriber, by writers, who flouriſhed in the reign of Edward III. Henry of Huntingdon publiſhed his hiſtory late in the reign of Henry I. yet it is confeſſed he did not meet with Jeffrey's book till after that publication (12). William of Malmeſbury, who alſo wrote before Jeffrey, as Jeffrey himſelf confeſſes, is not ſaid to have publiſhed his hiſtory ſo early as Mr. Thompſon places the publication of Jeffrey's. We know that Malmeſbury wrote a ſequel to his hiſtory, which begins in the twenty-ſixth year of Henry I. that is, in 1125, and before this time, it is certain, that Jeffrey's book had not ſeen the light (13). Beſides, Jeffrey was made Biſhop of St. Aſaph in 1150, or 1151 (14): is it reaſonable to ſuppoſe that his friends were ſo long before they thought of him, when his book had been in vogue 20 or 30 years? Add to this, that Jeffrey himſelf plainly overturns this ſuppoſition, by the compliment he pays to Robert Earl of Glouceſter, in his dedication, which I ſhall tranſcribe from Mr. Thompſon's own tranſlation (15): 'To 'you, therefore, Robert Earl of Glouceſter, this 'work humbly ſues for the favour of being ſo cor-'rected by your advice, that it may not be thought 'the poor offſpring of Jeffrey of Monmouth, but 'when

On the whole, if ever any epitome of Britiſh Hiſtory deſerved particularly well of the Public in general, and of readers of a nice taſte in particular, we may ſafely ſay this hiſtory of Alfred's is it. For though Huntingdon, Hoveden, Malmeſbury, and other writers, have prefixed ſummaries of ancient hiſtory to the accounts they have left us of their own times; yet are none of them, either in point of accuracy or elegancy, to be compared with this hiſtory, which well deſerves to be tranſlated, and if it might be hoped for, continued with the ſame ſpirit down to later times.

' when poliſhed by your refined wit and judgment, ' the production of him who had Henry the glorious ' King of England for his father, and whom we ' ſee an accompliſhed ſcholar, and philoſopher, as ' well as a brave ſoldier, and expert commander; ' ſo that Britain with joy acknowledges, that in ' you ſhe enjoys another Henry.' Does not this paſſage clearly intimate that King Henry was then dead? Now that Prince deceaſed in 1135 (16), and our author finiſhed his hiſtory in 1128. So much for Mr. Thompſon's ſuppoſition. Ralph Higden in his Polychronicon, cites Jeffrey ſometimes, Alfred ſometimes, and ſometimes he quotes them both together (17). Would he have done this, if he had thought Alfred a mere tranſcriber, and if he was not thought ſo almoſt 400 years ago why ſhould we think him ſo now? Biſhop Nicolſon ſays, that probably all the four treatiſes aſcribed to our Alfred might well be ſtyled, Defloratione Galfredi; i. e. Extracts from Jeffrey (18); but this was only that Prelate's gueſs, who had a mighty knack at characterizing authors he never ſaw, and we have fully proved that he gueſſed wrong; and to do him juſtice, what he afterwards ſays, fully proves that he much doubted whether Alfred ever ſaw Jeffrey's book at all, and for this good reaſon, becauſe he was as early a writer as himſelf (19). This the Biſhop ſuſpected, and we apprehend is now put out of queſtion by Mr. Hearne's publication of his work. C.

ALSOP (VINCENT) a Northamptonſhire man, educated in St. John's College in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (a). He received Deacon's orders from a Biſhop, after which he went down into Rutlandſhire, and ſettled at Oakham, where he was an aſſiſtant to the maſter of the free-ſchool. As he was a man of a ſprightly pleaſant wit, he fell there into indifferent company, but was reclaimed by the frequent admonitions of the reverend Mr. Benjamin King (b). He afterwards married that gentleman's daughter, and becoming a convert to his principles received ordination in the Preſbyterian way, not being ſatisfied with that which he had from the Biſhop [A]. He was ſettled at Willbee in the county of Northampton, whence he was ejected in 1662, for Nonconformity (c). After this he ventured to preach ſometimes at Oakham, and at Wellingborough where he lived, and was once ſix months in priſon for praying by a ſick perſon (d). A book he writ againſt Dr. Sherlock in a humorous ſtyle, made him well known to the world, and induced Mr. Cawton, an eminent Nonconformiſt in Weſtminſter, to recommend him to his congregation for his ſucceſſor. On receiving this call, he quitted Northamptonſhire and came to London, where he preached conſtantly, and wrote ſeveral pieces which were extremely well received by the Public (e). His living in the neighbourhood of the court, expoſed him to many inconveniences: however, he had the good fortune to eſcape impriſonment and fines, by an odd accident, which was, the informers not knowing his Chriſtian name, which for this reaſon he ſtudiouſly concealed. Wood, who mentions him more than once, took his name to be Benjamin, probably from the ſameneſs of Ben and Vin, in their ſound. His ſufferings, however, ended with the reign of Charles II. or at leaſt in the beginning of the next reign, when Mr. Alſop's ſon engaging in treaſonable practices was freely pardoned by King James (f). After this our Divine went frequently to court, and is generally ſuppoſed to have been the perſon who drew the addreſs to that Prince, for his general indulgence [B]. After the Revo-

[A] With that which he had from the Biſhop.] As this is a very remarkable paſſage, it may not be amiſs to cite Dr. Calamy's account, in his own words. ' I have been informed, ſays he, by a very ' worthy perſon, that he had it from Mr. Benjamin ' King of Okeham in Rutland (who was Mr. ' Alſop's father-in-law), that the ſaid Mr. Alſop was ' ordained by a Biſhop; and not being ſatisfied ' with that ordination, was afterwards ordained by ' Preſbyters. I cannot queſtion the truth of this ' paſſage, when I conſider the way of its conveyance; and therefore I ſuppoſe the reaſon of it ' muſt be this: That the Biſhop only admitted ' him into Deacons Orders, and upon this ſuppoſition, he might think that ordination defective, ' ſo as to need ſomething farther, in order to his being capacitated for ſome miniſterial acts, which ' Deacons are not called to. And yet, at the ſame ' time, I am very ſenſible, that ſome of the ejected ' miniſters had no other ordination than that, ' and thought it to be ſufficient. Allowance may be ' very well made for different ſentiments in ſuch ' things as theſe, among perſons of worth and eminence (1).'

[B] Drew the addreſs to that Prince for his indulgence.] This addreſs is now become ſo ſcarce, as to be a kind of curioſity; and therefore I think it cannot be amiſs to reprint it here from an authentic copy. It was preſented by the following miniſters: Mr. Hurſt, Mr. Cheſter, Mr. Slater, Mr. Cox, Mr. Roſwell, Mr. Turner, Mr. Franklin, Mr. Deal, and Mr. Reynolds. The title was, The Humble Addreſs of the Preſbyterians; and thus it ran:

' May it pleaſe your Moſt Sacred Majeſty,

' TO believe the thankfulneſs of our hearts, beyond any expreſſions of our lips or pens, for ' your moſt gracious declaration of liberty for us, in ' the worſhip of God, which we truſt we ſhall ever ' value above our property, as that, without which ' we could enjoy nothing which we could call our ' own, without the greateſt uneaſineſs imaginable: ' But your Majeſty having in the ſame declaration ' alſo ſecured that unto us both by your royal word ' and act: What could your Majeſty have done more ' for us? Or what is left for us further to aſk of the ' King? And foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed your moſt ' excellent majeſty, to give this ſafe port to your poor ' ſubjects, ſo long toſſed with tempeſts, and juſtly to ' believe that loyalty is not entailed to a party, as ' we hope we ſhall ever juſtify the credit which your ' majeſty's charity in that point hath given us; ſo we ' ſhall not ceaſe to bow our knees to the God whom ' we ſerve, and by whom Kings reign, beſeeching ' him to recompenſe this royal favour to your ma' jeſty, with length of days, uninterrupted health,

Revolution, Mr. Alſop gave very public teſtimonies of his affection for the government; yet upon all occaſions he ſpoke very reſpectfully of King James, and retained a very high ſenſe of his clemency, in ſparing his only ſon (g). The remainder of his life he ſpent in the exerciſe of his miniſtry, preaching once every Lord's Day; beſides which he had a Thurſday Lecture, and was one of the Lecturers at Pinner's-hall. He lived to be a very old man, and preſerved his ſpirits to the laſt [C]. On grave ſubjects he wrote with a becoming ſeriouſneſs; but where wit might properly be ſhewn, he diſplayed his to great advantage (b). Anthony Wood indeed repreſents him as a man of mean parts, and meer pretender to genteel raillery (i). But Dr. South, who was full as good a judge of men as Wood, underſtood wit and language much better, and was by no means partial to the Nonconformiſts, allows our author his due praiſe (k). Mr. Alſop died full of days, on the eighth of May 1703 (l). His funeral ſermon was preached by Mr. Slater, and his memory will be always preſerved by his own learned and elegant writings. ' Gentlemen,

' I Have already found two good effects of my de- ' claration; the eaſing and pleaſing my ſubjects ' you ſpake of, and my reſtoring to God, the empire ' over conſcience: it has been my judgment a long ' time, that none has, or ought to have, any power ' over the conſcience but God. I underſtand, there ' are ſome jealouſies among my ſubjects, that I have ' done this in a deſign: But you look like gentle- ' men of too great ingenuity to entertain any ſuch ' ſuſpicion. Gentlemen, I proteſt before God, and ' I deſire you to tell all manner of people of all per- ' ſuaſions, as you have opportunity to converſe with ' them, that I have no other deſign than that I have ' ſpoke of. And, gentlemen, I hope to live to ſee ' the day, when you ſhall as well have Magna ' Charta for the liberty of conſcience, as you have ' had for your properties. And now, gentlemen, ' do you ſo preach to your hearers as they may be ' good Chriſtians, and then I do not queſtion but ' they will be good ſubjects (2).'

[C] Preſerved his ſpirits to the laſt.] We owe alſo this particular to Dr. Calamy, who delivers himſelf in theſe words: ' I was very ſtrictly examined by ' him before my ordination; at which time it falling ' to my lot to make and defend a Latin Theſis, upon ' this queſtion (which he himſelf gave me), An Chriſ- ' tus, Officio Sacerdotali fungatur in Cælis tantum? ' He (for argument's ſake, as in the way of the ' ſchools) oppoſed me with all the vigour, ſmart- ' neſs, and fluency of a young man, though he was ' then conſiderably advanced in years. This was in ' the year 1694, when Mr. Joſeph Bennet, Mr. ' Tho. Reynolds, Mr. Joſeph Hill, Mr. Ebenezer ' Bradſhaw, Mr. Joſhua Bayes, Mr. King of Rum- ' ford, and I, were publicly ordained, in the diſ- ' ſenting place of worſhip by Little St. Helen's: ' The perſons who aſſiſted in, and carried on the ſo- ' lemnity, being Dr. Samuel Anneſley, Mr. Richard ' Stretton, Mr. Vincent Alſop, Mr. (afterwards ' Dr.) Daniel Williams, Mr. Matthew Silveſter, ' and Mr. Thomas Kentiſh, and this was the firſt ' public ordination among the Diſſenters in the city, ' from the time of the taking place of the act of ' Uniformity (3).' AMBROSE (Isaac), a noted Preſbyterian Teacher in the times of the Uſurpation, and author of ſeveral pieces [A], was a Clergyman's ſon, and deſcended from the Ambroſes of Ambroſe-Hall, in Lancaſhire. In the beginning of the year 1621 he was admitted a Batteler of Brazen-Noſe-College in Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Afterwards he took Holy Orders, and officiated in ſome little cure in his own country. Being in very low circumſtances, he was often obliged to the bounty of William, Earl of Bedford, for the relief of himſelf and his family;

[A] He wrote ſeveral pieces.] 1. Prima, Media, and Ultima, or, The Firſt, Middle, and laſt Things; wherein are ſet forth; I. The Doctrine of Regeneration, or the New Birth. II. The Practice of Sanctification, in the Means, Duties, Ordinances, both private and public, for Continuance and Increaſe of a godly Life. III. Certain Meditations of Man's Miſery, in his Life, Death, Judgment, and Execution; as alſo of God's Mercy in our Redemption and Salvation. The Prima and Ultima were printed at London in 1640, in quarto. The Media, taken chiefly out of the writings of the moſt eminent practical Divines, was firſt printed at London (with the Prima and Ultima) in 1650, in quarto; and afterwards in 1659, in quarto. To which is added, a Sermon on Redeeming the Time, preached at Preſton, January 4, 1657, at the funeral of Lady Margaret Houghton. The authors, whom he abridges in the Media, were moſtly Separatiſts. The book was licenſed by Mr. Charles Herle, and recommended to the world by John Angier, Thomas Johnſon, and John Waite, B. D. in their reſpective epiſtles prefixed to it. At length, all three were printed together at London in 1674, in a large folio, with a print of the author, aged fifty-nine. The book was reprinted in 1682, and again in 1689, both editions in folio. 2. Looking upon Jeſus. A View of the everlaſting Goſpel, or the Soul's eyeing of Jeſus as carrying on the great Work of Man's Salvation. London, 1658, 4*to*. In the penning of which piece, Mr. Wood tells us, he took great delight, it being a ſubject, as the author himſelf complains, almoſt wholly neglected by others. 3. War with Devils, Miniſtration of, and Communication with, Angels; printed with the former. At the end of this treatiſe are ſubjoined two letters, the firſt written by Richard Baxter, dated London, November 29, 1661; and the other by William Cole, dated Preſton, October 8, 1661 (1). B.

and Mr. Wood thinks, that Lord procured him to be inſerted in the liſt of his Majeſty's preachers appointed for the county of Lancaſter. Afterwards, upon the change of the times in 1641, he left the Church of England, and went over to the Preſbyterian party, took the Covenant, and became a preacher of the Goſpel at Garſtang, and afterwards at Preſton in his own country. He was very zealous and very active againſt the Clergy of the eſtabliſhed Church; eſpecially when he was appointed Aſſiſtant to the commiſſioners for ejecting ſuch whom they then called ſcandalous and ignorant Miniſters and School-maſters. AMBROSIUS AURELIANUS (a), or AURELIUS AMBROSIUS (b), a famous General of the ancient Britons, and afterwards King, was of Roman extraction [A], and commonly ſuppoſed to be ſon of one of the Kings, elected by the Britons after the Romans had left the iſland (c). He was educated at the court of Aldroen King of Armorica; who, at the requeſt of the Britons, ſent him over (d), at the head of ten thouſand men, to aſſiſt them againſt the Saxons, whom Vortigern their King had invited into Britain. Ambroſius's ſucceſs againſt the Saxons was ſo conſiderable, that the Britons choſe him for their King (e), obliging Vortigern to yield to him all the weſtern part of the kingdom, divided by the Roman highway called Watling Street. Some time after, the Britons being diſcontented with Vortigern, and having withdrawn their allegiance from him, that unhappy Prince retired to a caſtle in Wales; where being beſieged by Ambroſius, and the caſtle taking fire, he periſhed in the flames (f), and left his rival ſole Monarch of Britain (g), who now took upon him the Imperial Purple after the manner of the Roman Emperors. Geoffrey of Monmouth pretends (b), that Ambroſius built Stone-henge near Saliſbury in Wiltſhire [B], in memory of three hundred Britiſh Lords, who were maſſacred by the Saxon General

[A] He was of Roman extraction.] 'Common 'opinion (ſays Mr. Milton) but grounded chiefly on 'the Britiſh fables, makes this Ambroſius to be the 'younger ſon of that Conſtantine, whoſe eldeſt was 'Conſtance the Monk: who both loſt their lives 'abroad uſurping the empire. But the expreſs words 'both of Gildas and Bede aſſure us, that the parents 'of this Ambroſius, having here borne regal dignity, 'were ſlain in the Pictiſh wars and commotions in the 'iſland (1).' Gildas's words here referred to are theſe: 'Duce Ambroſio Aureliano viro modeſto '(qui ſolus fortè Romanæ gentis tantæ tempeſtatis 'colliſioni, occiſis in eadem parentibus purpura ni'mirum indutis, ſuperfuerat ——) vires capeſſunt '(2); *i. e. [B] It is ſaid, Ambroſius built Stone-henge near Saliſtury in Wiltſhire.] Geoffrey of Monmouth fables, that Ambroſius, coming to a monaſtery near Kaercaradoc, now Saliſbury, where the three hundred Britiſh Lords maſſacred by Hengiſt lay buried, and reſolving to perpetuate the memory of this action by ſome remarkable building, ordered his workmen to prepare a large quantity of ſtones and other materials. But having, at the inſtigation of Tremounus Archbiſhop of Caer-leon, conſulted the famous Merlin, that magician adviſed him to ſend over to Ireland for certain great ſtones, which were called Chorea Gigantum; i. e. The Giant's Dance, and which were to be found placed in a circle on a hill called Killair; having been brought thither by certain giants from the fartheſt borders of Africa, at the time when that country was inhabited by giants. Whereupon Uther Pendragon, Ambroſius's brother, and a body of forces, were ſent into Ireland to fetch theſe ſtones; but were oppoſed in their attempt by Gillomanius King of the country, who at firſt derided the folly of the Britons in undertaking ſo ridiculous an expedition, but afterwards reſolved to fruſtrate their deſign. Nevertheleſs the Britons, having vanquiſhed that Prince in battle, found means to bring away the ſtones, though not without great difficulty, and through the direction and aſſiſtance of Merlin, who had accompanied them. Theſe wonderful ſtones, by order of Ambroſius, were placed over the graves of the Britiſh Lords, and are what is now called Stone-henge (4). Alexander Neham celebrates this fable in the following verſes (5):

Nobilis eſt lapidum ſtructura, chorea gigantum:
Ars experta ſuum poſſe peregit opus.
Quod ne prodiret in lucem ſegnius, artem
Se, vireſque ſuas conſuluiſſe reor.
Hoc opus adſcribit Merlino garrula fama;
Filia figmenti fabula vana refert.
Illa congerie fertur decorata fuiſſe
Tellus, quæ mittit tot Palamedis aves.
Hinc tantum munus ſuſcepit Hibernia gaudens:
Nam virtus lapidi cuilibet ampla ſatis.
Nam reſperſus aquis magnam transfudit in illas
Vim, queis curari ſæpius æger eget.
Uther Pendragon molem tranſvexit ad Ambrî
Fines, de victo victor ab hoſte means.
O quot nobilium, quot corpora ſacra virorum
Illic Hengiſti proditione jacent!
Intercepta fuit gens inclyta, gens generoſa;
Intercepta, nimis credula, cauta nimis.

Giraldus Cambrenſis mentions this Britiſh fable: 'Juxta Britannicam hiſtoriam (ſays he) lapides iſtos 'Rex Britonum Aurelius Ambroſius, divina Merlini 'diligentia, de Hibernia in Britanniam advehi pro'curavit; & ut tanti facinoris egregium aliquod 'memoriale relinqueret, eodem ordine & arte quâ 'prius, in loco conſtituit, ubi occultis Saxonum cul'tris Britanniæ flos cecidit, & ſub pacis obtentu, ne'quitiæ telis, male tuta regni juventus occubuit (6). '——According to the Britiſh hiſtory, Ambroſius 'King of the Britons, by the advice and aſſiſtance of 'the enchanter Merlin, procured theſe ſtones to be 'brought from Ireland into Britain; and that he might 'leave ſome remarkable monument of ſo baſe an action, 'he ranged them in the ſame order, in which they had 'been diſpoſed before, on the very ſpot, where the 'flower of the Britiſh youth, not ſuſpecting any trea'chery, fell by the concealed daggers of the Saxons, un'der the pretence of peace and friendſhip.' Polydore Vergil aſſigns another origin of Stone-henge. He tells us, it was erected by the Britons as a monument to their General Ambroſius, on the place where he fell in battle, to perpetuate the memory of his glorious actions, and ſervices done to his country. Britannus duci ſuo Ambroſio de republica bene merito magnificum poſuit ſepulchrum, factum ad formam coronæ, ex magnis quadratis lapidibus, eo loco ubi pugnando ceciderat; ut tanti ducis virtus ne oblivione eorum, qui tunc erant, aut reticentia poſterorum inſepulta eſſet (7). And in John of Tinmouth (8), the place, which is now called Stone-henge, is ſtyled 'Mons Ambroſii, Ambroſius's Hill.' I ſhall only obſerve, that both theſe ſtories are rejected by our beſt antiquarians, though they are by no means agreed as to the true origin of that famous piece of antiquity.

AMES

[C] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct againſt the enemies of his country.] Some time after the ravage and burning of the iſland, the Saxons gave over purſuing the Britons, and marched back to their head-quarters. But, the enemy being out of ſight, the Britons began to recover their ſpirits, to peep out of their hiding-places, and draw into a body. And having reſolved upon an attempt to recover their country, they unanimouſly, in the firſt place, implored the protection of heaven: then, under the conduct of Ambroſius, they marched up into the country, gave the enemy battle, and providentially defeated them. After this victory, the fortunes of the Britons and Saxons were various, and ſeemed to hang in ſuſpenſe, until the battle of Banneſdon near Bath, in which the Saxons were entirely routed, about forty-four years after their arrival in Britain. At ubi hoſtilis exercitus, exterminatis diſperſiſque inſulæ indigenis, domum reverſus eſt, cæperunt illi paulatim vires animoſque reſumere, emergentes de latibulis quibus abditi fuerant, & unanimo conſenſu auxilium cæleſte precantes, ne uſque ad internecionem uſquequaque delerentur. —— Hoc ergo duce (ſc. Ambroſio Aureliano) vires capeſſunt Britones, & victores provocantes ad prælium, victoriam ipſi, Deo favente, ſuſcipiunt. Et ex eo tempore nunc cives, nunc hoſtes vincebant, uſque ad annum obſeſſionis Badonici montis, quando non minimas eiſdem hoſtibus ſtrages dabant, quadrageſimo circiter & quarto anno adventus eorum in Britanniam (9).

(9) Bede, ubi ſupra.

[D] He regulated the affairs of the Church.] After the Britons had defeated the Saxons, and obliged them to retire a good way Northward, Ambroſius is ſaid to have convened the Princes and great men at York; where he gave orders for repairing the churches deſtroyed by the Saxons, and reſtoring the exerciſe of religion to its former luſtre (10). This, though reported by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a writer of no great credit; yet, in the opinion of the learned Dr. Stillingfleet (11), is agreeable enough to probability. Beſides, it is confirmed by Matthew of Weſtminſter (12), who highly applauds the great zeal of Ambroſius in repairing the churches, encouraging the clergy, and reſtoring the honour of religion. The Monmouth hiſtorian adds (13), that, in a council of the Britons, Ambroſius gave directions for two metropolitans to ſupply the vacancies of York and Caer-leon, Sampſon being promoted to the former, and Dubricius to the latter. Hector Boethius likewiſe tells us (14), that Ambroſius reſtored the churches, recalled the clergy, and eſtabliſhed the exerciſe of true religion; that he broke in pieces the images of the Heathen gods, and ſeverely puniſhed their Prieſts. And he adds, that ſome of the Saxons, whom this Prince had permitted to remain in Britain, though they outwardly profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians, yet continued privately to offer ſacrifice to their idols; which thing being diſcovered, their Prieſts were ſeized, and ſcourged, and all of them without pity burnt at the ſtake. Chriſti Templa Ambroſi piâ operâ reſtituta; Pontifices Sacerdoteſque ſuas ſunt vocati in ſedes; vera religio undique culta; deorum gentilium ſtatuæ effractæ; qui gentilitatis ſacerdotes inventi in Britannia, diris ſuppliciis affecti. —— Verum Saxonum nonnulli in Britannia Ambroſio permittente remanentes, Chriſtianum ementientes religionem, clam idolis litabant: quâ re compertâ, capti ſacrificuli, cæſi loris, ullâ ſine commiſeratione ad unum ſunt cremati. Here may be inſerted the following unpoliſhed verſes of Gotfrid of Viterbo (15), in which, at the ſame time that he celebrates Ambroſius for reſtoring peace to his country, and regulating affairs both in Church and State he accuſes him of a perſecuting ſpirit, and of favouring Jews and Heretics, particularly the Manichæans.

[F] He was killed in a battle, which he loſt —— againſt Cerdick, one of the Saxon Generals.] This battle was fought near a place, thence called by the Saxons Cerdick's-ford, afterwards Cerdeford, and now by contraction Chardford. Here the Britons and Saxons engaged; and the former giving ground, Ambroſius, now grown old and infirm, endeavoured in vain to rally them; and in the fury of his deſpair, threw himſelf into the midſt of the enemy, where his glorious life was crowned with an honourable death (17). Upon this occaſion the hiſtorians give Ambroſius the name of Nazaleod or Natanleod. It is true, this appellation has induced many to believe, that Ambroſius is not here meant, but ſome other Britiſh King. But the opinion of Camden (18), and other good authors, who make Ambroſius and Nazaleod to be the ſame, is to be preferred. For it is agreed by the beſt hiſtorians, that this Prince was ſlain in fight. But, from the beginning of his reign, we find no battle, in which a Britiſh Monarch was killed, but that of the year 508, in which Ambroſius fell. And this Prince was too remarkable for hiſtorians to neglect mentioning his death, if it happened on any other occaſion. B.

[The ingenious Mr. Whitaker, in his hiſtory of Mancheſter, hath related ſeveral particulars concerning Ambroſius, which are very different from ſome of thoſe given in the preceding article; and, in all probability, upon the whole, better founded. According to this learned antiquary, on information from the Romans of their deſign immediately to withdraw their forces from the iſland, the Monarchs of the tribes convened, and wiſely determined to elect a Pendragon (19), and concentrate all the military power of the provinces under one Monarch. Two perſons ſeem to have been propoſed for the office, Vortigern, the Sovereign of the Dimetæ, and Ambroſius Aurelianus, ſon to the King of the Damnonii. The latter was half a Roman by deſcent, and naturally ſupported by the Roman intereſt. The former was entirely a Briton, and as naturally (19) The Pendragon was a kind of Dictator among the Britons, or Commandant of the King's. Whitaker's Hiſt. of Mancheſter, Book the 1ſt. Vol. ii. p. 206, 8vo Edition.

turally ſeconded by the original Britons. The native intereſt of the country prevailed, and Vortigern was nominated the Pendragon of the Britons; by which nomination he was not made, as his predeceſſors had been, merely the Commandant of a few tribes, but became the Sovereign of the five provinces, and the firſt general Monarch of South Britain, his dominions extending from the Channel to the Friths (20). But though Ambroſius was diſappointed of his election for the Pendragonſhip, he afterwards generouſly ſubmitted to ſerve under his rival, and was appointed Commander of the Northern army againſt the Saxons, in which ſituation he was ſeveral times defeated by Ochta, a younger ſon of Hengiſt (21). When Vortigern abdicated the Pendragonſhip, Ambroſius, already the Sovereign of the Damnonii by the death of his father, was recalled from the North, raiſed to the ſupremacy, and inſtantly took charge in perſon of the war carrying on againſt the Saxons in Kent (22). Arthur, who had been trained up to war under the auſpices of Ambroſius, was ſent by this monarch to ſtop the progreſs of the Saxons among the Northern Britons, in which he was remarkably ſucceſsful. Some of the exploits performed by Arthur have been attributed to Ambroſius (23). Of Ambroſius's deceaſe and character, Mr. Whitaker, in his detail of Arthur's tranſactions, hath given the following relation: 'The dictatorſhip became va'cant by the death of Ambroſius in 508, the Na-
'tanleod of the Damnonii, Nathan Leod or the 'chief of the people (24), and Rex maximus or 'Pendragon of the provinces. This Hero, grown 'grey in the ſervice of his country and the varying
'ſcenes of war, united all the forces of the Britons
'againſt the combined troops of the Saxons, and put
'the long conteſt on the iſſue of a general engage'ment. And though now advanced beyond the 'eightieth year of his age, the renowned warrior at'tacked the right wing of the enemy with all the 'impetuoſity of twenty, and drove it before him 'out of the field with great ſlaughter. This native
'fire of Ambroſius, which neither the chilling hand
'of ſo many years of age, nor the reſtraining expe'rience of ſixty of war, had been able to ſubdue or 'regulate, was the cauſe probably of many of the 'preceding calamities. It was now the occaſion of 'a great one to himſelf and his country. For the 'other wing of the Saxons took advantage of the in-
'diſcretion, attacked the purſuing monarch vigor-
'ouſly in the rear, and laid him and five thouſand
'of his men dead upon the field. Thus fell the 'gallant and worthy Ambroſius; and his ſon ſuc-
'ceeded him in the ſovereignty of the Damnonii,
'and his grandſon Conſtantine poſſeſſed it in the 'days of Gildas. Thus he fell, and Arthur was 'nominated to the Pendragonſhip (25).'

We are ſurpriſed that it did not occur to Mr. Whitaker, that the youth of Ambroſius forms a ſtrong objection to the ſuppoſition of his having been a competitor with Vortigern for the Pendragonſhip. He could not, at that time, have been twenty years of age; and, therefore, it was not likely that, in a period ſo critical and dangerous, he ſhould have been ſet up in oppoſition to a man of Vortigern's reputed abilities, weight, and experience.] K.

AMES (WILLIAM) a Divine in the reigns of King James and King Charles I. famous for his caſuiſtical and controverſial writings; but much more ſo abroad, than in his native country; for he lived many years in foreign parts, and there ended his days: yet as foreigners, who have endeavoured to give account of him and his works, have done it imperfectly, and Bayle among the reſt, we ſhall attempt to ſay ſomething of him more complete. He was deſcended from the ancient family of that name, which remains in Norfolk and Somerſetſhire, and was born in the year 1576. He was educated at Chriſt-Church-college in Cambridge, under the famous Mr. William Perkins, who died in 1602; from whom, probably, imbibing ſome Calviniſtical tenets, he became afterwards very diſtinguiſhable for maintaining the ſame; inſomuch that he gave ſome diſguſt to certain perſons in that univerſity, while he reſided there Fellow of the college aforeſaid. One inſtance of this is given us by Dr. Fuller (a), who informs us, 'That about the year 1610-11, this Mr. Ames, preaching at St. Mary's, or, to uſe
'his own expreſſion, having the place of a Watchman for an hour in the Tower of the 'univerſity (b), took occaſion to inveigh againſt the liberty taken at that time; eſpe-
'cially in thoſe colleges which had Lords of Miſrule, a Pagan relique; which, he ſaid,
'as Polydore Vergil has obſerved (c), remains only in England. Hence he proceeded 'to condemn all playing at cards and dice; affirming, that the latter in all ages was 'accounted the device of the Devil; and that as God invented the one and twenty 'letters, whereof he made the Bible, the Devil, ſaith an author (d), found out the one
'and twenty ſpots on the die; that Canon Law forbad the uſe thereof, ſeeing, Inventio
'Diaboli, nullâ conſuetudine poteſt validari (e). His ſermon, continues our author, gave 'much offence to many of his auditors; the rather becauſe in him there was a con'currence of much Nonconformity; inſomuch that to prevent an expulſion from Dr.
'Val. Cary, the Maſter, he fairly forſook the college, which proved unto him neither
'loſs nor diſgrace; being, not long after, by the States of Frieſland, choſen Profeſſor
'of their univerſity.' It may not be improbable, that upon the rigour with which Archbiſhop Bancroft preſſed Conformity on the Puritans, for their ſeparation from the Church, many learned men of them retired into the Low Countries; where Engliſh churches were erected after the Preſbyterian model, and maintained by the States according to the treaty with Queen Elizabeth, as the French and Dutch churches were in England. But that 'the reverend and learned Dr. William Ames, one of the moſt
'acute controverſial writers of his age,' as a late author ſtyles him (f), ſettled with the Engliſh Church at the Hague, before that Archbiſhop's death; or, as he writes more expreſsly in another place, that he fled from the perſecution of that Archbiſhop, and became Miniſter of the Engliſh Church there (g), does not ſtrictly ſort with chronology; becauſe the Archbiſhop appears by his monumental inſcription (h), to have died ſome months before that ſermon above was preached by Mr. Ames, at St. Mary's. And Bayle ſays, he publiſhed his book in favour of Puritaniſm the ſame year in England. It might not, however, be long after, that he went to the Hague; for in 1613, his diſpute with Grevinchovius, Miniſter at Rotterdam, appeared in print. From thence we are told, he was invited by the States of Frieſland, to the Divinity Chair in the univerſity of Franeker; which he filled with univerſal reputation for many years. He

He was at the Synod of Dort in 1618, and informed King James's Ambaſſador, from time to time, of the debates of that aſſembly (i). After he had been at leaſt twelve years in the Doctor's Chair at Franeker, he reſigned his Profeſſorſhip, and accepted of an invitation to the Engliſh congregation at Rotterdam, the air of Franeker being too ſharp for him, who was troubled with ſuch a difficulty of breathing, that he concluded every Winter would be his laſt. Beſides, he was deſirous of preaching to his own countrymen, which he had diſuſed for many years. He held many public diſputes, publiſhed many learned books, and was a very popular man in all this time; but as his writings were publiſhed abroad, and it is difficult to come at the firſt editions, ſo as to mention them diſtinctly, according to the courſe of publication, we ſhall caſt them in a note together at the latter end. Upon his removal to Rotterdam, he wrote his Freſh Suit againſt Ceremonies, but lived not to publiſh it himſelf; for his conſtitution was ſo ſhattered, that the air of Holland did him no ſervice, upon which he determined to remove to New England; but his aſthma returning, at the beginning of the Winter, put an end to his life at Rotterdam; where he was buried on the fourteenth of November N. S 1633 (*). In the Spring following his wife and children embarked for New England, and carried with them his valuable library of books, which was a rich treaſure to that country at that time. He was a very learned Divine, concludes my laſt cited author; a ſtrict Calviniſt in doctrine, and of the perſuaſion of the Independents, with regard to the ſubordination and power of Claſſes and Synods (k). The ſame year he died, his Freſh Suit againſt Ceremonies was publiſhed, we ſuppoſe at Rotterdam, for no place is mentioned. The editor informs us, that 'with the coming forth of this 'book into the light, the learned and famous author, Dr. Ames, left the light, or 'darkneſs rather, of this world. And though his name, in this controverſy, was 'hitherto concealed, yet that which was generally but imagined before (that the 'Reply, and this Freſh Suit, to Dr. Burgeſs's Rejoynder, were his work), is now certainly 'known to be his. It pleads truth ſuccinctly and perſpicuouſly, as indeed his vein in all 'his writings and diſcourſes did moſt admirably lead him to do. Concluding, that he 'ſhewed himſelf a pattern of holineſs, a burning and ſhining light, a lamp of learning 'and arts, a champion for truth, eſpecially while he was, for the ſpace of twelve 'years at leaſt, in the Doctor's Chair at Franeker, &c. (l)' After this advertiſement follows a copper print of him, in a little black ſilk cap, thin piqued beard, ruff about his neck, and a cloak over his ſhoulder. The inſcription round it mentions him to be fifty-ſeven years of age, in the year of his death. On the back of this picture is a teſtimony by S. O. aſſerting, 'That the Doctor's books are famous in all Europe; 'upon which many have come to him out of Hungary, Poland, Pruſſia, and Flan-'ders, to be educated; as ſundry ſtudents in our land can teſtify: and I myſelf, and 'divers others have heard them affirm, they would not have ſtayed there, but for the 'liking they had of him.' Of theſe works, there is alſo in this book a catalogue; which, becauſe ſhort and imperfect, we ſhall, in a note below, enlarge [A]; and conclude

[B] To prevent their being confounded with him.] One of them, named alſo William Ames, was a Divine and publiſher of ſome tracts; but, indeed, later in time; he was a Maſter of Arts, and in 1651, preached a ſermon before the Lord Mayor of London, John Kendrick, which was ſoon after printed (5). Whether this was ſon of the former, we are not poſitive; nor whether he was the ſame with that William Ames, who was a Quaker, at Amſterdam, and publiſher of many books; from 1657, to 1677, and after; fourteen of which written in Dutch, may be more particularly ſeen in the author who has taken the pains to preſerve their titles (6). Another of this ſurname, was Edward Ames, ſtiled Biſhop of Cork and Roſs, and author of two ſermons, called The Proteſtant Peace-maker; with a Poſtſcript or Notes on Mr. Baxter's, and ſome other late writings for peace, 4*to*. Lond. 1682 (7). But that he was Biſhop of the ſaid See at the date of that work, does not clearly appear in the ſucceſſion of Iriſh Biſhops: for Dr. Edward Wetenhall is ſaid to have held the ſame, from 1678 to the year 1699, and then was ſucceeded by Dr. Dive Downes (8). [AMHURST (NICHOLAS), a Poet and a political writer of the preſent century, was ſo much talked of for a time, and ſo cloſely connected with the leaders of the grand oppoſition to Sir Robert Walpole's adminiſtration, that, notwithſtanding we have but few materials with regard to the circumſtances of his life, he cannot be entirely omitted. He was born at Marden in Kent, but in what year is uncertain (a). Under the protection and care of his grandfather, who was a Clergyman, he received his grammatical education at Merchant-Taylor's ſchool in London; and from thence he was removed to St. John's College, Oxford, where his behaviour was ſuch as occaſioned his expulſion (b). What the particular and ſpecific charges againſt him were, we are not informed; but, in general, he is ſaid to have been expelled for the libertiniſm of his principles, the irregularity of his conduct, and ſome offence which he had given to the head of the college (c). From his own account of the matter, in the dedication of his poems to Dr. Delaune, Preſident of St. John's, and in his Terræ Filius, we may collect that he wiſhed to have it underſtood, that he was ſolely perſecuted for the liberality of his ſentiments, and his attachment to the cauſe of the Revolution and of the Hanover ſucceſſion; but he had probably been guilty of real miſbehaviour [A]. Whatever were the cauſes of his expulſion, his reſentment, on the account of it, was very great. He made it, therefore, his buſineſs to ſatirize the learning and diſcipline of the Univerſity of Oxford, and to expoſe the characters of ſeveral gentlemen who were deemed a part of its moſt reſpectable members (d). This he did in a Poem, publiſhed in 1724, called Oculus Britanniæ, and in his Terræ Filius, a work in which there is a conſiderable portion of wit, intermixed with much abuſe and ſcurrility [B]. [A] From his own account of the matter, &c.] Mr. Amhurſt's relation of the cauſes of his expulſion, in his Dedication to Dr. Delaune, is entirely ironical, (as is the whole dedication) and is as follows:

'You'll pardon me, good Sir, if I think it neceſſary for your Honour to mention the many 'heinous crimes for which I was brought to ſhame. 'None were indeed publicly alledged againſt me at 'that time, becauſe it might as well be done afterwards; ſure old Engliſhmen can never forget that 'there is ſuch a thing as hanging a man firſt, and 'trying him afterwards: ſo fared it with me; my 'proſecutors firſt proved me, by an undeniable argument, to be no Fellow of St. John's College, 'and then to be ——— the Lord knows what.

'My indictment may be collected out of the 'faithful annals of common fame, which run thus:

'Advices from Oxford ſay, that on the 29th of 'June, 1719, one Nicholas Amhurſt of St. John's 'College was expelled for the following reaſons:

'Imprimis, for loving foreign turneps and Preſbyterian Biſhops.

'Item, For ingratitude to his benefactor, that 'ſpotleſs martyr, William Laud.

'Item, for believing that ſteeples and organs are 'not neceſſary to ſalvation.

'Item, For preaching without orders, and praying without a commiſſion.

'Item, For lampooning prieſtcraft and petticoat 'craft.

'My natural modeſty will not permit me, like 'other apologiſts, to vindicate myſelf in any one 'particular; the whole charge is ſo artfully drawn 'up, that no reaſonable perſon would ever think 'the better of me, ſhould I juſtify myſelf till 'Doomeſday.' Towards the cloſe of the Dedication, he takes occaſion to complain of ſome ſeverities uſed againſt him, at the time of his being excluded the College. 'But I muſt complain of one 'thing, whether reaſonable or not, let the world 'judge. When I was voted out of your college, 'and the nuiſance was thereby removed, I thought 'the reſentments of the holy ones would have proceeded no further; I am ſure the cauſe of virtue 'and ſound religion I was thought to offend, required no more: nor could it be of any poſſible 'advantage to the Church, to deſcend to my private affairs, and ſtir up my creditors in the univerſity to take hold of me at a diſadvantage, before 'I could get any money returned; but there are 'ſome perſons in the world, who think nothing unjuſt or inhuman in the proſecution of their implacable revenge (1).' In the 45th number of the Terræ Filius, he gives a ſerious account of the cauſes of his expulſion; and expreſsly aſcribes it to his attachment to the conſtitution, and the principles of civil and religious liberty. It will be apparent, however, from an attentive conſideration of even his own hiſtories of the affair, that he had been guilty of imprudencies and irregularities which furniſhed very oſtenſible, and, we doubt not, ſtatutable reaſons for his being excluded from the college. The ſentence for expelling him was not unanimous. Out of fourteen fellows who were preſent, four expreſſed their diſſent. And it is repreſented that theſe gentlemen were afterwards ſeverely perſecuted, for having given a conſcientious vote in Mr. Amhurſt's favour (2).

ſettled in London as a writer by profeſſion. He publiſhed a volume of Miſcellanies, which had principally been written at the Univerſity. Theſe Miſcellanies are upon a variety of ſubjects, both ſacred and profane. They are partly originals, and partly paraphraſes, imitations, and tranſlations; and conſiſt of tales, epigrams, epiſtles, love-verſes, elegies, and ſatires. They begin with a beautiful paraphraſe on the Moſaic account of the Creation, and end with a very humorous tale upon the diſcovery of that uſeful utenſil, a bottle-ſcrew (e). Mr. Amhurſt was the author, likewiſe, of "An Epiſtle to Sir John Blount, Bart." one of the Directors of the South-Sea Company in 1720 (f); of "The Britiſh General, a Poem ſacred to the memory of his "Grace John Duke of Marlborough;" and of "Strephon's Revenge, a ſatire on the "Oxford Toaſts (g)." Our poet, who had a great enmity to the exorbitant demands and domineering ſpirit of the High-Church Clergy, and who had early, at Oxford, diſplayed his zeal againſt prieſtly power, diſcovered this particularly in a poem, intitled The Convocation, in five cantos; which is a kind of ſatire againſt all the writers who had oppoſed Biſhop Hoadly, in the famous Bangorian Controverſy (h). He tranſlated, alſo, Mr. Addiſon's Reſurrection, and ſome other of his Latin poems (i). But the principal literary undertaking of Mr. Amhurſt was, his conducting the celebrated political paper, called The Craftſman, which was written againſt Sir Robert Walpole's miniſtry, and was carried on for a number of years, with great ſpirit and ſucceſs. This paper was more read and attended to than any production of the kind which had hitherto been publiſhed in England. Ten or twelve thouſand were ſold in a day (k); and the effect which it had in raiſing the indignation of the people, and in controlling the power of adminiſtration, was very conſiderable. This effect was not entirely, or chiefly, owing to the abilities of Mr. Amhurſt. He was aſſiſted by Lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pulteney, and probably by other leaders of the oppoſition. Their fame, and their writings, were the grand ſupport of the Craftſman. Nevertheleſs, Mr. Amhurſt's own papers are allowed to have been compoſed with ability and ſpirit; and he conducted the Craftſman, in the very zenith of its proſperity, with no ſmall reputation to himſelf. On the 2d of July 1737, there appeared in that publication, an ironical letter, written in the name of Colley Cibber, the deſign of which was to ridicule the act that had juſt paſſed for licenſing plays. In this letter, the laureat propoſes himſelf to the Lord Chamberlain to be made ſuperintendant of the old plays, as ſtanding equally in need of correction with the new ones; and produces ſeveral paſſages from Shakeſpeare, and other poets, in relation to Kings, Queens, Princes, and Miniſters of State, which, he ſays, are not now fit to be brought on the ſtage. The printer, &c. having been laid hold of by order of Government, Mr. Amhurſt voluntarily ſurrendered himſelf in their ſtead; and, after having been kept in cuſtody ten days, was obliged to bring his Habeas Corpus for his liberty, before he could obtain it; becauſe he refuſed to give bail for his good behaviour, as well as his appearance. The Miniſtry, we believe, prudently dropped the proſecution (l). Notwithſtanding Mr. Amhurſt's merit with his party, he was totally neglected by them, when they made their terms with the Crown; and he died ſoon after, of a fever, at Twickenham. His death happened on the 27th of April, 1742 (m); and his diſorder was probably occaſioned, in a great meaſure, by the ill uſage he had received. Mr. Ralph, in his Caſe of Authors, ſpeaks with a juſt feeling and indignation upon the ſubject. 'Poor Amhurſt! after having been the drudge of his party for the beſt part 'of twenty years together, was as much forgotten in the famous compromiſe of 1742, 'as if he had never been born! And when he died of what is called a broken heart, 'which happened a few months afterwards, became indebted to the charity of a book-'ſeller for a grave; not to be traced now, becauſe then no otherwiſe to be diſtinguiſhed, 'than by the freſhneſs of the turf, borrowed from the next common to cover it (n).' A very late writer, in the character of Mr. Pulteney, expreſſes himſelf concerning the treatment of Mr. Amhurſt, in the following terms: 'But if the Earl of Bath had his 'liſt of penſioners, how comes it that Amhurſt was forgotten? The fate of this poor 'man is ſingular: He was the able aſſociate of Bolingbroke and Pulteney, in writing 'the celebrated weekly paper, called The Craftſman. His abilities were unqueſtion-'able; he had almoſt as much wit, learning, and various knowledge, as his two 'partners; and when thoſe great maſters choſe not to appear in public themſelves, 'he ſupplied their places ſo well, that his Eſſays were often aſcribed to them. Am-'hurſt ſurvived the downfal of Walpole's power, and had reaſon to expect a reward

Amidſt all the malignity and exaggeration with which the Terræ Filius abounds, it contains ſome curious anecdotes relative to the principles, manners, and conduct, of ſeveral members of the Univerſity, for a few years after the acceſſion of King George I. It had been an ancient cuſtom in the Univerſity of Oxford, at public acts, for ſome perſon, who was called Terræ Filius, to mount the roſtrum, and divert a large crowd of ſpectators, who flocked to hear him from all parts, with a merry oration in the Feſcennino manner, interſperſed with ſecret hiſtory, raillery, and ſarcaſm, as the occaſions of the times ſupplied him with matter (3). Wood, in his Athenæ, mentions ſeveral inſtances of this cuſtom; and from hence it was that Mr. Amhurſt took the title of his work. It was originally written in 1721, in a periodical paper, which came out twice a week, and conſiſts of fifty numbers.

Mr. Amhurſt was probably one of thoſe imprudent and extravagant men, whoſe irregularities, in ſpite of their talents, bring them, at length, into general diſeſteem and neglect. But this does not excuſe the conduct of his employers. His want of purity in morals (if that was his real character) was no objection to their connection with him, when he could ſerve their purpoſe. And they ought to have ſo far provided for him, as to have placed him above neceſſity, during the remainder of his days. [AMORY (THOMAS), a learned Divine, and a writer of conſiderable note among the Proteſtant Diſſenters, in the preſent century, was born at Taunton in Somerſetſhire, on the 28th of January 1700-1 (a). His father was a reputable grocer in that town, and both his parents were perſons of eminent integrity, piety, and benevolence. The ſon was early diſtinguiſhed by the ſame turn of mind, and by his inclination for literary improvements. His claſſical learning he acquired at his native place, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Chadwick, a Diſſenting Clergyman, who had the ſatisfaction of educating many miniſters and gentlemen of good reputation in the Weſt of England (b). From Taunton he was removed for a time to Exeter, that he might be inſtructed in the French language by the Rev. Mr. Majendie, a refugee Miniſter in that city, grandfather of the worthy Dr. Majendie, Canon of Windſor, who has had the honour of being Preceptor in the Engliſh tongue to her preſent Majeſty. After young Amory had obtained the knowledge of the French language, he returned to the care of Mr. Chadwick, where he had for his ſchool-fellow Mr. Micaiah Towgood, who has ſince been much diſtinguiſhed among the Diſſenters, as their ableſt advocate in the points of controverſy which occaſion their ſeparation from the Church of England. At Lady-day 1717, they were both of them put under the academical inſtruction of the Rev. Mr. Stephen James, and the Rev. Mr. Henry Grove, who during the reign of Queen Anne, had been joint tutors at Taunton, for bringing up young perſons to the Miniſtry; but upon the paſſing of the Schiſm Bill, had deſiſted from that employment, till King George the Firſt was well eſtabliſhed in the throne. Under theſe Preceptors, Mr. Amory went through the uſual preparatory learning; and in the Summer of 1722, was examined and approved of, as a candidate for the miniſtry [A]. However, being deſirous of ſtill farther improvement, he removed, in the November following, to London, and attended a courſe of experimental philoſophy, under Mr. John Eames, an eminent Tutor among the Diſſenters [B]. Upon his return to Taunton, he preached alternately at ſeveral places in the neighbourhood, till, upon Mr. James's death in 1724 or 1725, and Mr. Grove's being choſen to ſucceed him as Paſtor of the congregation at Fullwood, Mr. Amory was fixed as a ſtated aſſiſtant preacher, once a month, to the Rev. Mr. Darch of Hull-Biſhops; beſide which, he had one monthly turn at Lumbrook near South-Petherton, and another at Weſt Hatch, four miles from Taunton. At the ſame time, he was requeſted by his uncle, Mr. Grove (c), to take a part in the inſtruction of the pupils, in the room of Mr. James, with which requeſt he complied. The buſineſs aſſigned him he diſcharged with great ability and diligence; being well qualified for it by his knowledge in, and taſte for, the fineſt Grecian and Roman claſſics, and by his thorough acquaintance with the beſt and lateſt improvements in ſound philoſophy. In 1730, he was ordained at Paul's

[A] Examined and approved of, as a candidate for the miniſtry.] When young men, among the Diſſenters, have paſſed through, or nearly finiſhed their academical courſe, they undergo an examination either of the truſtees and tutors of the ſeminaries in which they have been educated, or of ſome other miniſters fixed upon for that purpoſe. Upon theſe occaſions, they uſually deliver a ſermon, maintain a theſis, and ſubmit to ſuch exerciſes beſides as are thought needful and proper. If their qualifications and moral characters be approved of, they receive a teſtimonial ſignifying that approbation, accompanied with a recommendation of them to thoſe ſocieties among whom they may be called to officiate. This method of proceeding may be conſidered as anſwering, in a great meaſure, to the conferring of Deacon's orders in the Church of England.

[B] An eminent Tutor among the Diſſenters.] Mr. Eames was many years firſt an aſſiſtant, and then the principal tutor of an academy in London. He was a man of extenſive learning in general; and particularly excelled in claſſical literature, and in a profound knowledge of mathematics and natural philoſophy. He was alſo a very valuable and diſtinguiſhed member of the Royal Society; and was held in peculiar eſteem by Sir Iſaac Newton, to whom he was ſingularly uſeful on a number of occaſions. With all theſe qualifications, Mr. Eames was remarkable for a diffidence and baſhfulneſs which greatly overſhaded and concealed his talents. The indiſpoſition of a friend hath prevented our being able to give a more particular account of this gentleman, which may poſſibly appear in its proper place.

Meeting

Meeting in Taunton, by Mr. Batſen, Mr. Grove, Dr. Milner of Yeovil [C], Mr. Berry of Wellington, Mr. Strong of Ilminſter, and other miniſters (d). From this time he was united, in the congregation at Taunton, with Mr. Batſen; but that gentleman keeping the whole ſalary to himſelf, ſeveral of the principal perſons in the ſociety were ſo diſpleaſed with him, that, early in the Spring of 1732, they agreed to build another Meeting-Houſe, and to chooſe Mr. Amory for their Paſtor. In the beginning of the year 1738, upon the death of Mr. Grove, he became chief Tutor to the Academy at Taunton, and conducted the buſineſs of it with the ſame abilities, and the ſame candid and enlarged views, which had been diſplayed by that eminent man. He had the advantage of the lectures and experience of his excellent uncle, added to his own; and he was animated by an equal ſpirit of integrity and zeal, and an equal deſire of cultivating and improving every intellectual and moral qualification in the young perſons committed to his charge. Many pupils were formed under them, of great worth and diſtinguiſhed literary improvements, ſome few of whom will be mentioned in the note [D]. In the year 1741, he married Miſs Mary Baker, daughter of the Rev. Mr. Samuel Baker, a Diſſenting Miniſter in Southwark; an excellent lady, who ſurvived him, and with whom he lived in the greateſt affection and harmony. By this lady he had ſeveral children, four of whom are ſtill living [E]. During his reſidence in Taunton, he was held in the greateſt eſteem, not only by his own ſociety, but by all the neighbouring congregations and miniſters; by all, at leaſt, who had any moderation of temper, or candour of ſentiment. Nay, the moſt bigotted, and thoſe who differed the moſt from him in private opinions, could not avoid paying a tribute of reſpect to the integrity and excellence of his character. He was much reſpected, likewiſe, by the gentlemen and clergy of the eſtabliſhed church. He was particularly honoured, when very young, with the friendſhip of the ingenious Mrs. Rowe, and kept up a correſpondence with her by letters [F]. One inſtance of the reſpect entertained for him, and of his own liberal and honourable conduct, cannot be omitted. When ſome of the principal perſons of the Baptiſt Society in Taunton, owing to the diſguſt they had received at their then Paſtor, would have deſerted him, and communicated to Mr. Amory their intention of becoming his ſtated hearers, he generouſly diſſuaded them from the execution of their deſign, as a ſtep which would prove highly injurious to the reputation, members, and intereſt of the congregation they intended to leave. Mr. Amory was ſo happy with his people at Taunton, and ſo generally reſpected and beloved both in the town and the neighbourhood, that, perhaps, it may be deemed ſtrange that he ſhould be induced to quit his ſituation. This, however, he did, in October 1759, at which time he removed to London, to be afternoon preacher to the Society in the Old Jewry, belonging to the eminent and learned Dr. Samuel Chandler (e). But the grand motive, beſides the hope of more extenſive uſefulneſs, ſeems to have been, that he might advantageouſly diſpoſe of his children, in which reſpect he ſucceeded. It muſt, indeed, be acknowledged, that he did not, in the metropolis, meet with all that acceptance and popularity, as a preacher, to which he was entitled by his real merit. His delivery was clear and diſtinct, and his diſcourſes excellent; but his voice was not powerful enough to rouſe the bulk of man-

(d) The Rev. Mr. William Corniſh, who afterwards ſettled at Sherborne in Dorſetſhire, and died there ſeveral years ſince, was ordained at the ſame time. This gentleman was author of an Inquiry into the Nature and Deſign of Baptiſm, publiſhed for Waugh, in the year 1757, without his name. In his zeal for Infant Baptiſm, he has advanced ſome tenets, which will ſcarcely be found tenable.

[C] Dr. Milner of Yeovil,] Dr. Milner removed afterwards from Yeovil to Peckham, near London, where he lived and died in great reputation. He was an excellent preacher, and publiſhed a number of occaſional ſermons, which abound with good ſentiment, and are written in a neat, pure, and elegant ſtyle. He was, likewiſe, the author of a Greek and a Latin Grammar, and of one or two ſchool-books, which ſufficiently diſplay his grammatical and claſſical knowledge. He kept, with much credit, a boarding ſchool for young gentlemen; and, at one time, he had Mr. afterwards the celebrated Dr. Goldſmith, for an Uſher. Dr. Milner, who had the ſagacity to diſcern the greatneſs of Mr. Goldſmith's genius, urged him to the cultivation of it; and adviſed him to quit a ſtation which was unfavourable to the exertion of his fine talents.

[D] Will be mentioned in the note.] In a liſt of the pupils now before us, we find the names of the Reverend Mr. May, Miniſter in London; the Reverend Mr. Pope, ditto; Iſrael Mauduit, Eſq; ſo well known by his political writings, and his literary connections; — Halliday, Eſq; Member for Taunton; Robert Webb, Eſq; ditto; the late Right Hon. Hugh Lord Willoughby of Parham, Preſident of the Antiquarian Society, Vice Preſident of the Royal Society, and a Truſtee of the Britiſh Muſeum; the Reverend Dr. William Harris, the writer of the Critical Lives of James the Firſt, Charles the Firſt, Oliver Cromwell, and Charles the Second; Dr. Cotton, a Phyſician at St. Albans, and author of a very pleaſing poem, called the Fireſide, and of viſions, in verſe, for the inſtruction of younger minds; John Halliday, Eſq; the preſent member for Taunton; Francis Webb, Eſq; Deputy Searcher at Graveſend; the Reverend Joſeph Jeffries, LL.D. Profeſſor of Civil Law in Greſham College; and the Reverend Mr. Toller of London. To theſe might be added the names of many other gentlemen and miniſters, who have been, or who are, very reſpectable and uſeful in their ſeveral ſituations.

[E] By this lady he had ſeveral children, &c.] Dr. Amory, who had a very tender heart, was deeply affected with the death of a ſon at between ſix and ſeven years of age; and afterwards with the loſs of his eldeſt daughter, a moſt amiable woman, who was married to a reſpectable and worthy citizen of fortune, and who died in child-birth. But though the Doctor felt powerfully on theſe occaſions, his grief did not prevent his exerciſing a perfect acquieſcence in the will of heaven, from his full perſuaſion of the wiſdom, rectitude, and benevolence of the Divine Diſpenſations, and from his firm belief in a future ſtate. He had, at the ſame time, great ſatisfaction in the excellent character and ſucceſsful proſpects of his ſurviving children.

[F] And kept up a correſpondence with her by letters.] In Mrs. Rowe's miſcellaneous works, are three letters from her to Mr. Amory, in which ſhe expreſſes her high reſpect for him, notwithſtanding their difference in ſome religious opinions. 'And for 'your peculiar notions, ſays ſhe, I am ſo far from 'blaming your frankneſs and ſincerity, that it ap-'pears to me a beauty in your character (1).'

kind, who are ſtruck with noiſe and parade: and his ſermons, though practical, ſerious, and affecting to the attentive hearer, were rather too cloſe, judicious and philoſophical for the common run of congregations. To this it muſt be added, that the liberality of his ſentiments was not calculated for the vulgar, who are, for the moſt part, devoted to bigots and enthuſiaſts. But Mr. Amory had, what he valued much more, the attention and regard of the intelligent and rational Diſſenters; he enjoyed a general reſpect; and he received every mark of diſtinction which is uſually paid, in London, to the moſt eminent miniſters of the Preſbyterian denomination. In 1767, he was choſen one of the truſtees to the charities of Dr. Daniel Williams, of which an account will be given in its proper place (f). In 1768, the Univerſity of Edinburgh, in conſideration of his acknowledged learning and merit, conferred upon him, by diploma, the degree of Doctor in Divinity; and in the ſame year, he was elected one of the ſix Tueſday Lecturers at Salter's Hall, in the room of the Rev. Dr. Jabez Earle deceaſed [G]. It ought to have been mentioned, that, previous to theſe laſt events, he was choſen, at the death of Dr. Chandler, in 1766, a Paſtor of the Society at the Old Jewry; and the Rev. Mr. Nathaniel White, from Leeds in Yorkſhire, was ſoon united with him as joint Paſtor. In this ſituation Dr. Amory continued till his deceaſe. In 1770, he became Morning-preacher at Newington Green, and colleague with the Rev. Dr. Richard Price, ſo well known by ſome late publications, and whoſe excellent character will be acknowledged by all who have the happineſs of being acquainted with him, whatever they may think of his political opinions. When the Diſſenting Miniſters, in 1772, formed a deſign of endeavouring to procure an enlargement of the Toleration Act, Dr. Amory was one of the Committee appointed for that purpoſe; and none could be more zealous for the proſecution of the ſcheme; none could be leſs diverted from it by political conſiderations, or artificial reaſonings. He thought that the petition to parliament was right in itſelf; that it was founded on the principles of natural juſtice, and of true Chriſtianity; and, therefore, he was for having it urged with a manly vigour and fortitude [H]. Dr. Amory had the felicity of having his uſefulneſs, and his capacity for public ſervice, continued nearly to the laſt. On the 16th of June 1774, he was ſeized with a ſudden diſorder which left him nearly in a ſtate of inſenſibility till his death, which happened on the 24th of that month, and in the 74th year of his age. He was interred in Bunhill Fields, on the fifth of July; and his funeral was attended by a reſpectable number of miniſters and gentlemen. The diſcourſe, on the occaſion of his death, was preached in the Old Jewry, on the 10th of the ſame month, by the Rev. Dr. Roger Flexman of Rotherhithe, who had been connected with him in an intimate friendſhip for more than 40 years; which friendſhip, Dr. Flexman aſſures us, had never once been interrupted by diſtaſte, or darkened with a frown (g).

(f) Vide article Williams.

With regard to Dr. Amory's character, it was excellent in every view. It ſeems to have been formed upon that of his uncle, Mr. Grove, with whom he had been cloſely connected from his infancy, and his connection with whom, he conſidered as the principal felicity of his life (h). His piety was equally rational and fervent. It was founded on the moſt enlarged ſentiments concerning the Divine Providence and Government; and was, therefore, diſplayed in a ſpirit of chearful devotion, love, and confidence. It was a principle that influenced his whole behaviour; a principle which rendered him ſtrictly virtuous in every reſpect, and [G] In the room of the Reverend Dr. Jabez Earle, deceaſed.] Dr. Jabez Earle, who was a native of Kent, had been a noted Diſſenting Miniſter in London, between ſixty and ſeventy years; and during a life protracted to the age of ninety-two, had not experienced a moment's ill health. He would ſcarcely have known what pain was, had it not been for an accident he once met with, of breaking his arm. He preached to the laſt Sunday of his life, and died ſuddenly in his chair, without a groan or ſigh. All his faculties continued in great perfection, excepting his eye-ſight, which failed him ſome time before his death. He was remarkable for a vivacity and chearfulneſs of temper, which never forſook him to his lateſt breath; and he abounded in pleaſant ſtories. He had publiſhed in his earlier days ſeveral occaſional ſermons, a Treatiſe on the Sacrament, and a ſmall collection of poems, in Latin and Engliſh. His chief excellence, as a ſcholar, was in claſſical learning. When he was above ninety years old, he would repeat, with the greateſt readineſs and fluency, a hundred verſes or more from Homer, Virgil, Horace, Juvenal, or others of the ancient poets, upon their being at any time occaſionally mentioned. As an inſtance of his chearful turn of mind, we ſhall give a ſmall copy of verſes which he ſent to a friend, Dr. William Harris of Crutched Friars, upon their both of them having received Diplomas from one of the univerſities of Scotland:

Since dunces now are Doctors made
As well as men of ſkill,
What does the title ſignify?
I'll tell thee, honeſt Will:
The ſame as trappings to a horſe,
Which, be he fleet or jade,
Not for his own but rider's ſake,
So wond'rous fine is made.
So when our univerſities Doctorial honours give,
'Tis not our merit to declare,
But their prerogative.

[H] With a manly vigour and fortitude.] Dr. Amory had from his youth been averſe to every degree of impoſition upon the conſciences of men. He totally diſapproved of ſubſcriptions to human formulas. The requiſition of them by the Church of England was one of the principal reaſons of his ſeparating from her. Though by the terms of the Toleration Act, he was required to ſubſcribe a great number of doctrinal articles, he had not ſubmitted to the doing of it, and was determined never to do ſo. Hence he was naturally ſolicitous that himſelf and his brethren ſhould obtain a legal exemption from the penalties to which they were ſubject for their non-compliance.

peculiarly amiable in all the relations of life. None could excel him as a huſband, a father, a maſter, and a friend. He was diſtinguiſhed for his general benevolence and humanity; and as a companion, he was remarkably pleaſing and engaging. He abounded with a number of ſhort ſtories, drawn from an extenſive knowledge of books and men, which, while they were entertaining, were calculated and deſigned to convey inſtruction. In ſhort, taking him in the whole of his private character, he was allowed by his intimate acquaintance to have been one of the worthieſt men they had ever known.

In his public character, as a teacher of religion, Dr. Amory was greatly reſpectable. The devotional part of worſhip was conducted by him with admirable propriety, ſeriouſneſs, and fervour. His ſermons were cloſe, accurate, ſolid, and affectionate. The topics he chiefly inſiſted upon were the perfections and providence of God; the veneration, love, truſt, and obedience we ſhould ever exerciſe towards him; the evidences of a future ſtate; the truth and excellency of the Goſpel; the great duties of the Chriſtian life; the account we muſt give hereafter; and the important conſequences of that account. He never devoted the pulpit to trifling ſubjects. If any thing diſputable was ever introduced by him, it was to expoſe the doctrines of rigid Calviniſm, which he much diſapproved, as giving very narrow and unworthy ideas of the Supreme Mind. His ſentiments, with regard to both natural and revealed religion, nearly agreed with thoſe of Dr. Samuel Clarke, and of the eminent Divines who were Coadjutors with that great man. Dr. Amory did not, therefore, fall in with the Socinian principles, which, of late, have been ſo warmly defended: neither did he reject the natural evidences of a life to come, or the notion of a ſeparate ſtate, as ſeveral ingenious moderns have done. How far his general ſyſtem of opinions was right, we pretend not to determine; our buſineſs being only, as hiſtorians, to relate the matter of fact. Whatever his ſentiments were, he maintained them with the utmoſt candour, and retained the ſincereſt regard for thoſe who differed from him. As to his learning, it was ſolid, judicious, and extenſive. He was well acquainted with every part of theology, and diligently ſtudied the Holy Scriptures. He was, likewiſe, much converſant with ethics, natural and experimental philoſophy, and the beſt Ancients, eſpecially their moral writings. Nor was he above amuſing himſelf with hiſtory, books of travels, poetry, and other entertaining ſpecies of compoſition. But his general application was to thoſe more ſerious and important parts of ſtudy, that were immediately ſuited to his profeſſion. This will appear from his works; the account of which, as given by Dr. Flexman, at the end of his Funeral Sermon for Dr. Amory, together with an addition or two of our own, to render it more complete, will be inſerted in the note below [I].] K.

SERMONS.

I. Chriſt the light of the world; or the principal improvements made in religion by Chriſtianity; at the young men's lecture in Exeter, September 9, 1735, at the aſſembly of the united proteſtant diſſenting miniſters of Devon and Cornwall, publiſhed at the requeſt of the young gentlemen, and of a great number of miniſters preſent. John viii. 12. — This diſcourſe was part of a ſett of ſermons on the evidences of the Chriſtian religion. The preface exhibiteth the plan of the reaſoning in which that important argument was treated; and particularly repreſents the doctrines and precepts which the goſpel hath added to natural religion, which though reaſon could not eaſily and fully diſcover, yet are ſuitable to the ſtate of man, worthy of the perfections of God, and highly advantageous for us to know and practiſe. This judicious and laboured diſcourſe met with ſuch a general reception, that the whole impreſſion was ſoon diſpoſed of. It was republiſhed in 1758, in a volume of eighteen ſermons, ſold by J. Buckland, in Pater-noſter-Row, 8*vo*. Dr. Thomas Morgan, the author of a book entitled, 'The 'Moral Philoſopher,' thought fit to make objections to ſome principles advanced in this ſermon, as repugnant to his ſcheme of infidelity, which being ſent in manuſcript to the author, he made a proper reply to them in a brief confutation.

II. The character and bleſſedneſs of thoſe to whom to live is Chriſt, and to die gain; at Ilminſter, in the county of Somerſet, May 25, 1738, on occaſion of the death of the Reverend Mr. James Strong, Ætat. 53. 8*vo*. Republiſhed in the volume of eighteen ſermons, 1758. Philippians i. 21.

III. The nature of ſound doctrine, and the encouragements to preach it; a charge delivered at the ordination of the Reverend Mr. William Harris, at Wells, in the county of Somerſet, April 15, 1741. Publiſhed at the requeſt of the miniſters preſent, and the principal hearers. Titus ii. 1. —— Publiſhed with the ſermon on that occaſion by the Reverend Mr. Samuel Billingſley, intitled, 'The character 'of St. Paul as a preacher conſidered and recom-'mended.' 2 Corinthians iv. 5.

IV. Self-dedication to God explained and recommended, in two ſermons, with a particular view to the new year; with a prefatory addreſs to young perſons, inculcating various conſiderations and motives to determine them to devote themſelves to God. Dec. 25, 1742. 12*mo*. — A ſecond edition of theſe diſcourſes was publiſhed 1751.

V. The prayer of King Jehoſophat conſidered and applied to the ſtate of the nation; at Taunton, December 18, 1745, on occaſion of the faſt on account of the war and the unnatural rebellion. Publiſhed at the requeſt of the audience. 8*vo*. 2 Chron. xx. 5—13. — A ſecond edition of this ſermon was publiſhed ſoon after the firſt.

VI. Daily devotion aſſiſted and recommended in four ſermons; repreſenting the principal inſtances of the providence and goodneſs of God, which every morning and evening offer to our thoughts, and the uſe we ſhould make of them, 1747. 8*vo*. Pſalm iii. 5. Pſalm xcii. 2. — In a ſecond edition, 1770, Dr. Amory added ſome forms of prayer for a family, for morning and evening.

VII. Eight ſermons on a future general judgment; repreſenting the great events introductory to the coming of Chriſt to judgment, and the end of the world;—the certainty, ſolemnity, and conſequences of that deciſive ſeaſon;—the perſons who are to be judged;—and the talents and actions for which

which they muſt give an account. Dedicated to the congregation at Taunton, the author's paſtoral charge, who earneſtly deſired the publication, 1749. 8*vo*. Matthew xxv. 31, 32. 2 Cor. v. 10. — Theſe diſcourſes were republiſhed in the volume of eighteen ſermons.

VIII. The character and bleſſedneſs of thoſe who die in the Lord; at Bridgwater, Jan. 6, 1748, on occaſion of the death of the Reverend John Moore, M. A. Ætat. 76. — Republiſhed in the volume of eighteen ſermons. Rev. xiv. 13.

IX. Miniſters not lords over the faith of Chriſtians, but helpers of their joy; at Lewin's-Mead, Briſtol, at the ordination of the Reverend Mr. William Richards, May 22, 1751. 8*vo*. Publiſhed with the charge delivered on that occaſion, by the Reverend Mr. Samuel Billingſley, intituled, 'The rule of 'conduct for chriſtian miniſters repreſented.' 1 Timothy iv. 16.

X. Our times in the hand of God; at Culliton, in the county of Devon, March 8, 1752, on occaſion of the death of Mrs. Mary Slater, wife of the Rev. Mr. Samuel Slater, Ætat. 30. 8*vo*. Pſ. xxxi. 15.

XI. Six ſermons on Contentment, and two ſermons on the reaſonableneſs of religion and the advantages of prayer, 1753. Phil. iv. 11. Job xxi. 15. — Theſe diſcourſes were alſo republiſhed in the volume of eighteen ſermons.

XII. The ſhortneſs and frailty of human life repreſented and accounted for, on occaſion of the death of John Halliday, Eſq; member of parliament for Taunton, June 9, 1754, Ætat. 44. 8*vo*. Job xiv. 2.

XIII. The care which miniſters ſhould take of themſelves, and of their doctrine, recommended; a charge delivered at the ordination of the Reverend Mr. Thomas Wright, at Lewin's-Mead, Briſtol, May 31, 1759. 1 Tim. iv. 16. —— Publiſhed together with the queſtions propoſed on that occaſion by the Reverend Mr. William Richards and Mr. Wright's anſwers, and the ſermon entitled, 'Preach-'ing the goſpel a more effectual method of Salva-'tion, than human wiſdom and philoſophy,' by the Reverend Samuel Chandler, D. D. 8*vo*. 1 Cor. i. 21.

XIV. Habitual religion explained and recommended, in three ſermons; at Taunton, September, 1759. 8*vo*. Pſal. xvi. 8.

XV. God crowneth the year with his goodneſs; at St. Thomas's, Jan. 1. 1769, for the benefit of the charity-ſchool in Gravel-lane, Southwark. Publiſhed at the requeſt of the managers of the ſchool. 8*vo*. Pſal. lxv. 11.

XVI. The motives and obligations to love and good works repreſented; at the ordination of the Reverend Mr. Edward Harwood, of Briſtol, and the Reverend Mr. Benjamin Davis, of Marlborough, at the Old Jewry, October 16, 1765. Hebrews x. 24. — To which are annexed the queſtions propoſed to Mr. Harwood on that occaſion by the Reverend Mr. Samuel Billingſley, and Mr. Harwood's anſwers, and his confeſſion of faith; together with the charge, by the Reverend Samuel Chandler, D. D. 8*vo*. 2 Tim. ii. 15.

XVII. Dying in faith explained; and the happineſs of it, repreſented: on occaſion of the death of the Reverend Samuel Chandler, D. D. who died May 8, 1766, Ætat. 73, at the Old Jewry, May 18. Heb. xi. 13. — To which are added the ſpeech at his Interment, and a catalogue of Dr. Chandler's writings. N. B. In the year 1758 were collected into one volume and republiſhed, — Eighteen ſermons, No. I. VII. VIII. and XI.

XVIII. Twenty-two ſermons on the following ſubjects: 1, 2, 3. The divine goodneſs explained, and proved, and illuſtrated in various inſtances. Pſal. cxlv. 9. — 4, 5. . . . In the creation of Man, and various laws of the human conſtitution. Pſal. viii. 5. — 6, 7. The goodneſs of divine Providence to mankind. Matth. v. 45. — 8, 9. The grace of God in the redemption of man by Jeſus Chriſt. Epheſ. ii. 5. — 10. The principal properties of the divine benevolence. Pſal. cxxxvi. 1. —— 11. Of moral evil; and that the permiſſion of it is conſiſtent with the divine goodneſs. 12. The objection of the abundance of moral evil farther urged and illuſtrated. James i. 13, 14. — 13. Natural evil, and the puniſhments threatened in ſcripture, not inconſiſtent with the goodneſs of God. Heb. xiii. 10. — 14, 15, 16. Doctrinal and practical inferences from the divine benevolence, Matth. vii. 11. — 17, 18. The evidences for a future ſtate. — 19. The neceſſity there is that we do the work of God. — 20. The diſpoſitions with which we ſhould enquire the way to eternal life. Mark x. 17. — 21, 22. Chriſt the beſt guide to eternal life; and the directions given by him for attaining it. 8*vo*. 1766. John vi. 68, 69. Sold by Mr. Buckland, in Pater-noſter-Row.

MISCELLANEOUS.

I. A letter to a friend; ſuggeſting proper reflexions to remove the difficulties that often perplex ſerious minds engaged in the ſtudy and practice of religion, on account of the many diſputes and objections that ſeem to weaken the evidences of important truths, and the oppoſition from inclinations, &c. to the practice of religion and virtue. This letter, in anſwer to one from his friend and relation Mr. Theophilus Rowe, editor of the poſthumous works in proſe and verſe of Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe, December 26, 1727, was publiſhed in the Literary Journal, or, a Continuation of the Memoirs of Literature, January, &c. 1731. 8*vo*.

II. A dialogue on devotion, after the manner of Xenophon; in which, the reaſonableneſs, pleaſure, and advantages of it are conſidered. To which is prefixed, a converſation of Socrates on the being and providence of God; tranſlated from the Greek, 8*vo*. 1733, without his name. In a ſecond edition, 1746, Dr. Amory acknowledges, that having received the remarks of ſome ingenious friends on the dialogue, he had made his advantage of them for correcting and improving it; and added two hymns, one for the morning, the other for the evening, formed on the principles illuſtrated in it. — The late reverend and learned Dr. William Wiſhart, who was miniſter of the Scots church at Founder's-Hall, Lothbury, afterwards Principal of the univerſity of Edinburgh, and one of the miniſters in that city, in a letter to Dr. Amory, took occaſion to ſtate ſome objections to the grounds and reaſons of prayer, as repreſented in the dialogue; which introduced an epiſtolary correſpondence between theſe judicious writers, managed with great propriety of argument and temper. Dr. Wiſhart's obſervations were apparently the reſult of an early and zealous attachment to the tenets of the celebrated Calvin, in favour of predeſtination, terminating in the doctine of fate; which the Reverend Dr. Robert South, prebendary of Weſtminſter, canon of Chriſt-Church, and public orator of the univerſity of Oxford, aſſerts, was derived from the ſyſtem of the Stoics, by the ſchool of the Phariſees.

III. Forms of devotion for the cloſet, 1763, 8*vo*. Theſe were added to the family prayer-book, the fourth edition, which was publiſhed the ſame year. N. B. The prayer at the end of thoſe forms, proper to be uſed after attending on the Lord's ſupper, was ſelected from the diſcourſe concerning the nature and end of that religious ſervice by the Reverend Mr. Henry Grove.

IV. In the year 1740, Dr. Amory publiſhed an account of the life, writings, and character of Mr. Grove, in a large preface to the four volumes of his poſthumous ſermons and tracts. 8*vo*. — From this account the life of Mr. Grove, given in the firſt edition of the Biographia Britannica, was taken.

V. And a preface to two additional volumes of Mr. Grove's ſermons, printed from the manuſcripts of that excellent author, 1742. 8*vo*.

VI. He alſo publiſhed, 1747, in four volumes, with a preface, a collection of all the ſermons, diſcourſes, and tracts, publiſhed by Mr. Grove in his lifetime. 8*vo*.

VII. In 1749, he gave to the Public, in two volumes 8*vo*. from the unfiniſhed manuſcript, Mr. Grove's ſyſtem of moral philoſophy, reviſed, corrected, and improved in various parts; to which were prefixed, obſervations on the principles and reaſonings of that valuable performance; and in order to complete that work, Dr. Amory prepared and annexed ſeven chapters on reſtitution, diſtributive juſtice, relative duties, the original and extent of government, and the power of the magiſtrate; the meaſures of ſubmiſſion, and the love of our country; univerſal benevolence, forgiveneſs of enemies; of piety, and the duties we owe to God; and ſelf-improvement, and the advantages derived from revelation in the ſtudy and practice of morality.

VIII.

VIII. In 1764, he publiſhed memoirs of the life, character, and writings of the Reverend Dr. George Benſon, prefixed to that learned writer's poſthumous work, entitled, the Hiſtory of the Life of Jeſus Chriſt.

IX. He was the editor of four volumes of the poſthumous ſermons, on various ſubjects, of the Reverend Dr. Samuel Chandler; and prefixed ſome account of the life of that learned and judicious writer.

X. Dr. Amory was alſo the author of ſome poetical pieces, ſacred and moral; and in the year 1724, publiſhed a poem on the praiſes of Taunton, the place of his birth.

A volume of ſermons has been publiſhed ſince Dr. Amory's death; and there are ſome miſcellaneous pieces of his in manuſcript, which might deſerve to ſee the light. K.

ANDERSON (Sir EDMUND) is ſaid by the Oxford antiquary, to have been a younger brother of a genteel family, in the pariſh of Broughton in Lincolnſhire (a). Another writer ſays, it was at Flixborough in Lincolnſhire (b). However, the family, which was originally from Scotland, had firſt retired into Northumberland, and from thence paſſed into Lincolnſhire (*), where Thomas Anderſon, Eſq; father to our Edmund, muſt have been poſſeſſed of a very conſiderable eſtate, ſince he left this younger ſon of his a thouſand pounds to begin the world with, which in thoſe days was a very conſiderable ſum (c). After perfecting his grammatical ſtudies in the country, he ſpent ſome time at Oxford, in Lincoln-college, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, where he read law with great aſſiduity, and in due time became a Barriſter. In the ninth of Queen Elizabeth, he was both Lent and Summer reader; and in the ſixteenth of the Queen, Double reader (d); notes of which readings are yet extant in MS (e). In the nineteenth of Queen Elizabeth, he was appointed the Queen's Serjeant at Law. Some time after, but the date I no where find, he became Judge, or, as I take it, one of the Juſtices of Aſſize. For, in 1581, he went the Norfolk circuit, and at Bury exerted himſelf againſt the famous Browne, who was the author of thoſe opinions, which were afterwards maintained by a ſect, called from him Browniſts. For this conduct of Judge Anderſon, Dr. Edmund Freke, then Biſhop of Norwich, wrote a letter to the Treaſurer Burleigh, deſiring that the ſaid Judge might receive the Queen's thanks, which it is very probable he had, becauſe our Judge ever afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf, as we ſhall ſee, in the ſupport of the eſtabliſhed Church (f). In the Spring of the year 1582, he was advanced to the dignity of Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, and took his place there, on the fourth day of May, in a manner ſo particular, that one cannot doubt the reader's being pleaſed with the account of it, inſerted in the notes [A]. In the year following he received the honour of knighthood. In 1586, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for trying Mary, Queen of Scots, and on the 12th of October the ſame year, he ſat in judgment upon her, and on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month, he ſat again in the Star chamber, when ſentence was pronounced againſt that Queen (g). In 1587, he ſat in the Star-chamber on Secretary Daviſon, who was there charged with iſſuing the warrant for the execution of the Queen of Scots, contrary to Queen Elizabeth's command, and without her knowledge. After the cauſe had been heard, Sir Roger Manwood then Chief Baron of the Exchequer, gave his opinion firſt, wherein he extolled the Queen's clemency, which he the ſaid Daviſon had inconſiderately prevented; wherefore he was for fining him ten thouſand pounds, and impriſonment during the Queen's pleaſure. Our Chief Juſtice, who ſpoke next, ſaid that Daviſon had done Juſtum non Juſte, that is, He had done what was right, not in a due manner; otherwiſe he thought him no bad man (h). As this was a very buſy reign, and as our Chief Juſtice was held one of the moſt learned ſages of the law, he had much employment; it being the peculiar policy of Queen Elizabeth's adminiſtration, to do all things with the greateſt form, and where the matter would admit

[A] Inſerted in the notes.] This account is taken from a letter, written by Fleetwood, Recorder of London, to the Lord Treaſurer (Burleigh): that part of it which relates to our Sage in the law, run thus: 'On Saturday in the morning, my Lord 'Chancellor did a while ſtand at the Chancery bar, 'on the ſide of the hall. And ſoon after that the 'Juſtices of the Common-Pleas were ſet, his Lord-'ſhip came to the Common-Pleas, and there ſat 'down. And all the ſerjeants ſtanding at the bar, 'my Lord Chancellor called Anderſon by name, 'declared unto him her Majeſty's good-likings and 'opinion of him, and of the place and dignity her 'Majeſty had called him unto. And then my Lord 'Chancellor made a ſhort diſcourſe, what the duty 'and office of a good Juſtice was. And in the end 'his Lordſhip called him up into the midſt of the 'court; and then Mr. Anderſon kneeling, his com-'miſſion was read; and that done, his Lordſhip 'took the patent into his hand; and then the clerk 'of the crown, Powle, did read him his oath. And 'after, he himſelf read the oath of Supremacy, and 'ſo kiſſed the book. And my Lord Chancellor 'took him by the hand, and placed him upon the 'bench. And then Father Benloos, becauſe he 'was ancient, did put a ſhort caſe. And then Ser-'jeant Fleetwood put the next. To the firſt, my 'new Lord Chief Juſtice did himſelf only argue. 'But to the next that Fleetwood put, both he and 'the reſidue of the Bench did argue. And I aſſure 'your Lordſhip, added the Recorder, he argued very 'learnedly; and with great facility delivered his 'mind. And this one thing was noted in him, that 'he diſpatched more orders, and anſwered more dif-'ficult caſes in that one forenoon than were diſpatch-'ed in a whole week in the time of his predeceſſors.' The Recorder farther remarks in this letter, another ſingularity in theſe words: 'My Lord, under Bene-'dicite, there runneth a marvellous ſpeech over all 'London, that greater ſums of money were offered (to 'whom I know not) than I may well write of, by 'one of the Exchequer; and all was for this office of 'Lord Chief Juſtice. If it were true, the party did 'not well; if it were not true, the firſt reporters were 'much to blame, to ſcandalize ſuch an officer of her 'Majeſty; by which means he is grown into a greater 'diſcredit, than may be in a ſhort time eaſily forgot-'ten.' Adding (to the Lord Treaſurer's honour) 'That it was almoſt in every man's mouth, that his 'Lordſhip, after that he had underſtanding of the of-'fering of ſuch a maſs of money, was the means of 'keeping him from that cuſhion;' concluding, 'Truly, my Lord, it was well done (1).'

of it, with all the countenance from the law that could be given. For this reaſon, in the proceedings againſt thoſe, who endeavoured to ſet up the Geneva diſcipline, Lord Chief Juſtice Anderſon was frequently made uſe of; and as he diſcharged his truſt with great zeal, ſo in the caſe of Udal, a Puritan Miniſter, who was confined in the year 1589, tried and condemned the year following, our Judge is ſeverely cenſured by Mr. Pierce (i), as one who endeavoured to trick that worthy man out of his life; with what reaſon the reader will judge from the account given in the note [B]. It is highly probable, that the Judge himſelf was ſenſible of the ill-will his proceedings againſt theſe ſort of people drew upon him; but it does not appear that it gave him any great pain; ſince, in 1596, we have an account of his going the northern circuit, wherein he behaved exactly in the ſame way [C], declaring in his charges, that ſuch perſons as oppoſed the eſtabliſhed Church, oppoſed her Majeſty's authority, who was Supreme in

[B] From the account given in the note.] We ſhall, as it is our duty, ſet down the whole of this matter fairly, and in our author's own words: On the 13th of January, 1589-90, Mr. Udal appeared at the Lord Cobham's houſe, before the Lord Cobham, Lord Buckhurſt, Lord Chief Juſtice Anderſon, Dr. John Young, Biſhop of Rocheſter; Mr. Forteſcue, Mr. Egerton, the Queen's Solicitor; Dr. Aubery, and Dr. Lewin. I am careful to ſet down their names, that they may be remembered as they deſerve. The Biſhop aſked him whether he had the allowance of the Biſhop of the dioceſe to go to Newcaſtle? Udal told him, there was no Biſhop at that time in that dioceſe. Then, ſays the Biſhop, you ſhould have gone to the Archbiſhop; but ſays Udal, there was no Archbiſhop at York neither. This matter then dropped; though afterwards Mr. Forteſcue, thinking he would cramp him, brought it about again. You are, ſays he, very cunning in the law; I pray you, by what law did you preach at Newcaſtle, being forbidden at Kingſton? To which Udal anſwered, he knew no law againſt it, ſeeing it was the official Dr. Hone, who ſilenced him, whoſe authority reached not out of his Archdeaconry. And ſo there was an end of that matter, which was too impertinent to have been ſtarted; but only as they would have been glad of any occaſion of worrying him. Then the Lord Chief Juſtice Anderſon told him, he was called thither to anſwer concerning certain books, thought to be of his writing. He told them, if it was any of Martin's books (as my Lord Chamberlain's letters imported) he had cleared himſelf at Lambeth a year and a half before, from being the author of them. Then was he queſtioned, whether he was the author of the Demonſtration, or the Dialogue; to which he refuſed to anſwer. When he was aſked why he would clear himſelf of Martin and not of theſe: he ſaid, becauſe he would not be thought to handle the cauſe of diſcipline as Martin did; but he thought otherwiſe of the books now mentioned, and cared not, though they ſhould be fathered upon him. He ſaid likewiſe, he thought the author, for any thing he knew, did well; and he knew he was enquired after to be puniſhed, and therefore he thought it his duty to hinder the finding him out, which he could not better do than this: for if every one ſuſpected denyed it, the author at length muſt needs be found out. The Lord Anderſon then urged him, Why dare you not confeſs it, if you be the author of it? Dare you not ſtand to your own doings? to this he thus anſwered: I profeſſed before that I liked of the books, and the matter handled in them; but whether I made them or no, I will not anſwer: neither if any other book of that argument whatſoever, goeth without name, if you ſhould aſk me for the reaſons alledged before. Beſides that, if I were the author, I think that by law, I need not anſwer. That is true, ſays Anderſon, if it concerned the loſs of your life. Oh barbarous wickedneſs! to urge and ſcrew him by ſuch arts as theſe to witneſs againſt himſelf, and to inſinuate the matter did not touch his life, when the deſign was to try him for his life, as they afterwards did and condemned him. Well, Udal anſwered him thus: I pray your Lordſhip, doth not the law ſay generally: No man ſhall be put to anſwer without preſentment before juſtices, or matter of record, or by due proceſs, and writ original, &c. A. 42. Edw. 3. cap. III. that is law, ſays Anderſon, and it is not law. I underſtand you not, my Lord, ſays Udal: 'tis a ſtatute which is in force, if it be not repealed; and ſo that Lord's mouth was ſtopped for a while, and he was relieved by ſome of his auxiliaries (2).

(2) Pierce's Vindication, Part i. p. 129, 130.

All that is ſaid above is taken from Udal's trial, which was publiſhed by himſelf or his friends, and therefore it might be queſtioned, whether this be ſtrict evidence againſt the Chief Juſtice. But admit it were ſo; he ſat here as one of the Queen's commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, and therefore, what he ſays muſt be conſidered as ſaid in that capacity. The anſwer, with reſpect to the ſtatute, is very obſcure. Another writer, who pretends to tranſcribe Mr. Pierce (3), tells us, the Lord Chief Juſtice anſwered, That is law if it be not repealed; this is clear and plain, and in favour of the priſoner. As to the exclamation in the foregoing account, it ſeems to be not altogether well founded; and, without breach of charity, one may venture to ſay, that it has no foundation at all. For it ſtands on this ſuppoſition: that the Chief Juſtice then knew, that there was an intention to try Udal for his life; a thing altogether improbable. This examination was in January, and he was not tried till the 24th of July following. Mr. Neal indeed, would help this matter a little better out; for he, inſtead of Pierce's exclamation, inſerts this reflection: And yet the Juſtice tried and condemned him for his life (4), which is a direct falſehood, inaſmuch as the Judges who tried him, were Baron Clerke and Serjeant Puckering; neither was he condemned when he was convicted, but at the Lent aſſizes following; and then by Serjeant Puckering, and not Sir E. Anderſon; ſo that on the whole, though this caſe may prove that our Chief Juſtice was a vehement man againſt Puritans, yet it proves nothing as to his endeavouring to take away Udal's life.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

[C] Behaved himſelf exactly in the ſame way.] After the buſineſs of Hacket and Coppinger, which in thoſe days was thought the firſt ſtirrings of rebellion, in favour of the Geneva diſcipline, the Judges were very ſevere upon Separatiſts; and our Chief Juſtice, to whom the law was a guide in all things, certainly carried this matter pretty far. We have ſtill remaining the following account of his proceedings at Lincoln aſſizes, which, as a proof of our impartiality, we ſhall ſet down at large. 'Since my Lord Anderſon hath obtained to ride this circuit, the miniſtry is grown into intolerable contempt; which is univerſally imputed unto him, both by thoſe that would, and thoſe that would not have it ſo. I am not ignorant how dangerous it is to ſpeak the truth of mighty men, and how unlawful it is, by the word of God, to malign the rulers of the people. Neither, I thank God, have I any affection to blot paper with depraving words; and therefore, I will report to you what is done and no further. My Lord Anderſon, in his firſt and ſecond charge at Lincoln, inſinuated with wonderful vehemency, that the country is troubled with Browniſts, with Diſciplinarians, as he called them; and erectors of Preſbyteries. I ſpeak the truth to you, Sir, having been at Alford theſe fourteen years, I never heard of any Browniſt, but only one Thomas Man, who preſently fled upon his ſchiſm: nor do know any miniſter or other in all this country, that doth ſo much as favour the erecting of a preſbytery. Neither are the people made acquainted with the controverſy of diſcipline, in all Lindſey coaſt, that I can perceive. For men have enough to do, to ſtand by that religion which her bleſſed Majeſty hath approved unto us, by her expreſs laws. Nevertheleſs, the ill affected people, upon the occaſion of theſe two charges, do think all religion will be made Browniſm. And this judge, with in cases as well ecclesiastical as civil, and were, in that light, enemies to the state, and disturbers of the public peace; wherefore of such he directed the grand juries to enquire, that they might be punished (k). He was, indeed, a very rigid lawyer, one who governed himself entirely by statutes, and thought only that to be right which was law. This appeared very signally in his conduct at the trial of Henry Cuffe, who was Secretary to the Earl of Essex, where the Attorney-General charging the prisoner syllogistically, and Cuffe answering him in the same style, L. C. J. Anderson said smartly, I sit here to judge of Law, and not of Logick, and directed Mr. Attorney to press the statute of Edward III, which was that on which Mr. Cuffe was indicted (l). His sternness made him more feared than loved. However, as an able lawyer, and a Judge of great experience, he kept his post, in the execution of which he was reputed severe and strict in the observation of what was taught in courts, and laid down as law by Reports: but this ought to be considered as a vulgar opinion, only grounded on his known attachment to the constitution, and his high notions of the reasonableness of our laws; for otherwise we have his express declaration to the contrary, and that he neither expected precedents in all cases, nor would be bound by them where he saw they were not founded upon justice, but would act as if there were no such precedents (m) [D]. His steadiness was so great, that he valued no interest at court, nor would be driven from what he thought right, by any authority whatever, as manifestly appeared in the case of Cavendish, wherein he defied the powerful Earl of Leicester, and got the better of Queen Elizabeth in a point of prerogative (n) [E]. Neither was it in his own case alone that he shewed this firmness; but in concurrence with his brethren, he remonstrated boldly with so much wrath, so many oaths, and such reproachful revilings upon the bench, carrieth himself, that there is offence taken at it by persons of principal credit and note, throughout all the circuits. If he take information from covert Papists of the state of the Church there, how lamentable shall our case be. There have been assays given to extend the statute of recusancy, to those that go to hear sermons elsewhere, though at other times they frequent their own church, and hear divine service most dutifully. In his charge this last time, he called the preachers knaves; saying that they would start up in the pulpit, and speak against every body. And whereas, there was the last Lent obtained by Lord Clinton, and the Deputy-lieutenants, for those parts, with other Justices, the Bishop's allowance, with certain conditions for a meeting to be held at Lowth, to spend the whole day in the hearing of the Word, wherein men might fast if they would; and thereupon certain preachers being moved by them, preached there; he urged thereupon, the statute for conventicles, and animated the grand jury accordingly; affirming that he would complain to her Majesty of any (though never so great) which should shew themselves discontented with the jury for any such matter. The demeanor of him and the other judge, as they sit by turns upon the jail is quite opposite. And those who are maliciously affected, when Mr. Justice Clinch sitteth upon the jail, do labour to adjourn their complaints (though they be before upon the file) to the next assize. And the gentlemen, in the several shires, are endangered by this means to be cast into a faction. The best is, that there is little faction likely to grow among the ministers hereby. For howsoever they differ otherwise, they hold this to be the common cause; and do heartily wish a more christian proceeding. Now the reason why a faction is like to grow in the one and not in the other, is very evident; and that is this; that there are very few in the ministry which are Papists in their hearts. And the most must needs love the common cause of religion: for the other sort you are wise enough to consider the difference.' These passages are taken from a letter, written by a person unknown of the clergy to a person of quality (5). Mr. Neal, in his history of the Puritans, citing a passage from this letter, quotes Strype simply in his margin (6), which must naturally mislead the reader, because there is not one word said of its being only a citation in Strype. This is a material thing. For if the Chief Justice was violent on the one hand, this letter-writer is no less partial on the other; and therefore it was necessary to distinguish, that this was a charge brought against the Chief Justice, and not any conclusion of Mr. Strype's, founded on hearing the evidence on both sides.

[D] Would act as if there were no such precedents.] This fact we learn from the Reports in his time, published by Mr. Goldesborough. 'The case of the Resceit was moved again; and Shuttleworth said, 'that he cannot be received, because he is named 'in the writ, and said that he had searched all the 'books, and there is not one case, where he which 'is named in the writ, may be received. Anderson. 'What of that? Shall not we give judgment be'cause it is not adjudged in the books before? We 'will give judgment according to reason, and if 'there be no reason in the books, I will not regard 'them (7).'

[E] Got the better of Queen Elizabeth in a point of prerogative.] The case was this: one Mr. Cavendish, who was a creature of the Earl of Leicester's, had procured by his interest the Queen's letters patents, for making out writs of Supersedeas upon Exigents in the court of Common-Pleas, and a message was sent to the Judges to admit him to that office, with which, as they conceived the Queen had no right to grant any such patent, they did not comply. Upon this, Mr. Cavendish, by the assistance of his patron, obtained a letter from the Queen to quicken them, which however did not produce what was expected from it. The courtier, however, pursued his point, and obtained another letter under the Queen's signet and sign manual, conceived in the following terms: 'Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you 'well: Whereas we granted to our trusty and well'beloved servant Richard Cavendish, Esq; by our 'letters patents, under our great seal of England, 'the making, and writing of all Supersedeas's upon 'Exigent, issuing out of our court of Common'Pleas, and have divers times sent unto you for his 'admittance into the said office, as well by message 'delivered by persons near about us, as otherwise, 'which nevertheless hath been neglected; in consi'deration whereof, we, for that our said servant 'was to depart into the Low Countries for a sea'son, gave commandment for the sequestration de les profits of the said office, until our further pleasure 'therein should be declared, wherefore for that we 'look for some more dutiful regard to be had by you 'of our prerogative royal, we have thought good 'to signify our further pleasure unto you in this be'half, which is, that our said servant be no longer 'withholden from the benefit and use of our said 'grant: and these are therefore to will and com'mand you, and every of you, that immediately, 'upon the sight thereof, without any further delay, 'you cause present payment to be made unto him, 'or to his assign, of all the aforesaid profits, since 'the day of our said grant upon bond, with condi'tion, that if, from time of his admission into the 'said office, he, his deputy or deputies, shall by 'virtue of our said grant, hold and enjoy the same, 'without lawful eviction or recovery thereof, out of 'the hands of him or his deputy or deputies, by any 'other pretended title to the making and writing 'the said writs, that then the said obligation to be void,

On the acceſſion of King James I, he was continued in his office by that Monarch (o), and held it in all upwards of twenty-four years, to the time of his death, which fell out at London, Auguſt 1, 1605 (p). His body was interred on the fifteenth of September following, at Eyworth in Bedfordſhire, with great funeral pomp; and in his office he was ſucceeded by Sir Francis Gawdy (q). This letter was delivered in the preſence of the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Leiceſter, in the beginning of Eaſter term in the ſaid year, and the Judges deſired time to conſider of it, and then anſwered, that they could not comply with the letter, becauſe it was inconſiſtent with their duty, and to their oaths of office. The Queen upon this appointed the Chancellor, the Lord Chief Juſtice of the Queen's Bench, and the Maſter of the Rolls, to hear this matter, and the Queen's Serjeant having ſet forth her prerogative, it was ſhewn by the Judges, that they could not grant offices by virtue of the Queen's letters, where it did not appear to them that ſhe had a power to grant; and that as the Judges were bound by their oaths of office, ſo her Majeſty was reſtrained by her coronation oath, from ſuch arbitrary interpoſitions, with which her Majeſty was ſatisfied (8).

(8) Anderſon's Reports, P. i. p. 152—158.

[F] Claim a place in our hiſtory.] The Chief Juſtice tells us in his Reports, that many people being committed to different priſons without good cauſe, and being releaſed by the courts of King's Bench and Common-Pleas, notwithſtanding the endeavours of great men to the contrary, it was reſolved to endeavour the obtaining ſome remedy, and with this view the Judges drew up the following paper: 'We her 'Majeſty's Juſtices of both the benches, and Barons 'of the Exchequer, deſire your Lordſhips, that by 'ſome good means, ſome order may be taken, that 'her Highneſs's ſubjects may not be committed nor 'detained in priſon by commandment of any Noble-'man or Counſellor, againſt the laws of the realm, 'either elſe to help us to have acceſs to her Majeſty, 'to the end to become ſuitors to her for the ſame.

'For divers have been impriſoned, for ſuing ordi-'nary actions and ſuits at the common law, until 'they have been conſtrained to leave the ſame againſt 'their wills, and put the ſame to order, albeit judg-'ment and execution have been had therein to their 'great loſſes and griefs.

'For the aid of which perſons, her Majeſty's writs 'have ſundry times been directed to divers perſons, 'having the cuſtody of ſuch perſons unlawfully im-'priſoned, upon which writs no good or lawful 'cauſe of impriſonment hath been returned or cer-'tified: whereupon, according to the laws, they have 'been diſcharged from their impriſonment.

'Some of which perſons ſo delivered, have been 'again committed to priſon in ſecret places, and not 'to any common or ordinary priſons, or lawful offi-'cer, as Sheriff, or other lawfully authorized, to 'have, or keep a gaol; ſo that upon complaint 'made for their delivery, the Queen's courts can-'not learn to whom to direct her Majeſty's writs, 'and by this means juſtice cannot be done.

'And moreover divers officers, and Serjeants of 'London, have been many times committed to priſon, 'for lawfully executing her Majeſty's writs, ſued 'forth of her Majeſty's courts at Weſtminſter, and 'thereby her Majeſty's ſubjects and officers ſo terri-'fied, as they dare not ſue, or execute her Majeſty's 'laws, her writs and commandments.

'Divers others have been ſent for by Purſuivants 'and brought to London from their dwellings, and 'by unlawful impriſonment have been conſtrained, 'not only to withdraw their lawful ſuits, but have 'alſo been compelled to pay the Purſuivants ſo 'bringing ſuch perſons, great ſums of money.

'All which upon complaint, the Judges are bound 'by office and oath, to relieve and help, by and ac-'cording to her Majeſty's laws.

'And where it pleaſed your Lordſhips to will di-'vers of us, to ſet down in what caſes a perſon ſent 'to cuſtody by her Majeſty, her council, ſome one or 'two of them are to be detained in priſon, and not 'delivered by her Majeſty's Courts or Judges, we 'think that if any perſon be committed by her Ma-'jeſty's commandment from her perſon, or by order 'from her Council-board; or if any one or two of 'her council commit one for high treaſon, ſuch per-'ſons, ſo in the caſe before committed, may not be 'delivered by any of her courts without due trial by 'the law, and judgment of acquittal had.

'Nevertheleſs the Judges may award the Queen's 'writs, to bring the bodies of ſuch perſons before 'them, and if upon return thereof, the cauſes of their 'commitment be certified to the Judges as it ought 'to be, then the Judges in the caſes before ought not 'to deliver him, but to remand the priſoner to the 'place from whence he came.

'Which cannot conveniently be done, unleſs no-'tice of the cauſe in generality, or elſe eſpecially, 'be given to the keeper or gaoler that ſhall have 'the cuſtody of ſuch priſoner.

'All the Judges and Barons, &c. did ſubſcribe 'their names to theſe articles, Eaſter Term 34 Eliz. 'and deliver one to the Lord Chancellor, and one 'other to the Lord Treaſurer, after which time, 'there did follow more quietneſs than before, in the 'cauſes before mentioned (9).'

[G] An account is given of them in a note.] As to the writings of this great lawyer, beſides his readings, which are yet in manuſcript, and were a little more than thirty years ago in a public ſale, his printed works are theſe: 1. Reports of many principal caſes argued and adjudged in the time of Queen Elizabeth in the common bench, London 1644, folio. 2. Reſolutions and judgments on the caſes and matters agitated in all the courts of Weſtminſter, in the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. [Mr. Granger very properly obſerves, that Sir Edmund Anderſon's diſtinction in the caſe of Secretary Daviſon, "that he had done juſtum, non juſte," 'was excellent logic for finding an innocent man 'guilty. It was drawn from the ſame mood and 'figure with the Queen's Order and No-order 'for Daviſon's ſigning the warrant. The Lord 'Chief Juſtice, who was otherwiſe no bad man him-'ſelf, was obliged to find him guilty, upon pain of 'being deprived of his office (10).' The fear of loſing an office is but a very inſufficient excuſe for the violation of integrity. If, on this account, a Judge muſt be obliged to condemn an innocent perſon, there would, in critical times, be an end of all ſecurity and juſtice among men. The beſt extenuation of Sir Edmund Anderſon's conduct (ſo far as it will admit of being extenuated) muſt be ſought for in the general character of the age, and the arbitrary ſpirit of the Princes of the Houſe of Tudor. over the minds of the ſervants of the Crown, that they ſcrupled nothing, where the intereſt and will of the Sovereign were concerned. An entire ſubmiſſion to that intereſt and will appears even to have entered into their ideas of duty. The compliances of men, otherwiſe the moſt reſpectable, were ſo numerous and aſtoniſhing, that they can ſcarcely be accounted for on the merely ſelfiſh principle of keeping a poſt of honour and profit. Sir Edmund Anderſon tranſgreſſed with almoſt every other perſon in a public ſtation and office. We do not mean, by this remark, to vindicate his conduct. It cannot poſſibly be vindicated; and he appears beſides, in his general behaviour as a Magiſtrate, to have been ſo unamiable, harſh, and ſevere a man, that we do not wonder at his being complained of by the Puritan writers. The wretched ſtate of diſtributive juſtice, eſpecially in all caſes where the crown was to be gratified, is a feature of peculiar deformity in the portrait of the times concerning which we are ſpeaking. The ſituation of England, with regard to the incorruptibility of its Judges, and the maintenance of equal right between the Prince and the people, hath, ſince the era of the Revolution, been incomparably happy.] K.

ANDREWS (LANCELOT), an eminent Divine, and Biſhop of Wincheſter in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., was born at London, in 1565, in the pariſh of All Hallows Barking, being deſcended from the ancient family of the Andrews's in Suffolk (a) [A]. He had his education in grammar-learning, firſt in the Coopers free-ſchool at Ratcliff under Mr. Ward; and afterwards in Merchant Taylors ſchool at London, under Mr. Mulcaſter. Here he made ſuch a proficiency in the learned languages, that Dr. Watts, Reſidentiary of St. Paul's and Archdeacon of Middleſex, who had lately founded ſome ſcholarſhips (b) at Pembroke hall in Cambridge, ſent him to that college, and beſtowed on him the firſt of thoſe exhibitions. After he had been three years in the univerſity, his cuſtom was to come up to London once a year, about Eaſter, to viſit his father and mother, with whom he uſually ſtayed a month; during which time, with the aſſiſtance of a maſter, he applied himſelf to the attaining ſome language or art, to which he was before a ſtranger: and by this means, in a few years, he had laid the foundations of all the arts and ſciences, and acquired a competent ſkill in moſt of the modern languages. Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was, upon a vacancy, choſen fellow of his college [B]. In the mean time Hugh Price, having built Jeſus-college in Oxford, and hearing much of the fame of young Mr. Andrews, appointed him one of his firſt Fellows (c) on that foundation. Having taken the degree of Maſter of Arts, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, in the knowledge of which he greatly excelled; inſomuch that, being choſen Catechiſt in the college, and having undertaken to read a lecture on the Ten Commandments every Saturday and Sunday at three o'clock in the afternoon, great numbers out of the other colleges of the univerſity, and even out of the country, duly reſorted to Pembroke chapel, as to a Divinity lecture. At the ſame time, he was eſteemed ſo profound a Caſuiſt, that he was often conſulted in the niceſt and moſt difficult caſes of conſcience. And now his reputation being ſpread far and near, Henry Earl of Huntington prevailed upon him to accompany him into the North, of which he was Preſident; where, by his diligent preaching, and private conferences, in which he uſed a due mixture of zeal and moderation, he converted ſeveral Recuſants, Prieſts as well as others, to the Proteſtant religion. From that time he began to be taken notice of by Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth (d). That Miniſter, who was unwilling ſo fine a genius ſhould be buried in the obſcurity of a country benefice, his intent being to make him Reader of controverſies in the univerſity of Cambridge, aſſigned him for his maintenance the leaſe of the parſonage of Alton in Hampſhire (e), and afterwards procured for him the Vicarage of St. Giles's Cripplegate, in London. Afterwards he was choſen a Prebendary and Reſidentiary of St. Paul's, as alſo Prebendary of the collegiate church of Southwell. Being thus preferred to his own contentment, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a diligent and excellent preacher, and read divinity lectures three times a week at St. Paul's, in term time. Upon the death of Dr. Fulke, he was choſen Maſter of Pembroke-hall, of which he had been Scholar and Fellow: a place of more honour than profit, ſince he ſpent more upon it than he received from it, and was a conſiderable benefactor to that college [C]. He was appointed one of the Chaplains in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth, who took ſuch delight in his preaching, that ſhe firſt made him a Prebendary of Weſtminſter, in the room of Dr. Richard Bancroft promoted to the See of London; and afterwards Dean of that church, in the room of Dr. Gabriel Goodman deceaſed (f). Dr. Andrews ſoon grew into far greater eſteem with her ſucceſſor King James I., who not only gave him the preference to all other Divines as a preacher, but likewiſe made choice of him to vindicate his ſovereignty againſt the virulent pens of his enemies [D]. That King promoted him to the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter, to which he was conſecrated November 3, 1605 (g). At the ſame time he made him his Lord Almoner; in which place of great truſt he behaved with ſingular fidelity, diſpoſing of the royal benevolence in the propereſt manner, and not making thoſe advantages to himſelf that he might legally and fairly have done (h). Upon the vacancy of the Biſhoprick of Ely, he was advanced to that See, and conſecrated September 22, 1609 (i). He was nominated one of his Majeſty's Privy Counſellors of England; and afterwards of Scotland, when he attended the King in his journey to that kingdom. After he had ſat nine years in that See, he was advanced to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, and Deanery of the King's chapel, February 18, 1618 (k); which two laſt preferments he held till his death. There is a pleaſant ſtory related of him, while he was Biſhop of Wincheſter, in the Life of Mr. Waller the Poet [E]. This great Prelate was in no leſs reputation and eſteem with King Charles I., than he had been with his predeceſſors. At length he departed this life, at Wincheſter houſe in Southwark, September 25, 1626, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age; and was buried in the pariſh-church of St. Saviour's, Southwark; where his executors erected to him a very fair monument of marble and alabaſter, on which is an elegant Latin inſcription [F], written by one of his Chaplains. By his laſt Will and Teſtament, he left to that college one thouſand pounds, to purchaſe lands for two fellowſhips, and other uſes; three hundred volumes in folio to the library, of ſuch books as were not there before; and laſtly, a gilt cup, baſon, and ewer, exactly like thoſe given three hundred years before to the college by the pious foundreſs (3).

However, being unwilling to loſe Mr. Dove, for whom they had a great eſteem, they made him an allowance for his preſent maintenance, under the title of Tanquam Socius (2).

The King ſet Biſhop Andrews to anſwer the Cardinal; who did it, with great ſpirit and judgment, in a piece entitled, Tortura Torti: ſive, ad Matthæi Torti Librum Reſponſio, qui nuper editus contra Apologiam Sereniſſimi Potentiſſimique Principis Jacobi, Dei Gratia Magnæ Britanniæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Regis, pro Juramento Fidelitatis, *i. e. The ſubſtance of what the Biſhop advances in this treatiſe, and with great ſtrength of reaſon and evidence evinces, is, that Kings have power both to call Synods and confirm them; and to do all other things, which the Emperors heretofore diligently performed, and which the Biſhops of thoſe times willingly acknowledged of right to belong to them. Ut conſiſtat adhuc poteſtas ſua regibus, qua & Synodos convocare & confirmare poſſent; & obire reliqua omnia, quæ & olim qui Imperatores diligenter obierunt, & qui tum epiſcopi libenter agnoverunt (5). i. e. 'Reader, if thou art a Chriſtian, ſtay; it will be 'worth thy tarrying, to know how great a man lies 'here. A member of the ſame Catholic Church with 'thyſelf; under the ſame hope of a happy reſurrec-'tion; and in expectation of the ſame appearance 'of our Lord Jeſus: the moſt holy Biſhop LANCE-'LOT ANDREWS; born at London; educated at 'Cambridge; one of the Scholars, Fellows, and 'Maſters of Pembroke-Hall, and inferior to none: 'an infinite treaſure, an amazing oracle, of lan-'guages, arts and ſciences, and every branch of 'human and divine learning: an incomparable bul-'wark of the Orthodox Church of Chriſt, by his 'converſation, writings, prayers, and example. He 'was chaplain in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth; 'Reſidentiary of St. Paul's in London; Dean of St. 'Peter's Weſtminſter; Biſhop, firſt of Chicheſter, 'then of Ely, and laſtly of Wincheſter; Almoner to 'King James, Privy-Counſellor of both kingdoms, 'and Dean of the Royal Chapel. He merits eter-'nal admiration, for his indefatigable application 'to his ſtudies, his conſummate experience and ſkill 'in affairs, his conſtant piety towards God, his li-'berality and charity to the poor, his uncommon 'affability and humanity to thoſe about him, and 'his unſhaken integrity towards all. Full of years 'and reputation, to the regret of all good men, he 'died a bachelor, and exchanged this life for a 'crown of glory; in the ſecond year of King Charles, 'the ſeventy-firſt of his age, and that of Chriſt '1626. Reader, farewel, and give glory to God.'

[G] His ſermons.] In the volume of his ſermons, dedicated to King Charles I. there are ſeventeen on the Nativity, preached on Chriſtmas-day; eight upon Repentance and Faſting, preached on Aſhwed-neſday; ſix preached in Lent; three on the Paſ-ſion, preached on Good-Friday; eighteen on the Re-ſurrection, preached upon Eaſter-day; fifteen on the ſending of the Holy Ghoſt, preached upon Whit-ſunday; eight preached on the fifth of Auguſt; ten on the fifth of November, and eleven on ſeveral oc-caſions. They were publiſhed by the direction of his Majeſty, and under the care and inſpection of Dr. William Laud, then Biſhop of London, and Dr. John Buckeridge, Biſhop of Ely; the latter of whom preached Biſhop Andrews's funeral ſermon. 'When 'the author died (ſay theſe editors in their dedica-'tion to the King), your Majeſty thought it not fit his 'ſermons ſhould die with him. And though they 'could not live with all that elegance, which they 'had upon his tongue, yet you were graciouſly 'pleaſed to think a paper-life better than none. 'Upon this, your Majeſty gave us a ſtrict charge, 'that we ſhould overlook the papers (as well Ser-'mons as other Tractates) of that reverend and 'worthy Prelate, and print all that we found per-'fect. Had they not come perfect, we ſhould not 'have ventured to add any limme unto them, leſt 'mixing a pen farre inferior, we ſhould have diſ-'figured ſuch complete bodies. Your Majeſty's firſt 'care was for the preſſe, that the work might be 'public. Your ſecond was for the work itſelf, that 'it might come forth worthy the author; which 'could not be, if it came not forth as he left it. 'In purſuance of theſe two, we have brought the 'work to light, and we have done it with care and 'fidelity: for as the ſermons were preached, ſo are 'they publiſhed. When he preached them, they 'had the general approbation of the court, and they 'made him famous for making them. Now they 'are printed, we hope they will have the general 'liking of the church, and enlarge and endeare his 'name to them that knew not him.' Dr. Fuller tells us, Biſhop Andrews was an unimitable preacher in his way, and ſuch plagiaries who have ſtolen his ſermons could never ſteal his preaching, and could make nothing of that, whereof he made all things as he deſired. Pious and pleaſant Biſhop Felton (he adds) his contem-porary and colleague, endeavoured in vain in his ſer-mons to aſſimulate his ſtyle, and therefore ſaid merrily of himſelf: 'I had almoſt marred my own natural trot by 'endeavouring to imitate his artificial amble (8).' But however admired Biſhop Andrews's ſermons were in that age, they are not in ſuch eſteem with the critics of the preſent. For, notwithſtanding the learning and good ſenſe with which they abound, yet the affectation in the ſtyle, and compoſition, makes them no longer read with pleaſure. Even a contemporary author (9) cenſured them as affected and ſurcharged with verbal alluſions. And a modern writer tells us, that 'Biſhop Andrews, and the moſt 'eminent Divines in the beginning of the laſt cen-'tury, reduced preaching to punning, and the elo-'quence of the chair to the buffoonery of the 'ſtage (10).'

(13) That lady was convicted of disobedience for refusing to answer or be examined, on pretence she had made a solemn vow to the contrary.

[I] His great zeal and piety.] These were distinguishable in his private and secret devotions, in which he daily spent many hours; and in his public prayers with his family. His chapel, in which he had monthly communions, was so decently and reverently adorned, and the behaviour of himself and his family so pious and exemplary, that many, who came thither (even through accident) in the time of divine service, were greatly affected therewith, and excited to the like reverend deportment; and some even desired to end their days in Bishop Andrews's chapel (14).

(14) Life, &c. ubi supra.

[K] His charity and compassion.] These he practised even before he came to great preferments, extending his charity in a liberal manner to the relief of poor parishioners, and prisoners; besides his constant Sunday alms in his parish of St. Giles's. But when his means became greater, his charity increased in a large proportion. And one thing in his manner of relieving the distressed, is remarkable, that he always gave strict charge to his servants, whom he entrusted with the distribution of his bounty, not to acknowledge from whence the relief came, but give it as from a benefactor unknown. His private alms alone, in his last six years, amounted to upwards of 1300 l. Nor did his charity end with his life: for by his last Will, he left 4000 l. to purchase 200 l. per annum, in land, to be distributed quarterly in the following manner: to aged and decayed poor men, especially sea-faring men, fifty pounds; to poor widows, the wives of one husband, fifty pounds; to the binding of poor orphans apprentices, fifty pounds; and to the relief of poor prisoners, fifty pounds. He left besides, to be distributed presently after his death, among maid-servants of honest report, and who had served one master or mistress seven years, the sum of two hundred pounds. Lastly, a great part of his estate, which remained after the expences of his funeral and his legacies were discharged, he left to be distributed among his poor servants (15).

(15) Ibid.

[L] His fidelity and integrity.] He was ever careful to keep in good repair the houses of all his spiritual preferments, and spent much money that way; as, upon the vicarage-house of St. Giles's, the prebendal and deanery houses of Westminster. He expended upon the episcopal palace of Chichester above 420 l. upon that of Ely above 2440 l. and upon that of Winchester 2000 l. But his fidelity and integrity were most discoverable in his pastoral care and government of his dioceses. He filled the vacant preferments, which were in his own gift, with the ablest and best men; and often conferred benefices on men of character and learning, who stood in need of them, without any solicitation or request on their part. So that what was once said of St. Chrysostom, may be fitly applied to Bishop Andrews: In administratione Episcopatus præbuit se fidelem, constantem, & vigilantem Ministrum Christi. Nor was he less faithful in the discharge of those temporal offices, with which he was vested. Not to mention here his conduct as head of Pembroke-hall (16), his regulation of Westminster college and school sufficiently speak for him. To which may be added, that, whereas by virtue of his deanery of Westminster, his mastership of Pembroke-hall, and his Bishoprick of Ely, the election of scholars into the school of Westminster, and from thence to the two Universities, as also of many scholars and fellows in Pembroke-hall, some in Peterhouse, and some in Jesus-college, was in his power and his disposal; he waved all letters of recommendation from great persons; and, setting aside all favour and affection, chose only such as in his judgment were fittest (17).

(16) See the remark [C].

[M] His gratitude and thankfulness.] Of this virtue there were several instances. Among the rest, he gave the living of Waltham in Hampshire to Dr. Ward, son of his first schoolmaster. And he always retained so high an esteem for his other schoolmaster Mr. Mulcaster, that he used to place him at the upper end of his table; and, after his death, caused his picture to be hung up over his study-door. After much enquiry concerning the kindred of Dr. Watts, who had bestowed on him his first scholarship at Pembroke-hall, he found but one; to whom, being a scholar, he gave preferments in that college; and at his death ordered, by his Will, that out of the scholarships of Dr. Watts's foundation, the two fellowships, which he himself had founded at Pembroke-hall, should be supplied, if such scholars should be found qualified for them (18).

(18) Ibid.

[N] His munificence and bounty.] After he became a Bishop, he never visited either of the Universities, but he left fifty or an hundred pounds to be distributed among poor scholars. And when King James honoured the university of Cambridge with his presence in 1617, Bishop Andrews, who was present with his Majesty at the Philosophy-Act, sent, at his departure, to four of the disputants, forty pieces of gold, of two and twenty shillings a piece, to be divided equally among them. To these instances may be added, the magnificent entertainment he gave his said Majesty at Farnham Castle, where in the space of three days he spent three thousand pounds (19).

(19) Ibid.

[O] His hospitality.] His table, which was always plentifully and elegantly furnished, was open to all persons of quality and worth, especially scholars and strangers. And his behaviour to his guests was so courteous, and his discourse so gravely facetious, that those whom he entertained would often profess they never came to any man's table, where they received better satisfaction; and that in respect to the plenty they found there, his Lordship kept Christmas all the year (20).

[P] His humanity and affability.] These were conspicuous, not only in his behaviour towards his guests (as mentioned in the last remark) but in his general conversation; for which he was justly admired by the most famous scholars both at home and abroad: such as (to omit those of our own nation) Casaubon, Cluverius, Vossius, Grotius, Du Moulin, Erpenius, and others (21).

modeſty [Q], his diligent application to ſtudy [R], and his talents as a preacher and a writer [S]. He generally hated all ſorts of vices, but more eſpecially three, which were, uſury, ſimony, and ſacrilege [T]. King James had ſo great an awe and veneration for him, that, in his preſence, he refrained from that mirth and levity, in which he indulged himſelf at other times (n). What opinion my Lord Clarendon had of him, appears from hence, that, in mentioning the death of Dr. Bancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he remarks, that 'if he had been ſucceeded by Biſhop Andrews, or any man 'who underſtood and loved the Church, that infection would eaſily have been kept out, 'which could not afterwards be ſo eaſily expelled (o).' Our great Poet Milton thought him worthy of his pen, and wrote a Latin elegy on his death (p). His ſtyle and manner of writing, however admired in that age, are very exceptionable in the opinion of the beſt critics of the preſent (q).

(p) Paradiſe Regained, &c. Lond. 1725, 12mo. p. 286. Milton was but 17, when he wrote that poem.

[Q] His modeſty.] This was ſo great, that, though the whole world took notice of his deep and profound learning, yet he was ſo far from acknowledging it, that he would often complain of his defects, profeſſing that he was but inutilis ſervus, nay inutile pondus. Being promoted to the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter, he was ſo ſenſible of his inſufficiency to undergo ſuch a charge, that he cauſed to be engraven about the epiſcopal ſeal theſe words of St. Paul, 'Et ad hæc 'quis idoneus? i. e. And who is ſufficient for theſe 'Things?' 2 Cor. ii. 16. (22)

[R] His diligent application to ſtudy.] This can ſcarcely be paralleled, if we conſider him from his childhood to his old age. Never any man ſpent ſo much time in ſtudy as this reverend Prelate. From the hour he roſe (his private devotions finiſhed) to the time he was called to dinner, which was not till twelve o'clock at the ſooneſt, he kept cloſe to his books, nor would be interrupted by any that came to ſpeak with him, or upon any occaſion, public prayer excepted. And he was ſo diſpleaſed with ſcholars, who attempted to ſpeak with him in a morning, that he would ſay, he doubted they were no true ſcholars that came to him before noon. He would ſpend two or three hours after dinner, in converſing with his gueſts, or in diſpatching his own temporal affairs, or thoſe belonging to his epiſcopal juriſdiction; and having got rid of theſe and the like avocations, he would return to his ſtudy, where he uſually ſpent the reſt of the afternoon until bed-time. Nor was he leſs diligent in his application to ſtudy even at that time of life, when it might be expected he would have taken ſome reſpite from his former pains (23).

(23) Ibid.

[S] His talents as a preacher and a writer.] He had ſuch a dexterity at preaching, that ſome would ſay of him, he was quick again as ſoon as delivered: ſo that he was truly ſtyled Stella Prædicantium, and an angel in the pulpit (24). And as to his acuteneſs and profundity in controverſial writing, he ſo excelled all others of his time, that neither Bellarmin, nor any other of the Romaniſts, were ever able to anſwer what he wrote (25): ſo that, as his ſermons were inimitable, his writings were unanſwerable (26).

(24) See more of his character as a Preacher in the remark [G].

(26) Ibid.

[T] He hated three vices more eſpecially, Uſury, Simony, and Sacrilege.] With reſpect to the firſt of theſe vices, he was ſo far from it himſelf, that, when his friends ſtood in need of ſuch money as he could ſpare, he lent it them freely without intereſt. As to Simony, it was ſo deteſtable to him, that for refuſing to admit ſeveral perſons to livings, whom he ſuſpected to be ſimoniacally preferred, he ſuffered much by ſuits of law; chooſing to be compelled, againſt his will, by the law, to admit them, rather than voluntarily to do that which his conſcience made a ſcruple of. So that what was ſaid of Robert of Winchelſea, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, may be applied to Biſhop Andrews: 'Beneficia eccleſiaſtica nunquam niſi 'doctis contulit; precibus & gratia nobilium fretos '& ambientes ſemper repulit; i. e. He never conferred 'eccleſiaſtical preferments on any but men of learning, 'and always rejected thoſe who ſought for them by 'the favour and recommendation of great men.' His abhorrence of Sacrilege appeared from hence, that when the Biſhoprics of Saliſbury and Ely were offered him upon terms favouring that way, he utterly rejected them. And when he was Biſhop of Wincheſter, he refuſed ſeveral large ſums for the renewing of ſome leaſes, becauſe he conceived ſuch renewal would be prejudicial to his ſucceſſors (27). B.

[Dr. Andrews had a ſhare in the Tranſlation of the Pentateuch, and in the hiſtorical books of the Old Teſtament, down to the end of the ſecond book of Kings (28). The great corruption of the oratory of the pulpit, in the opinion of Dr. Birch, may be aſcribed to him; his high reputation, on other accounts, having given a ſanction to the vicious taſte which he introduced ſeveral years before the death of Queen Elizabeth. However, it was the pedantry of King James the Firſt's court which completed the degeneracy of true Eloquence (29). There is, in the General Dictionary, a large extract from one of Biſhop Andrews's ſermons, in which, though there is much diſplay of learning (which the ſubject and the occaſion called for), we ſee nothing of the punning and falſe wit uſually charged upon him (30).—This excellent prelate is an inſtance of how little advantage the greateſt abilities and learning will be, to conſtitute a ſolid and permanent literary reputation, if not united with a juſt taſte in compoſition. The ſubjects, likewiſe, upon which ſeveral of his works were written, though very important at the time he lived in, do not now excite a great attention. Singularly happy are thoſe authors who treat upon matters which are always intereſting, and who do it in a manner that will for ever pleaſe. Such writers, in every age, conſiſt but of a ſmall number.] K.

ANDREWS, or as himſelf wrote it, ANDREWE (EUSEBIUS) a gentleman of a good family ſeated in Middleſex (a). He was, when young, brought into the family of Lord Capel, to whom he was afterwards Secretary. By the direction of his patron he applied himſelf to the Law, and became a Barriſter of Gray's-Inn, as many authors tell us (b), though there ſeems to be good authority to prove his being of Lincoln's Inn (c). However, in the year 1642, he quitted the gown, in order to take up arms for his Majeſty King Charles I., whom he ſerved in the honourable poſt of a Colonel, with great loyalty and courage, till the ſurrender of Worceſter in 1645; when, ſuppoſing the King's affairs not capable of being retrieved, he returned privately to London, in order to take ſome care of his own (d). He practiſed for ſome time privately, and it ſeems was a man of ſuch capacity, and of ſo ſteady a loyalty, that the Parliament, or rather thoſe who directed it, cauſed ſpies to be placed upon him, from almoſt his firſt coming to town, to the day of his death, or at leaſt of his apprehenſion (e). But theſe ſpies finding nothing to report of Colonel Andrewe, but his good affection to the royal cauſe, it was thought proper to puſh him, and ſeveral others, ſince they they would not do it of themſelves, to take methods for their own ruin [A]. With this view, in the Spring of the year 1649, one Mr. John Barnard, who had been Major to Colonel Andrewe's regiment, and who, for his ſober behaviour and great parts, had been much in his favour (f), informed the Colonel, that ſome of the Reformadoes, that is, reduced officers in the Parliament's ſervice, were ſorry for what they had done, and inclined to return to their duty, and promote, as far as lay in their power, the ſervice of King Charles II. The ſame perſon brought to the acquaintance of Colonel Andrewe, Captain Holmes, and one Mr. John Benſon, who were in the ſame ſituation with himſelf (g). When they were together, Major Barnard propoſed an attempt upon the Iſle of Ely, which he knew Colonel Andrewe had formerly meditated, when in the ſervice of King Charles I. At the ſame time, he told the Colonel, that Sir John Gell, who had been formerly a Colonel in the Parliament ſervice, and who was known to have a great intereſt in his country, would aſſiſt in ſuch a deſign. After ſome diſcourſe, the eighteenth of October was mentioned as a proper day for the enterprize, becauſe it was the fair day (h). Some time after this, Captain Holmes brought inſtructions from Sir John Gell, to draw a petition for the payment of his arrears, which Mr. Andrewe performed. Soon after he had a conference with Sir John, whereby he found all that had been reported to him of that gentleman, true. This gave him a greater confidence in the people who had hitherto tranſacted with him, inſomuch that he ventured to make a journey into Cambridgeſhire, on purpoſe to ſee how far his ſcheme of ſurprizing the Iſle of Ely, might be practicable upon a proper occaſion (i). On his return, however, finding the ſteps taken by his confederates no way anſwerable to their promiſes, or his own expectations, and finding alſo that he was within the compaſs of a new law, which required all ſuch as had not taken the Proteſtation, the Solemn League and Covenant, the Negative Oath, or ſubſcribed a late engagement, to quit the kingdom by a day prefixed, he turned his thought ſolely to the providing for his retreat, which was, ſtrictly ſpeaking, an exile (k). With this view he entered into a treaty with Sir Edmund Plowden, who was proprietor of New Albion, reſolving to fix himſelf in that plantation. But on Saturday the ſixteenth of March, Major Barnard, and Captain Benſon, came to make him a viſit, wherein they told him in general terms, that there was a great deſign on foot, and that he ſhould have immediately very conſiderable advantages, if he would go over to the King in Holland, and manage what was neceſſary there for the ſervice of thoſe concerned. To this the Colonel aſſented, provided the money that was promiſed appeared to be ready (l). Not long after, the ſame perſons came again, aſſuring him, that there were ſeveral perſons of quality and great eſtates, in the counties of Kent, Buckingham, and Dorſet, who would draw near the town in order to further the deſign, provided thoſe they were to treat with entered into an engagement, which engagement, according to their inſtructions, and at their requeſts, he drew, and promiſed to move Sir John Gell to ſign and ſeal it, as he himſelf did (m) [B]. [A] Since they would not of themſelves take methods for their own ruin.] This practice of ſetting on foot plots, in order to take off ſuch perſons as are eſteemed dangerous to any government, might have been in danger of wanting a proper name, if we had not been informed, that at this time it was called in England, TREPANNING. The author who tells us this, tells us alſo, the import of this phraſe: Trepan, ſays he, was a word newly heard in England, being a denomination of a lewd ſort of people, who proſtitute ſtrumpets under pretence of their being their wives; and having apprehended perſons of eſtates, by a ſign given in the faſt, proſecuted them at law, to the recovery of great damages (1). Thus we ſee the original of this term, and how it came to be applied in a political ſenſe. Colonel Andrewe, in a petition preſented by him to parliament, gives us ſo very juſt a deſcription of his caſe, that it will be proper to make uſe of his own words. After the ſtyle of the petition he proceeds thus: 'That your 'petitioner hath been by a confederate pack of ſet-'ters wrought into actions, which, abſtracted from 'their circumſtances, render him liable to your 'juſtice; and this done not without their further 'hope, that your petitioner, as they ſuppoſed, had 'intereſt to have drawn divers perſons of quality 'and fortune into the ſame entanglement. That 'failing of that part of their aim, the ſaid confede-'rates did betray your petitioner to the Council of 'State, &c. (2).' A very intelligent perſon aſſures us, that Bernard and Pits, two of the witneſſes againſt Mr. Andrewe, were ſuborned by Serjeant Bradſhaw, and Sir Henry Mildmay (3). But if theſe were all calumnies, there is a clear proof of the truth of this fact, which ariſes thus: Colonel Andrewe, who was a man of ſpirit and ſpoke freely, fairly charged it upon Bradſhaw at one of his examinations; who, inſtead of denying it, pretended to juſtify it by the example of other States (4). Yet was this no better than an evaſion; for under no legal government was there ever men employed to make plots, though ſpies have been encouraged to deteſt them. This policy, however, was found of ſuch uſe to that government, that it was practiſed as long as it ſubſiſted: what the fate was of the perſon principally employed in decoying Colonel Andrewe, the reader will ſee at the end of this article; and if he inclines to be better acquainted with the whole affair, he may meet with a very circumſtantial account of it, written by Mr. Beaukley, who aſſiſted Colonel Andrewe in his impriſonment, in the State Trials (5). There is beſides a paſſage in a book written by a perſon too honeſt to deceive, and too well informed to be himſelf miſled, I mean Dr. Bates who was Phyſician to O. Cromwell; there is, I ſay, a paſſage in a work of his, which too nearly concerns this matter to be omitted: for having related the various means made uſe of to weaken the Royaliſts, he ſays, 'There were alſo, a kind of Duckoys 'and Trepans, of all men the moſt accurſed, whoſe 'chief ſtudy was to teaze the moſt hot-headed and 'choleric, and who drew them thereby into capital 'ſnares, and when they had thus caught them, in-'formed againſt them, that they might be brought 'to a trial, or oppreſſed them with ſecret calumnies. 'Colonel Andrewe thus circumvented loſt his head: 'nor was the preſident Bradſhaw aſhamed openly 'to declare in court, that, by counterfeit letters, he 'had correſponded with him in the name of the 'King (6).'

[B] To move Sir John Gell, to ſign and ſeal it as he himſelf did.] The judicious reader will eaſily perceive, that thoſe who ſet this matter on foot, had more in view than the bare deſtruction of Colonel accordingly mentioned it to Sir John, who abſolutely refuſed to comply with his deſire; but told him in general, that he was well affected to the King, and begged him to tell his Majeſty as much, in caſe he went over to Holland (n). On Monday following, Major Barnard appointed the Colonel to meet the gentlemen of the ſeveral counties beforementioned, at a certain place; but when the Colonel came there, he found nobody but Major Barnard, who produced to him certain letters, written as from the aforeſaid gentlemen, and requiring him, the Major, to come to them immediately. Thus from time to time they trifled with the Colonel, in hopes of gaining by his means Sir John Gell's ſubſcription, and actually drew Mr. Andrewe as far as Graveſend, upon an aſſurance, that if he did not receive two hundred pounds there, he ſhould have his ſubſcription delivered up to him. But waiting for the performance of theſe fair promiſes, he was, on the twenty-fourth of March, apprehended at Graveſend, by Major Parker, who brought him priſoner to London (o). The next day he was examined by the Lord Preſident Bradſhaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Scott, Eſq; who were a Committee from the Council of State. The queſtions they put to him were ſo nice and particular, that the Colonel ſaw he was betrayed, and that they knew every ſtep he had taken for four years together. He told them as much, and they did not deny it, but preſſed him to make a full and free confeſſion. Accordingly he drew a narrative of the whole affair, and laid it before them, which did not hinder their committing him on Sunday the thirtieth of March, to the Tower, for high-treaſon (p). From that time forwards he petitioned them frequently, but to no purpoſe, continuing a cloſe priſoner for three months complete, notwithſtanding he alſo preſented a petition to Parliament (q). In the beginning of Auguſt 1650, he was brought before the High Court of Juſtice, where he was proſecuted upon his own narrative before Bradſhaw, at whoſe inſtance he had drawn it. The Attorney General, Prideaux, treated him with very bad language, nor was it without ſome difficulty that he procured leave to offer any thing to the court; but he could not obtain permiſſion to put in his anſwer in writing, which is exactly tranſcribed in the notes (r) [C]. After this he offered to put in a ſecond and a third anſwer of the ſame date, but not being permitted, he made a noble defence by Andrewe, and therefore it is neceſſary to explain a little what that deſign was. It is, in the firſt place, to be remarked, that immediately after the murder of the King, the affairs of the parliament were in a very doubtful poſture, and grew worſe for ſome time. The Scots had actually owned King Charles II. and were preparing to reſtore him: Sir Thomas Fairfax had laid down his commiſſion in diſcontent; but that which gave them moſt pain, was the general defection of the Preſbyterians, who had ſhown a general abhorrence of the proceedings againſt the King, and many of their miniſters had given broad indications of their wiſhing well to the King of Scots. This plot, therefore, was laid, to deſtroy the wiſeſt and warieſt of that party: Sir John Gell, whom it was preſumed Colonel Andrewe might draw in, and then, as Major Barnard actually told the Colonel, Sir Guy Palmes, Sir John Curſon, Sir Thomas Whitmore, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction would join them, on Sir John Gell's firſt motion. If, therefore, this plot had taken, the whole Preſbyterian intereſt had been undone (7). As it was, the impriſonment of Sir John Gell, and the forfeiture of his eſtate, intimidated his friends, and made way for an event, thoſe who projected this plot, never thought of; the turning out of the parliament by Cromwell, to whoſe power Bradſhaw was as great an enemy, as ever he had been to the King's, and actually ſerved, as far as he could, ſuch of the Royaliſts as eſcaped the high court of juſtice, when power fell into other hands (8).

The Humble Anſwer of Euſebius Andrewe, Eſq; in his Defence, to the Proceeding againſt him, before the Honourable High Court of Juſtice, preſented the 16th Day of Auguſt, 1650.

'THE ſaid reſpondent (with the favour of this honourable court) reſerving, and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further anſwer; offereth to this honourable court. Firſt, that by the ſtatute or charter, ſtiled Magna Charta, which is the fundamental law, and ought to be the ſtandard of the laws of England, confirmed above thirty times, and yet unrepealed; it is in the 29th chapter thereof, granted and enacted, 1. That no freeman ſhall be taken or impriſoned, or be diſſeiſed of his freehold or liberties, or free cuſtom, or to be outlawed, or exiled, or be any otherwiſe deſtroyed; nor will we paſs upon him, or condemn him, but by a lawful judgment of his peers, and by the laws of the land. 2. We ſhall ſell to no man, nor defer to any man juſtice or right. Secondly, that by the ſtatute of 42 of Edward III. cap. 1. — 1. The great charter is commanded to be kept in all points; and 2. It is enacted, that if any ſtatute be made to the contrary, that ſhall be holden for none; which ſtatute is unrepealed. The reſpondent obſerveth, that by an act of the 26th of March, 1650, entitled, an act for eſtabliſhing an high court of juſtice; power is given to this court, to try, condemn, and cauſe execution of death to be done upon the freemen of England; according as the major number of any twelve of the members thereof ſhall judge to appertain to juſtice. And thereupon the reſpondent doth humbly infer, and offereth for law: that the ſaid act is diametrically contrary unto, and utterly inconſiſtent with, the ſaid great charter, and is therefore by the ſaid recited ſtatute, to be holden for none. That it can with no more reaſon, equity, or juſtice, hold the value and reputation of a law (the ſaid ſtatutes before recited, being in force), than if contrary to the ſecond clauſe in the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, it had been alſo enacted, that juſtice and right ſhall be deferred to all freemen, and ſold to all that will buy it. Thirdly, that upon premiſing by the petition of right, 3 Car. That contrary to the great charter, trials and executions had been had and done againſt the ſubjects, by commiſſions, martial, &c. It was therefore prayed, and by the commiſſion enacted; that, 1. No commiſſion of the like nature might be thenceforth iſſued, &c. And that done, 2. To prevent, leſt any of the ſubjects ſhould be put to death, contrary to the laws and franchiſe of the Land. The reſpondent humbly obſerveth, and affirmeth, that this court is, (though under a different ſtyle) in nature, and in the proceeding hereof, directly the ſame with the commiſſion martial; the freemen thereby, being to be tried for life, and adjudged by the major number of the commiſſioners ſitting (as in courts of commiſſioners martial was practiſed, and was agreeable to their conſtitution), and conſequently againſt the petition of right; in which he and all the freemen of England (if it be granted there be any ſuch) hath, and have right and intereſt, and he humbly by word of mouth, grounded chiefly on the illegality of the court, and which may perhaps be ſtyled, as eloquent an oration as is to be met with in our own, or any foreign language. To all which, Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux made the following ſhort anſwer, viz. That the Court was not at leiſure to take notice of his law caſes, but of his confeſſion. That he had an affection to act, though nothing acted, which was ſufficient treaſon, and for that affection he deſerved death (s). On this the Court pronounced ſentence againſt him, that he ſhould be hanged, drawn, and quartered. The Colonel, upon this, offered his reaſons at large againſt ſuch a proceeding, but to no purpoſe; and the only favour granted him was this, that, upon his petition, the parliament paſſed an act, authorizing the High Court of Juſtice to iſſue their warrant for their beheading him according to his petition (t). This was accordingly executed on a ſcaffold on Tower-hill, upon the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, 1650. He died with great reſolution, as appears by the ſpeech he made to the people, of which the reader will find an extract in the notes [D]. He left behind him an only daughter, Mavilda Andrewe, to whom he bequeathed a great deal of good advice, and a very narrow fortune (u). At his condem-

' humbly claims his right accordingly. Fourthly, ' that by the remonſtrance of the 15th of December, ' and the declaration of the 17th of January, 1641, ' the benefit of the laws and ordinary courts of juſ- ' tice, are the ſubjects birth-rights. By the declara- ' tions of the 12th of July, and 16th of October, ' 1642, the preſervation of the laws, and the due ad- ' miniſtration of juſtice, are owned to be the juſti- ' fying cauſe of the war; and the ends of the parlia- ' ment's affairs, managed by their ſwords and coun- ' cils: and God's curſe is by them imprecated, in ' caſe they ſhould ever decline thoſe ends. By the ' declaration of the 17th April, 1646, promiſe was ' made not to interrupt the courſe of juſtice in the ' ordinary courts thereof. By the ordinance or votes ' of non-addreſſes, January 1648, it is aſſured on ' the parliament's behalf, that though they lay the ' King aſide, yet they will govern by the laws, and ' not interrupt the courſe of juſtice, in the ordinary ' courts thereof. And thereupon the reſpondent ' humbly inferreth, and affirmeth, that the conſti- ' tution of this court, is a breach of that public ' faith of the parliament, exhibited and pledged in ' the declarations and votes to the freemen of Eng- ' land. And upon the whole matter, the reſpon- ' dent (ſaving as aforeſaid) doth humbly affirm for ' law, and claim as his right. 1. That this court, ' in defect of the validity of the act, by which ' it is conſtituted, hath not power againſt him, or ' to preſs him into a further anſwer. 2. That by ' virtue of Magna Charta, the petition of right, and ' the before-recited remonſtrance and declarations, ' he ought not to be proceeded againſt by this court ' but by an ordinary court of juſtice, and to be ' tried by his peers. And prays that this preſent an- ' ſwer and ſalvo may be accepted and regiſtered, and ' that he may be tried by his peers accordingly (9).

' Euſ. Andrewe.'

(9) State Trials, Vol. vii. p. 329, 330.

The intent of tranſcribing this paper, is to ſhow the temper and ſpirit of Colonel Andrewe, whoſe reaſons were fatal to the high court of juſtice, though of no ſervice to him. For upon publication of them, and the concurring judgment of all lawyers, this court grew to be ſo univerſally deteſted, and the grounds of its illegality were ſo openly diſcuſſed, that the powers then in being, found it abſolutely neceſſary to lay it aſide.

[D] The reader will find an extract in the notes.] Colonel Andrewe was attended in his laſt moments by Dr. Swadling, the ſequeſtered miniſter of St. Botolph Aldgate, who had been permitted to viſit him for three days before, in which ſpace he had ſeen ſo much of the Colonel's diſpoſition; that immediately before he ſuffered, the doctor told him, he had been rather his ſcholar than his inſtructor, and gave thanks for the many Chriſtian diſcourſes they had had together (10). Mr. Andrewe, after he had been ſome time on the ſcaffold, turned to the people and made a long ſpeech, ſome paragraphs of which deſerve the reader's notice (11). ' As for my ' accuſers, ſaid he, or rather betrayers, I pity, and ' am ſorry for them. They have committed Judas ' his crime; but I wiſh and pray for them Peter's ' tears, that by Peter's repentance, they may eſcape ' Judas his puniſhment, and I wiſh other people ſo ' happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they ' have drunk more blood of Chriſtian men poſſibly ' leſs deſerving than myſelf. It is true, there have ' been ſeveral addreſſes made for mercy, and I will ' put the obſtruction of it, upon nothing more than ' my own ſin, and ſeeing God ſees it fit (I have ' not glorified him in my life) I might do it in my ' death, which I am content to do. I profeſs, in ' the face of God, particular malice to any one ' of the ſtate or parliament, to do them a bodily in- ' jury, I had none. For the cauſe in which I had ' a great while waited, I muſt needs ſay, my en- ' gagement or continuance in it, hath laid no ſcru- ' ple upon my conſcience, it was on principles of ' law: the knowledge whereof I profeſs, and on ' principles of religion, my judgment ſatisfied, my ' conſcience rectified, that I have purſued thoſe ways ' for which I bleſs God, I find no blackneſs upon ' my conſcience, nor have I put it into the bead- ' roll of my ſins. I will not preſume to decide con- ' troverſies; I deſire God to honour himſelf in pro- ' ſpering that ſide that hath right with it, and that ' you may enjoy peace and plenty, when I ſhall ' enjoy peace and plenty, beyond all you poſſeſs ' here. In my converſation in the world, I do not ' know where I have an enemy with cauſe, or that ' there is ſuch a perſon to whom I have a regret; ' but if there be any, whom I cannot recollect un- ' der the notion of Chriſtian men, I pardon them, ' as freely as if I had named them by name; I ' freely forgive them, being in free peace with all ' the world, as I deſire God for Chriſt's ſake to ' be at peace with me. For the buſineſs of death, ' it is a ſad ſentence in itſelf, if men conſult with ' fleſh and blood. But truly, without boaſting I ſay ' it, or if I do boaſt, I boaſt in the Lord, I have ' not to this minute, had one conſultation with the ' fleſh, about the blow of the ax, or one thought ' of the ax more than as my paſſport to glory. ' I take it for an honour, and I owe thankfulneſs ' to thoſe under whoſe power I am, that they have ' ſent me hither, to a place however of puniſhment, ' yet of ſome honour to die a death, ſomewhat ' worthy of my blood, anſwerable to my birth and ' qualification; and this courteſie of theirs, hath ' much helped towards the pacification of my mind. ' I ſhall deſire God, that thoſe gentlemen in that ' ſad bead-roll, to be tried by the high court of ' juſtice, that they may find, that really there is ' that is nominal in the act, an high court of juſtice, ' a court of right juſtice, hath in its righteouſneſs, ' though not in it's ſeverity, no more clouded with ' the teſtimony of thoſe who ſell blood for profit. ' Father, forgive them, and forgive me, as I for- ' give them. I deſire now that you will pray for ' me, and not give over praying till the hour of ' death, not till the minute of death, for the hour ' is come already; that as I have a very great load ' of ſins, ſo I may have the wings of your prayers, ' to help thoſe angels that are to convey my ' ſoul to Heaven; and I doubt not, but I ſhall there ' ſee my Saviour, my gallant maſter the King ' of England, and another maſter whom I much ' honoured, my Lord Capel; hoping this day to ' ſee Chriſt in the preſence of the Father, the King ' in the preſence of him, and my Lord Capel in ' the preſence of them all, and myſelf there to re- ' joice with all other ſaints and angels forevermore.'

condemnation, one of his judges was heard to ſay, Alas poor Innocent! As for the reſt of the perſons concerned with him, they met with different fates. Sir John Gell had behaved ſo wiſely, that they could not touch his life. However, they condemned him to perpetual impriſonment, and to loſe all his eſtate (w). Captain Aſhley was ſentenced to be beheaded, but was pardoned by the Parliament. Captain Benſon was ſentenced to be hanged, and was accordingly executed on the ſeventh of October 1650 (x). Major Barnard, the evidence who had drawn all theſe gentlemen into this ſnare, had for his reward three hundred pounds in money, and a troop of horſe (y). But this did not hinder his receiving a more proper gratification four years afterwards, when, for robbing Colonel Winthorp's houſe at Weſtminſter, he ſuffered an infamous death at Tyburn (z).

—He gave the executioner three pounds, being all he had. Before he lay down upon the block, he ſpoke again to the people thus: There is not one face that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but (methinks) hath ſomething of pity in it, and may that mercy which is in your hearts, fall into your own boſoms when you have need of it; and may you never find ſuch blocks of ſin to ſtand in the way of your mercy, as I have met with. I beſeech you join with me in prayer. Then he prayed (leaning on the ſcaffold) with an audible voice for about a quarter of an hour; having done, he had ſome private conference with Dr. Swadling, then taking leave of the Sheriffs, his friends, and acquaintances, ſaluting them all with a courteous valediction, he prepared himſelf for the block, kneeling down ſaid, let me try the block, which he did, after caſting his eyes up, and fixing them very intentively upon Heaven, he ſaid, "when I ſay Lord Jeſus receive me, executioner, do thine office." Then kiſſing the ax he laid down, and with as much undaunted and yet Chriſtian courage as could be in man, did expoſe his throat to the fatal ax, his life to the executioner, and commended his ſoul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful Creator, through the meritorious paſſion of a gracious Redeemer. Saying the forementioned words, his head was ſmitten off at one blow. C.

ANNAND (William), Dean of Edinburgh in Scotland, the ſon of William Annand, Miniſter of Air, the Head-burgh royal of the ſhire of Air, in the dioceſe of Glaſgow, was born at Air in 1633. Five years after, his father was obliged to quit Scotland with his family, on account of their loyalty to the King, and adherence to the epiſcopal government eſtabliſhed by law in that country. In 1651, young Annand was admitted a ſcholar in Univerſity-college in Oxford; and though he was put under the care of a Preſbyterian tutor, yet he took all occaſions to be preſent at the ſermons preached by the loyal Divines in and near Oxford. In 1656, being then Bachelor of Arts, he received Holy Orders from the hands of Dr. Thomas Fulwar, Biſhop of Ardfert, or Kerry, in Ireland, and was appointed Preacher at Weſton on the Green, near Biceſter, in Oxfordſhire, where he met with great encouragement from Sir Francis Norris, Lord of that manor. After he had taken his degree of Maſter of Arts, he was preſented to the Vicarage of Leighton-Buzzard in Bedfordſhire; where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his edifying manner of preaching, till 1662, when he went into Scotland, in quality of Chaplain to John Earl of Middleton, the King's High-Commiſſioner to the Church of that kingdom. In the latter end of the year 1663, he was inſtituted to the Tolbooth church, at Edinburgh, and from thence was removed ſome years after to the Trone church of that city, which is likewiſe a Prebend. In April 1676, he was nominated by the King to the Deanery of Edinburgh; and in 1685, he commenced Doctor of Divinity in the univerſity of St. Andrews. He wrote ſeveral pieces, particularly thoſe mentioned below [A]. Dr. Annand died the 13th of June 1689, and was honourably interred in the Grey-Friers church in Edinburgh (a) [B].

ANNESLEY (Arthur) Earl of Angleſey, and Lord Privy-Seal, in the reign of King Charles II. He was the ſon of Sir Francis Anneſley, Baronet, Lord Mount Norris, and Viſcount Valentia in the kingdom of Ireland; by his firſt wife Dorothy, daughter of Sir John Phillips, of Picton caſtle in Pembrokſhire (a). He was born

born on the 10th of July 1614, in Fiſh-Shamble-Street in the city of Dublin, and was publickly chriſtened on the 20th of the ſame month, in the pariſh church of St. John in the ſame city, the Lord Chicheſter, then Deputy of Ireland, being his godfather, from whom he received the name of Arthur (b). He continued in Ireland till he was ten years old, and was then removed into England, where he remained about ſix years, after which he was ſent to the univerſity of Oxford. There he became a Fellow-Commoner in Magdalen college, where he was placed under the care of an experienced tutor, in 1630. He purſued his ſtudies in this place three or four years, enjoying, during that ſpace, the friendſhip and converſation of Dr. Frewen, then Preſident of that college, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, the celebrated Dr. Hammond, and ſeveral other eminent perſons, himſelf being always conſidered as a young man of great hopes, and an honour to his college (c). Sir Peter Pett affirms, in a book addreſſed to the perſon of whom we are ſpeaking, that he performed his exerciſe for a Degree in that univerſity with general applauſe (d); but of this Anthony Wood takes no notice. In 1634 he was removed to Lincoln's-Inn, where he ſtudied the law with great ſucceſs, till his father thought fit to ſend him to travel (e). He made the tour of Europe, and continued ſome time at Rome, whence he returned into England in 1640 (f). He was elected Knight of the ſhire for the county of Radnor, in that parliament, which ſat at Weſtminſter the third of November, in the ſame year, but he quickly loſt his ſeat by a vote of the Houſe that Charles Price, Eſq; was duly elected for that county. In the beginning of the civil war, Mr. Anneſley inclined to the royal cauſe, and actually ſat in the parliament held at Oxford, 1643 (g); but afterwards he reconciled himſelf ſo effectually to the parliament, as to be taken into their favour and confidence; his eſtate and quality, but above all, his great abilities, and general reputation, rendering him every way fit for the offices with which they entruſted him. The firſt of theſe was his going as Commiſſioner into Ulſter in the year 1645, by authority, under the Great Seal of England (h). It was certainly a very difficult taſk, that Mr. Anneſley and his fellow Commiſſioners undertook, conſidering that the Scotch forces, under General Monroe, had been long in poſſeſſion of thoſe parts, and had brought the Engliſh intereſt very low. However, Mr. Anneſley, who was not then much above thirty years of age, managed all things ſo dexterouſly, and with ſo perfect a judgment, both in civil and military affairs, that the great rebel Owen Roe O'Neil was diſappointed in his deſigns, both on this province and that of Connaught. The Popiſh Archbiſhop of Tuam, who was the great oracle of his party, and whoſe councils had hitherto been very ſucceſsful, was not only taken priſoner, but his papers ſeized, and his foreign correſpondence diſcovered, by which all the deſigns of the rebels were broken, and vaſt advantages accrued to the Proteſtant intereſt (i) [A]. The parliament had ſent Commiſſioners to treat with the Marquis of Ormond, for the delivery up of Dublin, though without [A] Vaſt advantages accrued to the Proteſtant intereſt.] It ought not to be aſcribed to any defection from his loyalty, that Mr. Anneſley accepted of this commiſſion. In thoſe times of confuſion, a deſire of rendering ſervice to the Engliſh nation, and to the Proteſtants of Ireland, might well induce a man to do any thing within the bounds of his duty, to anſwer ſo laudable a purpoſe. How well, in ſo nice a conjuncture, he fulfilled all that could be expected from his fidelity to the parliament, and this without wounding in the leaſt his duty to his Majeſty, King Charles I. appears ſufficiently from the public hiſtories of thoſe times (1); but never ſo pathetically as in his own words, in a paper addreſſed to King Charles II. in anſwer to a complaint of the duke of Ormond's. Having taken notice, that the Duke had, in his paper, maliciouſly inſinuated, that they were of oppoſite parties in the Iriſh wars, he goes on thus: 'The Earl (for 'Mr. Anneſley was then Earl of Angleſey) was (under the authority his late Majeſty had entruſted both 'houſes of parliament with, for ordering and governing the affairs in Ireland, after the horrid rebellion 'began) inſtrumental there, to preſerve the Britiſh 'and Proteſtant intereſt, countries, and garriſons, 'from being ſwallowed up by Owen O'Neill's barbarous army; or falling into the bloody Iriſh 'hands. He alſo held correſpondence with, and 'offered aſſiſtance to the then Marquis of Ormond, 'to preſerve the Engliſh and ſave the city of Dublin, and other Engliſh garriſons and quarters, 'from the treacherous Iriſh, who broke all faith with 'the Marquis. He likewiſe ſent to the Marquis, 'the late King's Majeſty's poſitive prohibition in 'writing, againſt making any peace, or having at 'all further dealing with the Iriſh; and uſed his 'moſt earneſt perſuaſions herein, foreſeeing it would 'be deſtructive to the Engliſh, and miſchievous to 'the late King; and ſtill offered aſſiſtance to the 'Marquis, to encourage him in vigorouſly oppoſing 'the Iriſh, and to enable him to diſappoint their 'treachery, and the conſequence of their Faith-'breaking (2).' As to that letter of the King's, it was dated the 11th of June 1646, and was tranſmitted to the Lord Lieutenant, incloſed in a letter from Mr. Anneſley, General Monro, and Colonel Beale, dated the 22d of June. To this letter the Marquis of Ormond wrote the following anſwer, which ſhews how early a diſtaſte he had to Mr. Anneſley, and on what cauſes.

'WE do acknowledge the receipt of a letter from 'you, dated the 22d of June laſt, which 'came to us by the conveyance of Sir Theophilus 'Jones, Knt. not long after the date thereof; and 'in the ſaid letter, we found encloſed one ſigned by 'his Majeſty, bearing date the 11th of June; as 'alſo one directed to the Lord Folliott. To that 'ſigned by his Majeſty, our anſwer had been long 'ſince ſent; but that as well by your ſeveral letters '(wherein you declare in effect, that no diſpatch 'from us ſhall be permitted to paſs by you to his 'Majeſty, unleſs you be made acquainted therewith) 'as by other printed papers, and ſeveral concurring 'circumſtances, we find ſo little hope of receiving 'his Majeſty's free pleaſure, touching his affairs 'and ſervants here, that we have great cauſe to fear, 'even the ſafety of any meſſengers of truſt we ſhould 'ſend. But as ſoon as it ſhall pleaſe God to afford 'us clear and uninterrupted ways of addreſs to his 'Majeſty, we hope to give him fitting accounts of 'all his commands, directed to us his Lieutenants, 'which title (by the way we hold fit to obſerve unto 'you) his Majeſty is pleaſed to give us, though you 'in the ſeveral letters directed by you unto us, are 'not pleaſed ſo to ſtyle us. The letter to the Lord 'Folliot was delivered to him unbroken open, as we 'believe without ſucceſs. But the ſtate of affairs rendering it neceſſary to renew their correſpondence with him, they made choice of a ſecond Committee, conſiſting of men, who in their judgment were more agreeable to him, and at the head of this Commiſſion Mr. Anneſley was placed (k). Theſe Commiſſioners landed at Dublin on the 7th of June 1647, and were ſo ſucceſsful in their negociations, that in a few days a treaty was concluded between them and the Lord-Lieutenant: it was ſigned on the 19th of that month, and very ſoon after, Dublin was put into the hands of the parliament. This was certainly a very ſignal ſervice, not only to thoſe who employed him, but to the whole Proteſtant intereſt in Ireland, which was then on the very point of being extinguiſhed. However, after the Commiſſioners aſſumed the ſupreme power, he was not able to hinder them from doing many things againſt his judgment; and, therefore, ought not to be blamed for thoſe irregularities, which were ſuch as the times ſeemed to require, though they could not excuſe (l) [B]. Mr. Anneſley, not liking his ſituation, returned

[B] As the times ſeemed to require, though they could not excuſe.] Mr. Thomas Carte, in his life of the Duke of Ormond, tells us, that by this treaty the Proteſtants were to be ſecured in their eſtates; all who had paid contribution to be protected in their perſons and fortunes, all who had a mind to go with the Marquis out of Ireland, to have paſſes; and the Popiſh recuſants who had not adhered to the rebels, to be encouraged to continue in their habitations, and in enjoyment of their eſtates, in confidence of the favour of the parliament, according as they ſhould demean themſelves in the preſent ſervice. It was likewiſe ſtipulated, that the Marquis ſhould receive the ſum of 13877 l. 13 s. 4 d. which he had borrowed for the uſe of the garriſon. Of this, 3000 l. was to be paid down, and bills of exchange were to be given him for the reſt, drawn on ſufficient men in France or Holland: one moiety at fifteen days after ſight, and the other at ſix months. But the Hiſtorian ſays, the commiſſioners were not ſo exact in this reſpect as they ought to have been. 3000 l. in money was not brought, and the Marquis was forced to leave his Lady in Dublin to receive it, and diſcharge the debts to which they were aſſigned. Bills were indeed brought for the reſt, but not accepted; and he was forced to ſend Theodore Schout and Peter Wybrants, two Dublin Merchants, to Holland, to ſee the firſt accepted and paid. The commiſſioners indeed paſſed their words, that he ſhould be no ſufferer for want of acceptance of the bills, and that he might depend upon the honour and faith of the parliament. He acquieſced with a ſeeming readineſs in theſe aſſurances, but found by experience, that bodies of men are not the moſt religious obſervers of their word. The bill for the firſt half was indeed paid; but the treaſurers of Goldſmiths hall, who had drawn the ſecond on their correſpondent in Holland, had, before it was preſented, taken care by letters of advice, to forbid the acceptance of it; ſo that it was returned proteſted. In vain were the parliament, and the committee of Derby-houſe ſolicited by the Marquis himſelf, during near ſix months ſtay that he made in England, and by Sir George Lane and others afterwards. They paid only ſome part of it at laſt to Mr. Maule, a friend of Sir John Clotworthy's, and others of his creditors, who had an intereſt in them, without his conſent; but after all that they did in this reſpect out of regard to others, 1515 l. ſtill remained, and was never paid in any manner. The Marquis of Ormond had put off the delivery of the Regalia till July 28, in hopes of getting time to receive from England a permiſſion to carry men into foreign ſervice, and to take meaſures for their levies and tranſportation. The commiſſioners did not care he ſhould continue there ſo long; and to make his ſtay uneaſy, they, on July 14, placed guards on Lord Taaffe, Col. John Barry, and Miles Power, and iſſued orders for apprehending Sir Edmond Verney, the Colonels George Vane, Edward Hammond, and others. When the Marquis complained of this breach of the articles, they did not offer to aſſign a reaſon for their proceeding, but told him, they were competent judges, and would allow no body elſe to judge of their actions. On the 16th, they gave him notice to remove with his family from the caſtle, and deliver the Regalia within four days. He found that they were uneaſy whilſt the caſtle continued in his poſſeſſion, and was guarded by his own ſoldiers, purſuant to the ſtipulation in that behalf; and therefore, as his removal at that time was inconvenient, he accommodated the buſineſs with them, by conſenting to leave immediately the ſecuring of the caſtle to them, and deferring the ceremonial part of quitting the ſword till the ſet time (4). We have an account ſomewhat different from this, in the paper referred to in the former note, which it will be likewiſe neceſſary for the reader to ſee, as it contains abundance of curious particulars, and relates ſtrictly to the perſonal hiſtory of this illuſtrious nobleman: After

‘ ful and treacherous breach of it, with deſign and ‘ endeavour to ſurprize the Marquis, and all the
‘ ſo handled their buſineſs, as to get the commiſ‘ ſioners of parliament to be rejected and ſent away
‘ by the Marquis; he the ſaid Earl, (then Mr.
‘ Anneſley) upon a ſecond invitation of the Marquis
‘ to the parliament, (upon the Iriſh rebels con‘ tinued breaches and treacheries) went again for ‘ Ireland, after he had uſed all his intereſt to per‘ ſuade them to ſend again, though they were very ‘ unwilling; and it was much oppoſed by reaſon
‘ of the former unexpected diſappointment; and ‘ was the chief employed in commiſſion from the ‘ parliament, with an army of horſe and foot, fur-‘ niſhed with all things neceſſary to deliver the ‘ Marquis and Engliſh from the Iriſh treacheries and ‘ deſigns, and to receive the city of Dublin, and ‘ other garriſons, into the parliament's cuſtody,
‘ who were truſted, and able to preſerve the ſame
‘ for the Crown, if we could agree upon articles
‘ for that purpoſe, which, by the bleſſing of God,
‘ the Earl did to the Marquis, and the late Lord ‘ Chancellor, Euſtace, (whom the Marquis chiefly ‘ truſted therein) their great ſatisfaction, as well as ‘ his own, and the Engliſh and Proteſtants. And ‘ after he and the reſt of the commiſſioners had re‘ ceived the city of Dublin, and other garriſons, ‘ and conveyed the Marquis, with the honour due to ‘ his quality, to the ſea-ſide, to take ſhipping for ‘ England, as the articles gave leave; and had ‘ ſpent ſome time to lay the foundations, which after ‘ happily ſucceeded, for the total reduction of the ‘ Iriſh, and breaking their curſed confederacy, and ‘ powerful treachery, and final ſubduing them to ‘ the crown of England, with the forfeiture of all ‘ their eſtates, for the ſatisfaction of adventurers and ‘ ſoldiers, and the vaſt increaſe of the revenue of the ‘ crown; the Earl returned for England, as he had ‘ leave to do, before he went. Where by his inte-

returned ſpeedily home, where he found all things in confuſion, the government being on the very point of diſſolution, which however did not diſcourage him from doing all that lay in his power to ſerve his country; and though he did this without effect (m), yet ſure it is very unjuſt to charge him with it as an offence, as Wood does, who repreſents him as an abſolute time-ſerver (n), though he was one of the ſecluded members, and as eminent for oppoſing the illegal things done after the murder of the King, as any man in the nation, who had not born arms in his ſervice. After the death of Cromwell, when the Rump reſumed their old power, Mr. Anneſley, though he doubted whether the parliament was not diſſolved by the death of the King, reſolved to get into the Houſe if it were poſſible; in which good deſign he got ſeveral worthy gentlemen to concur with him, but with little ſucceſs, though the ſcheme was managed with great wiſdom and ſpirit, ſuch as ſufficiently declared what his real ſentiments were, and how much he had the reſettling the conſtitution at heart (o). In the confuſions which followed, he had little or no ſhare, as being too well known to be truſted either by the Rump or the army; and beſides, he was ſhrewdly ſuſpected of knowing at leaſt of Sir George Booth's inſurrection, if not of being concerned in it. But when things began to take a better turn, by the reſtoring of the ſecluded members to their ſeats, February 21, 1660, Mr. Anneſley began again to make a figure, and to appear in his old character, that of a true patriot (p). In this he appeared with ſuch luſtre, that he was choſen Preſident of the new Council of State, having at that time a correſpondence with his Majeſty, King Charles II., then in exile; which coſt him the life of his dear brother, who was drowned ſtepping into a packet-boat with letters for his Majeſty (q) [C]. Soon after the Reſtoration, viz. on the twentieth of April 1661, he was raiſed to the dignity of a Baron of England, by the title of Lord Anneſley of Newport Pagnel, in the county of Bucks; as alſo of an Earl by the ſtyle of * * * * * * * which ſome little time afterwards was changed for that of Angleſey (r). In the preamble of the patent, notice is expreſsly taken of the ſignal ſervices rendered by him in the King's Reſtoration (s): nay, ſome tell us, that his Lordſhip might then have been Prime-Miniſter, if he had not declined it (t) to avoid envy. However, he had always a conſiderable ſhare in the King's favour; and was heard with great attention at Council, and in the Houſe of Lords. He certainly ſhewed his extreme deteſtation of the King's murder, by his ſitting in judgment on the Regicides at Hicks's-Hall, and the Old-Bailey, though the Oxford

[C] With letters for his Majeſty.] It cannot be ſuppoſed, that theſe diſpatches were of ordinary importance, which were committed to the care of young Mr. Anneſley; and beſides, whoever conſiders the cautiouſneſs of Monk, and the little weight that declared royaliſts had at the time of the diſſolution of the Rump, muſt be perſuaded that ſuch as were then entruſted with the executive part of the government, muſt have had a conſiderable, if not the largeſt, ſhare in compleating that work. However, let us hear what Mr. Wood ſays. After taking notice of Mr. Anneſley's going to Ireland, he proceeds thus. 'He returned into England, complied 'with the parliament, Oliver Cromwell, and his 'party, took the oath called the Engagement, as 'before he had the Covenant: but when he ſaw 'that King Charles II. would be reſtored to his 'kingdoms, he then, when he perceived it could 'not be hindered, ſtruck in, and became inſtru-'mental in the recalling of him home, as many of 'his perſuaſion did, and thereupon they ſoothed 'themſelves up, and gave it out publickly, that 'they were as inſtrumental in that matter, as the 'beſt of the royal party; nay, they ſtuck not to ſay, 'that if it was not by their endeavours, his Majeſty 'would not have been reſtored. At that time, he 'was made a Privy Councellor, and to ſhew his 'zeal for his Majeſty's cauſe, he procured himſelf 'to be put in among the number of thoſe Juſtices, 'or Judges, to ſit firſt at Hicks's Hall, and after-'wards at the Old Baily, on the Regicides, where 'one of them, named Adrian Scrope, did reflect 'upon him, as it was by all there preſent ſuppoſed, 'and on others too, as having before been miſled, 'as well as himſelf (6).' The falſhood of almoſt every fact advanced in this charge, might be demonſtrated from the moſt authentic pieces publiſhed at that very time, ſuch as the pamphlet entitled, England's Confuſion: Or, a true and impartial Relation of the late Traverſes of State in England, written by one of the few Engliſhmen that are left in England: in which, among other things, there is a very warm letter to William Lenthall, Speaker to the Rump, from Mr. Anneſley, expoſtulating with him, on account of his being excluded the Houſe, for not taking the Engagement (7), which Wood affirms he had taken. Clement Walker, in his four parts of the Hiſtory of Independency, gives a large account of Mr. Anneſley's active endeavours againſt the uſurped powers, when they were in the zenith of their authority. His very ſitting in judgment on the Regicides, which Mr. Wood ſo baſely miſrepreſents, was an act of the greateſt loyalty. He foreſaw, that ſome of thoſe unhappy men would plead the authority of parliament, to juſtify that execrable action; and indeed, General Harriſon did ſo, upon which Mr. Anneſley roſe up, and in an excellent ſpeech, ſhewed all who were preſent, the vanity of that pretence; explained the nature of the quarrel between King and Parliament at the beginning, and the difference between ſubjects ſtruggling for their juſt liberties, and wickedly depoſing, or murdering their lawful Prince, which he proved no parliament could ſanctify; and alſo that, in the preſent caſe, this infamous action was not abetted by an eighth part of the Houſe of Commons, the Houſe of Lords being ejected, ſo that the odium of it could not, with any colour of reaſon, be thrown on that Parliament which began the war (8). The Earl of Clarendon, in his hiſtory, hath done right to this noble perſon, as far as his knowledge extended. But, perhaps, the reader will be beſt ſatisfied with what the Earl of Angleſey himſelf ſaid, of his tranſactions in thoſe times, in the memorial to King Charles II., which has been more than once mentioned. He therein affirms, the part he acted was, 'To preſerve the Church in its 'legal eſtabliſhment to the laſt, to defend the King 'and the Laws againſt Uſurpation and arbitrary 'Government, to adventure his Eſtate and Life, to 'ſave his from execrable Murder, and never to ſit 'ſtill, till he and his friends, His late Majeſty's, 'and Your faithful ſubjects, had compaſſed your 'Majeſty's happy Reſtauration, with the apparent 'and imminent Hazard of their Lives; whereof 'the ſaid Duke, i. e. Ormond, had vaſt Benefits 'without Danger (9).'

hiſtorian reflects upon this, inſinuating that he had been as deep in thoſe matters as the perſons then tried, which is a palpable falſity (u). Many reflections of this ſort he bore in his life-time with great conſtancy, or rather indifference, being deſirous of diſcharging his duty to his King and country without hurting others, and without being ſolicitous of making great advantages to himſelf; yet as he ſerved a generous maſter, he received from him offices both of profit and truſt. In 1667 he was made Treaſurer of the Navy; and on the fourth of February 1671-2, his Majeſty in Council was pleaſed to appoint the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Angleſey, the Lord Holles, the Lord Aſhley, and Mr. Secretary Trevor, or any three of them, to be a Committee, to peruſe and reviſe all the papers and writings concerning the ſettlement of Ireland, from the firſt to the laſt, and to make an abſtract of the ſtate thereof in writing (w). And accordingly, on the twelfth of June 1672, they made their report at large, which was the foundation of a commiſſion, dated the firſt of Auguſt 1672, to Prince Rupert, the Dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale, Earl of Angleſey, Lords Aſhley and Holles, Sir John Trevor, and Sir Thomas Chichley, to inſpect the ſettlement of Ireland, and all proceedings in order thereunto. And this was followed by another commiſſion of the ſeventeenth of January 1672-73, to Prince Rupert, &c. whereunto the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Shaftſbury, and the Lord Treaſurer Clifford, were added to inſpect the affairs of Ireland, viz. the acts of ſettlement and explanation, and the execution of them, and the diſpoſing of forfeited lands, and the ſtate of his Majeſty's revenue, &c. After which, by reaſon of his ſingular prudence and fidelity, the Earl of Angleſey had the great office of Lord-Privy-Seal conferred on him, the twenty-ſecond of April 1673 (x), and all this, notwithſtanding a great variety of attempts made to prejudice him, as well in the King's, as in the public opinion; all which he not only effectually defeated by clearly expoſing them, and manifeſting his own innocence, but alſo turned them to his advantage, ſo as to riſe more by the intrigues of his enemies, than by any art of his own (y). The long experience his Lordſhip had of men and things, rendered him ſo true a judge of merit, that he could diſcover it in men of all perſuaſions, and his freedom from prejudice was ſuch, that he could hate it in none, how different ſoever from himſelf they might be in religious or political opinions (z). This noble diſpoſition rendered him liable to a formidable attack, during the time of the Popiſh plot; when to have behaved with decency towards the Roman Catholicks of any rank, was ſufficient to ſtigmatize the ſincereſt Proteſtant, with the dangerous character of being a favourer of Papiſts. One Dangerfield, whoſe name will be tranſmitted to late poſterity, as a diſcoverer of plots, true and falſe, on the twentieth of October 1680, charged his Lordſhip, in an information delivered upon oath, at the Bar of the Houſe of Commons, with endeavouring to ſtifle evidence, with relation to the Popiſh plot, and to promote the belief of a Preſbyterian one, with many other things alike probable, or rather alike improbable, yet ſo far credited at that time as to receive countenance from the Houſe (a). The trouble he received from this baſe attack, did not hinder him from ſpeaking his opinion freely of thoſe matters in the Houſe of Lords, particularly in relation to the Iriſh plot, of which he declared his abſolute diſbelief, when few durſt own they ſuſpected it (b), notwithſtanding the apparent marks of impoſture in the accounts given of it [D]. His charity for men of all religions did not, however, abate either his zeal for the Proteſtant cauſe, or his affection for the true intereſt of his country. The Earl of Caſtlehaven

[D] Marks of impoſture in the accounts given of it.] The Houſe of Commons voted nem. con. that there was an Iriſh plot, and in the Houſe of Peers, the Earl of Angleſey, was the ſingle Lord who diſſented from a vote to the ſame purpoſe. His ſenſe of things at that time expoſed this noble Lord to great inconveniences: for the Houſe of Commons ordered Dangerfield's information of the 20th of October 1680, to be printed, wherein the Earl was charged with encouraging Dugdale to recant what he had ſworn, and promiſing to harbour him in his houſe, and that his Lordſhip's Prieſt ſhould accompany and watch him (10). If this was true, then the Earl of Angleſey was a Papiſt, which is not over credible, for many reaſons; and amongſt others, for this, that the very witneſs he is here ſworn to have tampered with, had before ſworn in his narrative, concerning the Popiſh plot, that if the deſigns of the Papiſts had ſucceeded, Sir William Gage was to have been Lord Privy-Seal (11). So that we muſt ſuppoſe, not only that the Earl of Angleſey conſpired againſt the King and the Conſtitution, but alſo againſt himſelf; and that while he, as a Papiſt, was doing all this for the Papiſts, they were contriving to give his poſt to another, who could do nothing for them at all. But this was not all; for the zealous Earl of Eſſex charged him in the Houſe of Lords, with being prayed for by name, in the maſs-houſes in Ireland; to which the Earl of Angleſey anſwered, that he believed it was not ſo; but if the Jews in their Synagogues, or the Turks in their Moſques, would pray for him unaſked, he ſhould be glad to be the better for their devotion (12). This ſpleen againſt the Earl roſe at laſt ſo high, that Sir William Jones, when he was propoſing to the Houſe of Commons attacking ſeveral of the King's Miniſters, was pleaſed to glance at Angleſey, in theſe words: 'There is another in 'the council, a Nobleman too, among the King's 'Miniſters, and a Lawyer, but if we cannot reach 'him do not impeach him (13).' Theſe were ſtrange times to live in, when the then Earl of Halifax, who always oppoſed Popiſh councils, was judged an enemy to his country for promoting them; and the Earl of Radnor was thought to decline in his zeal for the Proteſtant religion, merely becauſe he could not ſwallow all the abſurdities which were grafted on the Popiſh plot (14). It was, however, particularly hard on the Earl of Angleſey, to be ſuſpected as a favourer of Popery, ſince he was before in diſgrace with the warm church-men, on ſuſpicion of his favouring the Nonconformiſts. Beſides, in all his conduct both before and after the Reſtoration, he manifeſted a high diſlike of the Papiſts, as a party, though he was very kind and civil to ſuch as he judged worthy men amongſt them; nor did he alter his conduct, even after all this clamour, but perſiſted in his old opinion, that there might be

Caſtlehaven thought fit, in the year 1680, to write his Memoirs, in which he took a great deal of pains, to repreſent the general rebellion in Ireland, in the lighteſt colours poſſible, and as if it had been far from univerſal at firſt; and that it was made ſo, at leaſt as much by the meaſures purſued by ſuch as ought to have ſuppreſſed them, as by any ill intention of the Catholicks concerned in it (c). The Earl of Angleſey having received theſe Memoirs from their author, thought fit to write ſome animadverſions upon them, which he did in a letter to the Earl of Caſtlehaven, wherein he takes notice of abundance of remarkable paſſages in thoſe diſtracted times; and, as his ſubject led him, delivered his opinion freely in reſpect to the Duke of Ormond, and his management of affairs in that kingdom (d). This letter to the Earl of Caſtlehaven was written in Auguſt 1680, but was not publiſhed till 1681. The Duke of Ormond, about a year afterwards, expoſtulated with the Lord Privy-Seal, on this ſubject, by letter, to which the Earl replied; and there the matter reſted, as the reader will be informed in the notes [E]. In 1682, when the nation was in a high ferment, the Earl drew up a very particular remonſtrance, dated April the twenty-ſeventh, the ſame year, and preſented good men among the Papiſts, though in that reſpect they were not good Papiſts; and this he labours hard to prove, in that book which goes under the title of his Memoirs. Sir P. Pett informs us, that the Earl, when Mr. Anneſley diſobliged the Popiſh party exceſſively, by the pains he took to defeat their ſchemes, and to ſecure the perſon of General Lambert, one of the King's Judges, and who oppoſed to the laſt, the return of King Charles II., and yet was at the bottom a jeſuited Papiſt, of which one circumſtance appeared: for being condemned to perpetual impriſonment, a little before the Popiſh plot broke out, an application was made to the King for procuring his diſcharge, and an eminent Popiſh Peer offered to be ſecurity for his peaceable behaviour (15). However this matter might be, certainly, if the whole tenor of a man's life and conduct could prove any thing, it ought to be believed, that the Earl of Angleſey was any thing rather than a Papiſt. The truth ſeems to be, that he was a man of ſo much moderation, as to be in the good graces of no party, though in the time of their diſtreſs, he was tender towards the ſufferers of all parties.

[E] As the reader will be informed in the notes.] As theſe letters are very curious, and yet are not to be met with in the large account of the diſpute between theſe two noble perſons; the reader will be doubtleſs well pleaſed to meet with them here. That from the Duke to the Earl of Angleſey, was dated from Dublin, November 12, 1681, and ran thus:

My Lord,

'IT is now, I think, more than a year, ſince I 'firſt ſaw a little book, written by way of letter, 'called Obſervations and Reflections on my Lord 'of Caſtlehaven's Memoirs: wherein, though there 'are ſome things that might lead the reader to be- 'lieve that your Lordſhip was the author, yet there 'were many more I thought impoſſible ſhould come 'from you; for it affirms many matters of fact 'poſitively, which are eaſily and authentically to 'be diſproved; and from thoſe matters of fact, 'groſsly miſtaken, it deduces conſequences, raiſes 'inferences, and ſcatters glances, injurious to the 'memory of the dead, and the honour of ſome 'living. Among thoſe that, by the bleſſing of 'God, are yet living, I find myſelf worſt treated. 'Twenty years after the King's Reſtoration, and 'forty after the beginning of the Iriſh Rebellion, as 'if it had been all that while reſerved for me, and 'for ſuch times as theſe we are fallen into, when 'calumny (though the matter of it be never ſo 'groundleſs and improbable) meets with credulity; 'and when liberty is taken to aſperſe men, and re- 'preſent them to the world, under the monſtrous 'and odious figures of Papiſts, or popiſhly affected; 'not becauſe they are ſo thought, by thoſe that 'employ the repreſenters, but becauſe they are 'known to be too good Proteſtants, and too loyal 'ſubjects, to join in the deſtruction of the Crown 'and Church: beſides, the treatiſe came forth, and 'muſt have been written, when I had but newly 'received repeated aſſurances of the continuance of 'your friendſhip to me; wherein, as in one of your 'letters you are pleaſed to ſay, you had never made 'a falſe ſtep; for theſe reaſons, I was not willing 'to believe that book to be of your Lordſhip's com- 'poſing, and hoped ſome of the ſuborned libellers 'of the age, had endeavoured to imitate your Lord- 'ſhip, and not you them: But I was, in a while 'after, firſt by my ſon Arran, and afterwards by 'the bearer, Sir Robert Reading, aſſured your 'Lordſhip had owned to them, that the piece was 'your's, but profeſſed the publication to be with- 'out your order; and that you did not intend to 'do, or think that you had done, me any injury, 'or prejudice: if your Lordſhip really thought ſo, 'the publication might have been owned, as well 'as what was publiſhed; but then let the world 'judge, whether pen, ink, and paper, are not dan- 'gerous tools in your hands? When I was thus 'aſſured your Lordſhip was the author, it coſt me 'ſome thoughts how to vindicate truth, my maſter 'the late King, myſelf, my actions, and family, 'all reflected on, and traduced by that pamphlet: 'I found myſelf engaged in the ſervice of our pre- 'ſent King, and that in a time of difficulty and 'danger, and in ſuch times, for the moſt part, it 'has been my lot to be employed in public affairs; 'and though I had not been ſo taken up, yet I well 'knew that writing upon ſuch occaſions is no more 'my talent, than it is my delight; and, to ſay 'truth, my indiſpoſition to the exerciſe, might 'help to perſwade me, that the book, though ho- 'noured with your Lordſhip's name, would, after 'it had performed its office in coffee-houſes, and 'ſerved your Lordſhip's deſign in that conjuncture, 'expire, as writings of that nature and force uſually 'do: and herein I reſted without troubling myſelf, 'or any body elſe, with animadverſions on your 'Lordſhip's miſtakes, which are ſo many, and ſo 'obvious, that I wonder how you could fall into 'them. I will add to this, that I have been in 'expectation, that by this time your Compleat Hi- 'ſtory would have come forth; wherein, if I may 'judge by the pattern, I have juſt cauſe to ſuſpect, 'that neither the ſubject, or myſelf, will be more 'juſtly dealt with, than in that occaſional eſſay; and 'I would have been glad to have ſeen all my work 'before me, in caſe I ſhould think fit to make a 'work of it. The delay of your publiſhing that 'hiſtory, and the conſideration of your Lordſhip's 'age and mine, are the occaſions of this letter; 'whereby I inform you, that as no man now alive 'is better able than I am to give an account of the 'principal tranſactions during the Rebellion in Ire- 'land; ſo no man is poſſeſſed of more authentic 'commiſſions, inſtruments, and papers, all which, 'or tranſcripts of them, you might have command- 'ed before you ſet forth your reflections. But, poſ- 'ſibly, to have ſtayed for them, might have loſt you 'a ſeaſonable opportunity of publiſhing your ab- 'horrence of the Iriſh Rebellion, and your zeal 'againſt Popery: what your Lordſhip might then 'have had, you may yet have, becauſe I had rather 'help to prevent than detect errors; but then I 'muſt firſt know to what particular part of your 'hiſtory you deſire information, and how you de- 'liver thoſe parts to the world and to poſterity. If 'after this offer, your Lordſhip ſhall proceed to the 'concluſion and publication of your hiſtory, and not sented it to his Majesty. It was very warm and very loyal; and yet it was far from being well received, for reasons of which the reader will be able to judge, from the extracts

' accept of it, I must, beforehand, appeal from you ' as from an incompetent judge of my actions, and ' a partially engaged and unfaithful historian.

ORMOND.'

The Earl of Anglesey's answer was as follows:

My Lord,

' YOUR Grace's of the 12th of November, I received towards the end of that month, and was ' not a little surprised, after being threatened above ' a year with your Grace's answers to the Observations and Reflections on my Lord Castlehaven's ' Memoirs, which your Grace takes notice you had ' seen above a year before, to find them only most ' satyrically burlesqued, and my intentions in the ' writing of them most unnaturally misinterpreted ' and misjudged, without giving instance of any one ' particular, which could so much transport your ' Grace, or interest you to judge of a letter of mine ' to another with so invective heat and mistake. ' Your Grace's letter therefore, consisting only of ' generals, I can no otherwise adapt my answer, ' (after a most serious revision of my book upon this ' occasion) but by giving the reverse of your Grace's ' strained and erroneous affirmatives, by my plain ' and true negatives; till your Grace shall administer occasion, by communicating the particular ' animadversions, your Grace hath been so long (as ' I hear) about. The reasons leading your Grace to ' believe it impossible I could be the author of that ' discourse, I cannot admit, though they import a ' fair opinion of me; and that in the beginning of ' your letter, your Grace had better thoughts than ' when your hand was in and heated. I do therefore ' absolutely deny, that I affirm any matter of fact ' positively in that book which are easily or authentically (or at all) to be disproved. Or that, from ' those matters of fact, grosly mistaken, it deduces ' consequences, raises inferences, and scatters glances ' injurious to the memory of the dead, and the honour of some living; among which, your Grace finds ' yourself worst treated. This being so, your Grace's ' unjust inferences from the time of its writing, ' and the misjudging the design of the author, ' give no countenance or occasion to your Grace's ' rhetorical character of the times, though I join in ' all, but the opinion your Grace seems to have ' taken up, that there is a plot (other than that of ' the Papists) to destroy the Crown and Church; a ' discovery worthy the making, if your Grace knows ' and believes what you write; but how I am concerned to have it mentioned to me, I know not, ' your Grace can best tell what you intend to insinuate thereby. These are your Grace's reasons, ' why you were not willing to believe that book of ' my composing; yet you cannot leave me without ' a sting in your expressing the hopes which succeeded them, viz. That some of the suborned libellers ' of the age had endeavoured to imitate me, and ' not I them. Whether I should imitate suborned ' libellers, or they me, would be all one for my reputation; because I were grosly criminal in the ' first, and must have been so before in your Grace's ' opinion, or they could not imitate me in the second: ' your Grace will want instances in both, except ' this of your own making; and therefore, there ' must be some other reason why your Grace did ' not believe (if really you did not) that discourse ' to be of my composure. But this admitted for ' truth, (as it is undoubtedly) your Grace, in the ' next place, calls the world to judge, whether pen, ' ink, and paper, are not dangerous tools in my ' hands. I remember the times, when they were ' serviceable to the King's Restoration, and constant service of the crown, or craved in aid by ' your Grace, that you did not account them so: ' and it is much to my safety, that they are not so ' in your Grace's hands, though I find them as sharp ' there as in any man's alive. Your Grace being at ' length assured I was the author, your next care ' was to spend some thoughts to vindicate truth, the ' late King, yourself, your actions, and family, all ' reflected upon and traduced (as your Grace is pleased ' to fancy) by that pamphlet. But your Grace had ' no cause to trouble your thoughts with such vindications, unless you could shew, where in that ' book they are reflected upon and traduced, no ' such thing occurring to me (upon the strictest revisal), nor ever shall be objected to me with justice ' and truth. After your Grace hath brought it to ' the Coffee-Houses (where I believe it never was, ' till your Grace preferred it to that office), and ' where you have doomed it to expire, as writings ' of that nature and force use (you say) to do, (for ' which I shall not be at all concerned) you rested, ' without troubling yourself or any body else with ' animadversions upon my mistakes, which your ' Grace is pleased to say, are so many and so obvious ' (though you name none, nor do they occur to ' others) that you wonder how I could fall into them. ' If your Grace believes yourself in this, you seem ' to have forgot the long time you spent in considering and animadverting upon that despicable ' pamphlet, with your labours whereon I was ' threatened by some of your Grace's relations, for ' many months; and your Grace hath redeemed the ' delay, by the virulent general reflections you have ' now sent me, which yet I doubt not will evaporate or shrink to nothing, when your Grace shall ' seek for instances to back them, whereof if you ' can find any, I claim in justice they may be sent ' me. Your Grace adds, that you have been in expectation, that by this time my complete History would have come forth, wherein (if you may ' judge by the pattern) your Grace saith, you have ' just cause to suspect, that neither the subject, nor ' yourself, will be more justly dealt with than in ' that occasional Essay; and therefore, offer me all ' the helps of authentic commissions, transactions, ' and papers, your Grace is possessed of, whereof ' you inform me none hath more. This is an anticipating jealousy, which no man living can have ' ground for, and when my history shall be compleated (which is now delayed for those assistances ' your Grace is so well able, and so freely offers to ' afford me), though my weakness may be exposed, ' my integrity and impartiality shall appear, and ' your unjust suspicion will, I doubt not, cease, if truth ' may be welcome to you, and not accounted one ' of the dangerous instruments in my hand; by which ' having incurred your anger and enmity in the first ' Essay, I have slender hopes to be more acceptable ' in the second; though I resolve to hold to the ' first approved law of a good and faithful historian, ' which is, that he should not dare to say any thing ' that is false; and that he dare not but say any ' thing that is true; that there be not so much as ' suspicion of favour or hatred in his writing. And ' this might give a supersedeas to your Grace's unreasonable appeal before a Gravamen, though I never intended, by relating the truth of things past, ' to become a judge of your Grace's or any other ' man's actions, but barely Res gestas narrare, for ' the information, correction, and instruction of this ' age and posterity. Your Grace desiring to know, ' to what particular parts of my history I would have ' information, I shall at present only mention these. ' The intrigues of the cessation and commissions for ' them, and the two peaces of 1646 and 1648, ' forced upon the King by the rebellious Irish. The ' grounds and transactions about depriving Sir William Parsons from being one of the Lords Justices, ' and then dismissing him; Sir Adam Loftus, Vice-Treasurer; Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls; ' Sir Robert Meredith, Chancellor of the Exchequer, ' &c. from the council table. The mystery of Glamorgan's peace and his punishment, the several ' ungrateful expulsions of your Grace, by the confederate Roman Catholics. The passages concerning the parliament's present of a jewel to your ' Grace. The battles, reliefs, sieges, and chief encounters, in your Grace's time. The proceedings ' between your Grace and the Roman Catholic Assembly of the clergy in 1666, with the commission for their sitting. The plot for surprising the ' castle of Dublin, in which Warren and others extracts we have made out of that piece (e) [F]. It was not, however, thought proper to remove him from his high office on this account; and, therefore, in the month of June 1682, the Duke of Ormond, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, was prevailed upon to exhibit a charge againſt the Lord Privy-Seal, on account of his reflections on the Earl of Caſtlehaven's Memoirs. This produced a ſharp diſpute between thoſe two Peers, which ended in the Earl of Angleſey's loſing his place of Lord Privy-Seal, though it certainly raiſed his reputation; his very enemies being forced to confeſs, that he was both hardly and unjuſtly treated (f) [G]. After this misfortune, which happened in Auguſt 1682, his Lordſhip remained pretty much at his country-ſeat at Blechingdon, in Oxfordſhire, where he devoted his time to his ſtudies, and meddled very little with

' were concerned, with the examinations and what ' offenders were executed, &c. and any thing elſe ' your Grace judgeth of import, to have conveyed ' to poſterity. Other parts of the hiſtory ſhall be ' propoſed to your Grace in my progreſs, and be- ' fore I put my laſt hand to it, with a reſolution, ' that though I may have been ſometimes miſtaken ' in judgment, yet as I never did promote the re- ' port of a matter of fact, which I knew to be falſe, ' ſo I never would. Which I am induced the rather ' to mention, becauſe your Grace ſaith, you had ' rather help to prevent than to detect errors (16).

[F] From the extracts we have made out of that piece.] This Memorial was entitled, The Account of Arthur Earl of Augleſey, Lord Privy-Seal to your moſt excellent Majeſty, of the true State of your Majeſty's Government and Kingdoms, April 27, 1682. In one part of this he ſays, The fatal cauſe of all our miſchiefs preſent, or apprehended, and which, if not by wiſdom antedated, may raiſe a fire, which may burn and conſume to the very foundations, is the unhappy perverſion of the duke of York (the next heir to the crown) in one point of religion; which naturally raiſes jealouſy of the power, deſigns, and practices of the old enemies of our religion and liberties, and undermines and emaſculates the courage and conſtancy, even of thoſe and their poſterity, who have been as faithful to, and ſuffered as much for, the crown, as any the moſt pleaſed, or contented in our impending miſeries can pretend to have done (17); and concludes in theſe words: Though your Majeſty is in your own perſon above the reach of law, and ſovereign of all your people, yet the law is your maſter and inſtructor how to govern; and your ſubjects aſſure themſelves, you will never attempt the enervating that Law by which you are King, and which you have not only by frequent declarations, but by a ſolemn oath upon your Throne, been obliged in a moſt glorious preſence of your people to the maintenance of; and that therefore you will look upon any that ſhall propoſe or adviſe to the contrary, as unfit perſons to be near you; and on thoſe who ſhall perſuade you it is lawful, as ſordid flatterers, and the worſt and moſt dangerous enemies you and your kingdoms have. What I ſet before your Majeſty, I have written freely, and like a ſworn faithful Counſellor; perhaps not like a wiſe man, with regard to myſelf, as they ſtand; but I have diſcharged my duty, and ſhall account it a reward, if your Majeſty vouchſafe to read, what I durſt not but write, and which I beſeech God to give a bleſſing to (18).

[G] That he was both hardly and unjuſtly treated.] The Earl of Angleſey himſelf cauſed a diſtinct narrative of the whole affair, relating to his diſpute with the Duke of Ormond, before the Privy-Council, and his being thereupon deprived of the Privy-Seal, to be printed for the ſatisfaction of the world. The ſum of the matter was this: On the 17th of June, 1682, James Duke of Ormond, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Lord Steward, repreſented to his Majeſty in Council, the injuries he ſuppoſed to be done him by the Lord Privy-Seal, in his book publiſhed againſt the Earl of Caſtlehaven's Memoirs. This repreſentation being read openly before the Council, then ſitting at Hampton-Court, his Majeſty declared, that he would hear the matter thereof in Council, and did order that a copy of the ſaid repreſentation ſhould be delivered to Angleſey, and that he appear and make anſwer thereunto, at a Council to be holden at Whitehall, on the 23d of the ſaid month. In obedience to this, Angleſey, though much troubled with the gout, appeared, made a ſhort ſpeech to his Majeſty, in vindication of himſelf, bandied the matter with Ormond, and then put in his anſwer to Ormond's repreſentation, or complaint againſt him. Theſe things being done, another Council was held July 13, at which time, Ormond delivering a paper to the board, containing ſeveral charges againſt him, it was then ordered, that a copy of it ſhould be ſent to Angleſey, and that he return an anſwer thereunto on the 20th of the ſaid month at Hampton-Court. But no Council being then held (notwithſtanding Angleſey had made anſwer to Ormond's particular charges againſt him the next day) the matter was deferred till the 27th of the ſaid month. Another Council being, therefore, held there the ſame day, the charges and anſwers were debated; which done, and the Lords concerned being withdrawn, this reſolution paſſed by the Council on Angleſey's letter to the Earl of Caſtlehaven, viz. That it was a ſcandalous libel againſt his late Majeſty, againſt his now Majeſty, and againſt the Government. When the parties, or Lords concerned were called in again, the Lord Chancellor only told Angleſey, that the King conceived him faulty in the clauſe, p. 32, of the ſaid letter to the Earl of Caſtlehaven, wherein the Committees of the parliament of Ireland were mentioned, as having been in the intrigues of the Popiſh faction at Court. After which a farther hearing was appointed, to be on the 3d of Auguſt following; but Angleſey continuing extremely ill of the gout, and finding himſelf prejudged by the reſolution of the Council, on the 27th of July, he wrote a letter, on the 2d of Auguſt, to his Majeſty; which being openly read in Council the next day, he did in ſome manner (as it was ſaid) reſent it, for ſome paſſages therein, yet nothing appeared inferred to be done thereupon. Afterwards the Earl of Caſtlehaven (James Touchet) was called in ſeveral times, and queſtioned about his Memoirs; which he acknowledging to be his, the ſaid book in concluſion, was by his Majeſty and Council judged to be a ſcandalous libel againſt the Government. On the 9th of the ſaid month of Auguſt 1682, the Privy-Seal, by command from his Majeſty, was taken away from Angleſey, by Sir Lionel Jenkins, Principal Secretary of State, without any farther hearing, and was given to George Marquis of Halifax (19). From theſe circumſtances, even Wood could collect that this noble Earl was hardly treated; yet he could not prevail upon himſelf to ſay as much, but ſets it down as a report, he was moved many thought unjuſtly. A more candid and much better informed writer, who as ſeldom allows his hero to be wrong as any man living, hath, nevertheleſs, upon this occaſion, ſwayed by the weight of evidence, told the ſtory fairly and plainly as we have given it. Lord Angleſey had for many years enjoyed the poſt of Lord Privy-Seal, a poſt much envied, and which the Earl of Halifax, Mr. Edward Seymour, (who was thought to ſtand faireſt for it) and others, thought very convenient for themſelves. The King did not care to remove an old ſervant without ſome pretence; ſo that when the duke of Ormond came over, the affair of the letter was revived, and a complaint was preſented againſt the author of it to the Council. The matter was there examined, ſo far as it affected the memory of the late King; for nothing perſonal to the Duke of Ormond ever came under their conſideration. As the expediency of the ceſſation in 1643, was the chief ſubject of the debate; and as that matter has been fully cleared up in this hiſtory, we have no occaſion to enter farther into the diſpute, which ended in what was probably reſolved before, the diſmiſſion of the Earl of Angleſey from the Council board, and removing him from the charge of the Privy-Seal (20).

public affairs: yet did he not entirely abandon buſineſs, much leſs diſcover any pique or diſreſpect towards the Royal Family, on account of what he had ſuffered; but behaved with ſo much temper and duty, that, without betraying or even diſſembling his principles, he recovered the favour of King James II.; ſo that it is generally believed he would very ſpeedily have been declared Lord Chancellor of England (g), if this had not been prevented by his death, which happened April the ſixth, 1686, at his houſe in Drury-Lane, without any long ſickneſs, by a quinſy, in the ſeventy third year of his age. He left behind him a numerous poſterity (h) [H]. It is not eaſy to ſay any thing worthy of ſo great a man's character, and yet ſomething is neceſſary to complete the deſign of this life, and to give the reader ſome idea of his mind, as well as his fortune. As he had an excellent and univerſal education, becoming the heir of a noble family, ſo he was always remarkably prone to learning, and to the encouragement of learned men. He was well read in the Claſſicks, and perfectly verſed, not only in the Greek and Roman hiſtory, but in the ſpirit and policy of theſe famous nations. His intercourſe, however, with foreign writers, did not hinder him from retaining a ſuperior paſſion for all the branches of learning, which had any reſpect to his own country. He had ſtudied the laws with ſuch diligence, as to be ſtyled and eſteemed a lawyer, even by the moſt conceited lawyers of his time (i). In hiſtory he was a very great critic, and with reſpect to records, and whatever elſe fell under the conſideration of a judicious antiquary, no man of his time deſerved greater reputation than he. He was, alſo, well verſed in the civil and canon law, underſtood Church hiſtory perfectly, and was a great Divine. His writings, which are extant, will fully ſupport all that has been hitherto ſaid; and the world would have had ſtill higher proofs of his Lordſhip's great learning and abilities, if the largeſt and moſt valuable of all his works had not been unluckily loſt, or, as ſome ſay, injuriouſly deſtroyed (k). However, as Anthony Wood, who never ſpeaks well of this nobleman, but againſt his will, allows that he had a ſmooth, ſharp, and keen pen, we preſume no body will doubt it (l) [I]. As to the aſperſions

[H] Leaving behind him a numerous poſterity.] His lordſhip married Elizabeth, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir James Altham, of Oxey in the county of Hertford, Knight, one of the Barons of the court of Exchequer, a Lady of exemplary prudence and piety, who died April 12, 1692; and by her he had ſeven ſons, and ſix daughters; of the ſons, four died young. James ſucceeded his father in his honours. Altham, was created Baron of Altham in the Kingdom of Ireland, by patent dated 14 Feb. 1680. Richard the third ſon ſucceeded to the title of Altham, by the demiſe of his brother without iſſue. For the daughters, Dorothy married Richard Power, Earl of Tir-oen in the kingdom of Ireland. Elizabeth became the wife of Alexander Macdonald, ſecond ſon to the Earl of Antrim in the kingdom of Ireland. Frances, the third daughter, was married to Francis Windham, Eſq; of Felbridge in the county of Norfolk, and afterwards to John Thompſon, Baron of Haverſham in the county of Bucks; Philippa, the fourth daughter, was firſt the wife of Charles Lord Mohun, and afterwards to Thomas Coward, Eſq; Serjeant at Law. Lady Anne, the fifth daughter, married Mr. Baker; and Lady Bridget died young (21).

[I] We preſume no body will doubt it.] The reader may judge himſelf of this, from the extracts we have given him. His Lordſhip publiſhed in his lifetime the following pieces: 1. The Truth unveiled, in behalf of the Church of England; being a Vindication of Mr. John Standiſh's Sermon, preached before the King, and publiſhed by his Majeſty's Command, London, 1676, 4*to*. To which is added, A ſhort Treatiſe on the ſubject of Tranſubſtantiation. 2. A Letter from a Perſon of Honour in the Country, written to the Earl of Caſtlehaven, being Obſervations and Reflections on his Lordſhip's Memoirs, concerning the Wars of Ireland, London, 1681, 8*vo*. 3. A true Account of the whole Proceedings between James Duke of Ormond, and Arthur Earl of Angleſey, before the King and his Council, &c. London, 1682, Folio. 4. A Letter of Remarks upon Jovian, London, 1683, 4*to*. Beſides theſe, he wrote many other things, ſome of which were publiſhed after his deceaſe; as, 5. The Privileges of the Houſe of Lords and Commons, argued and ſtated in two Conferences between both Houſes, April 19th and 22d, 1671. To which is added, A Diſcourſe, wherein the Rights of the Houſe of Lords are truly aſſerted. With learned Remarks on the ſeeming Arguments, and pretended Precedents, offered at that time againſt their Lordſhips: Written by the Right Honourable Arthur Earl of Angleſey, Lord Privy-Seal. Theſe conferences were principally managed by the Earl, and were concerning a bill for impoſitions on merchandiſe, &c. and a reſolution, the Commons in a conference communicated to the Lords, that there is a fundamental right in that houſe alone, in bills of rates and impoſitions on merchandiſe, as to the matter, the meaſure, and time. Whereupon the Lords in parliament, on full conſideration thereof and of the whole conference, came to this reſolution, nem. con. That the power exerciſed in the Houſe of Peers, in making the amendments and abatements in the bill entitled, An act for additional impoſition on ſeveral foreign commodities, and for encouragement of ſeveral commodities and manufactures of this kingdom, both as to matter, meaſure, and time, concerning the rates and impoſitions on merchandiſe, is a fundamental, inherent and undoubted right of the Houſe of Peers, from which they cannot depart. This reſolution produced another conference, which the Earl began, and in which he aſſerted the right of the Houſe of Lords, in learned remarks on the ſaid two conferences. (6) The King's right of indulgence in ſpiritual matters, with the equity thereof aſſerted. London 1688, 4*to*. This was publiſhed by Henry Care, the year before that in the title-page. (7) Memoirs, intermixt with moral, political, and hiſtorical obſervations by way of diſcourſe, in a letter to Sir Peter Pett, London 1693, 8*vo*. This was written in anſwer to a book we have often cited, entitled, The happy future State of England, penned by way of letter to the Earl of Angleſey by the ſaid Sir Peter Pett, who was Advocate-General of England, a very learned perſon and a great admirer of our noble author. [The title, Memoirs, ſays Mr. Walpole, has no kind of relation to the work, which is a ſort of rambling eſſay, attempting at once to defend a Popiſh King and the Proteſtant religion. The genuineneſs of theſe Memoirs was diſputed by his ſon-in-law Lord Haverſham *.] Beſides theſe, ſome very valuable pieces have been loſt, particularly, The hiſtory of the late Commotions and Troubles of Ireland, from the Rebellion in 1641, till the Reſtoration of the King in 1660, which contained all the treaties, negociations, ſieges, battles, and other memorable tranſactions during that time. His Lordſhip wrote alſo in his younger years, certain large and learned diſcourſes againſt the errors of Popery, which many of his friends would have perſuaded him to have publiſhed at the time of the Popiſh plot; but this, by the advice of Sir P. Pett, he declined. [His Lordſhip is ſuppoſed to have digeſted Whitlocke's Memoirs (22).]

thrown on his memory, by a reverend Prelate his contemporary, they would have deſerved a more particular conſideration, if it had been uſual for that writer to have given good characters of his acquaintance, or to have avoided characterizing ſuch as he had little or no acquaintance with. However, as this work ought not to contain either apologies or panegyricks, the words of that author (m) are ſet down in the notes, with only a few remarks, ſubmitted to the cenſure of the peruſer [K]. We will conclude our account of this noble perſon, with obſerving, that he was one of the firſt Engliſh Peers, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by collecting a fine library, which he performed with great care, as well as at a large expence; and as he was deſirous that ſo valuable a collection might not be quickly diſſipated, but remain in his family, he cauſed it to be diſpoſed in a manner ſuitable to its worth, in a particular apartment in Angleſey houſe (n). But theſe precautions proved fruitleſs, as his Lordſhip's good intentions likewiſe did; his books within a few months after his deceaſe being expoſed to public ſale by Mr. Millington, a famous auctioneer (o). Yet this ſale was attended with an accident, which will hinder its being ever forgotten. We mean the diſcovery of the Earl's famous Memorandum in the blank leaf of an Εικων Βασιλικη, or the pourtraiture of his ſacred Majeſty in his ſolitudes and ſufferings, in order to diſabuſe the world as to the true author of that book, who, according to that memorandum, was not King Charles I. but Biſhop Gauden, which produced a long controverſy managed by various hands, and in ſeveral books. To enter into a particular detail of ſo perplexed an affair, would take up too much room; but the reader will find the original memorandum, and ſome remarks upon it, which are not to be met with elſewhere, in the notes [L]. [K] Submitted to the cenſure of the peruſer.] The character referred to in the text, is to be found in the Biſhop of Saliſbury's hiſtory of his own times, where it runs thus: 'Another man very nearly of the ſame ſort, 'who paſſed through many great employments, was 'Anneſley advanced to be Earl of Angleſey; who had 'much more knowledge (than Shaftſbury) and was 'very learned, chiefly in the law. He had the fa-'culty of ſpeaking indefatigably upon every ſub-'ject; but he ſpoke ungracefully; and did not 'know that he was not good at raillery, for he was 'always attempting it. He underſtood our govern-'ment well, and had examined far into the origi-'nal of our conſtitution. He was capable of great 'application; and was a man of a grave deport-'ment; but ſtuck at nothing, and was aſhamed of 'nothing. He was neither loved nor truſted by any 'man on any ſide; and he ſeemed to have no re-'gard to common decencies; but ſold every thing 'that was in his power; and ſold himſelf ſo often, 'that at laſt the price fell ſo low that he grew uſe-'leſs.'—His Lordſhip afterwards adds, 'Theſe five 'whom I have named laſt, viz. Shaftſbury, Angleſey, 'Hollis, Manchеſter, Radnor, had the chief hand 'in engaging the nation in the deſign of the Reſto-'ration. They had great credit chiefly with the 'Preſbyterian party, and were men of much dex-'terity. So the thanks of that great Turn was 'owing to them: and they were put in great poſts 'by the Earl of Clarendon's means. By which he 'loſt moſt of the Cavaliers, who could not bear the 'ſeeing ſuch men ſo highly advanced, and ſo much 'truſted (22).' It ſeems that in the Biſhop's opinion this noble Lord was a man of great parts, deep knowledge in the law, and was perfectly acquainted with our conſtitution. It is likewiſe owned that he had a large ſhare in the King's Reſtoration, and for that reaſon, the Earl of Clarendon thought it neceſſary he ſhould have a large ſhare in the adminiſtration. Theſe conceſſions, without farther help, deſtroy the probability, and indeed I think in a good meaſure, the poſſibility, of the cruel reflections contained in the character having any grounds in fact. For how can it be imagined, that a bad man, bad to ſuch a degree as to preſerve no regard for decency, ſhould preſerve the King's confidence and the higheſt employments for two and twenty years together, and at laſt riſe in reputation by being removed? Is it poſſible to believe that Parliaments which went ſuch lengths, and upon ſuch ſlight grounds as they did againſt the Earl of Danby, and other miniſters, ſhould not attack a man who minded nothing but getting, without any reſpect to virtue or even to appearances! can it be ſuppoſed that if this was really the caſe, the Rev. Prelate could not have added inſtances to his accuſation, or ought we in juſtice or charity to give any credit to what he ſays without them? But after all, this is capable of being refuted by better authority. He charges the Earl with being a corrupt man. Now, he had two offices in which this muſt have appeared. He was Vice-Treaſurer of Ireland for many years, and at laſt a committee was appointed to inſpect the management of the treaſury in that kingdom, with a deſign, if poſſible, to fix a charge upon this very nobleman; and yet they were forced to acquit him, as his antagoniſt the Duke of Ormond informs us in a repreſentation he made to the King, in which alſo he ſuggeſts, that from the ſatisfaction his Majeſty received from this enquiry, as to the honour and integrity of the Earl of Angleſey, he was induced to truſt him in the high office of Lord Privy-Seal (23). In this office again if he had been really a man inclined to corruption, he muſt certainly have had great opportunities; and yet, when his enemies had gained credit enough to ſtrip him of it, we have ſeen what a poor pretence was made uſe of for that purpoſe; when, if the Biſhop's ſtory had been true, they muſt have had many juſt and even legal cauſes to have aſſigned for his removal, in their power. Then again, as to his being inconſiderable before his death, Anthony Wood, who cared as little for the Earl of Angleſey as Biſhop Burnet, owns that he ſtood well with King James II.; and that in this particular he was not miſinformed, I can prove from a paſſage in the Earl's own diary: 'March 8, 1685, 'Spent moſt at home in buſineſs and duty (i. e. 'prayer); in the evening was private with the Lord 'Sunderland, my good friend; and then was with 'the King a full hour at Mr. Chiffinche's, who was 'very kind, free, and open in diſcourſe, ſaid he 'would not be prieſt-ridden: Read a letter of the 'late King, ſaid I ſhould be welcome to him (24).' In ſhort, from the Reſtoration to the day of his death, the Earl of Angleſey was barely four years out of employment, moſt of which he ſpent in retirement, and died, when every body expected he ſhould have been Chancellor, the higheſt office to which the King could raiſe him, and yet the good Biſhop tells us, he was fallen ſo low as to be both contemptible and uſeleſs (25).'

Dutcheſs of Buckinghamſhire. He died in the beginning of the year 1702, and was ſucceeded by his brother John Earl of Angleſey, who was Vice-Treaſurer, Receiver-General,

On the firſt publiſhing of this memorandum, it made a very great noiſe, and, as we ſay in the text, abundance of books were written about it. It would take up more room than we have to ſpare to examine the whole of this controverſy; but one branch of it ſeems particularly to require our notice, viz. Whether this memorandum ought to be eſteemed genuine? againſt which ſeveral arguments have been produced. Firſt, it is to be obſerved, that this was written while the Earl of Angleſey was Lord Privy-Seal, and it was his cuſtom to ſubſcribe Angleſey P. S. C. The King and the Duke of York were living, and therefore in decency he would have written his Majeſty and his Royal Highneſs. If to this it be replied, that he uſed Charles II. and Duke of York for the ſake of exactneſs, this can never be admitted, becauſe he ſtyles Dr. Gauden, Biſhop of Exeter, though he died Biſhop of Worceſter. Add to this, that the memorandum itſelf is not dated, though it muſt have been written either in 1675 or 1676 (27). There is, however, another circumſtance, which has never yet been taken notice of with reſpect to this memorandum, and which ſeems to affect the credit of it in a very ſenſible manner. It has been ſhewn before, how Sir Peter Pett came to write ſo long a letter to the Earl of Angleſey. In this very letter Sir Peter hath this paſſage: 'My 'Lord, there is another kind of power inherent in 'you, and that you cannot part with, ſuch a power 'as King Charles I. in his Eikon Baſilike affixes 'to the character of his favourite, when he ſays 'he looked on the Earl of Strafford as a gentle-'man whoſe great abilities might make a Prince 'rather afraid than aſhamed to employ him in the 'greateſt affairs of ſtate. Your very reputation for 'power is power, for that engageth thoſe to adhere 'to you, who want protection (28).' Though this book was publiſhed two years after the Earl of Angleſey's death, yet it was printed long before, and the Earl had it in his ſtudy. He, alſo, wrote an anſwer to it, which he deſigned ſhould have been printed and bound up with it, and in this anſwer he takes particular notice of a very remarkable paſſage in the letter, freely differing from Sir Peter in many of his ſentiments, and ſometimes correcting his miſtakes, as for inſtance in the following paſſage of the Earl's anſwer. 'It here occurs to me to ob-'ſerve to you, that after an erratum of the preſs in 'p. 38 of your Diſcourſe: Namely, where you are 'referred to p. 325 in the Advocate of Conſcience 'Liberty, inſtead of p. 225, you make the laſt 'letter of D'Oſſat's to be from Rome, Anno 1596, 'and I ſuppoſe you happened to do ſo, by caſting 'your eye on the old date of the laſt letter but one, 'printed in the volume of his letters in folio of the 'Paris edition, Anno 1625, and finding it to be 'Anno 1596. But it came not into your mind 'then, to obſerve that the laſt of his letters as they 'are ranged in order was the 199th and in the end 'of book 9th, and which was to Villeroy from 'Rome, March 6th, Anno 1604, and in which year 'he died, as you rightly refer to his epitaph to ſhew '(29).' Yet as nice and circumſpect as this ſhews the Earl to have been, we find no notice at all taken of this paſſage cited from the King's book; but his friend is left in his error if it was one, though he ſets him right in twenty things of leſs conſequence in his anſwer to his letter, which takes up 350 pages in octavo. There are only two things that can be ſaid in anſwer to this, viz. That either Lord Angleſey had acquainted his friend with this before, and therefore a repetition was needleſs, or elſe that the Earl thought it inexpedient to publiſh ſuch a thing to the world. But whoever conſiders the matter a moment, will diſcern that neither of theſe excuſes can be admitted. For if Sir P. Pett knew or believed the book not to be the King's, his citation and application of the character of the Earl of Strafford from thence would have been impertinent. On the other hand, who can heſitate at believing that the Earl would as ſoon have publiſhed this fact, having ſo fair an opportunity in his printed letter to Sir P. Pett, as leave it in a memorandum, when that memorandum was deſigned for the undeceiving of others in that point? To ſuch as are unacquainted with the books cited in this note, there may appear ſome deficiency in this argument; but whoever takes the pains to read the folio letter and the octavo anſwer, will gain ſo thorough an acquaintance with the temper and diſpoſition of the writers, as will convince him that on ſuch a point as this, one or other of them could not have been ſilent, if the facts mentioned in the memorandum had fallen within the compaſs of his knowledge. It is very true that Biſhop Burnet tells pretty nearly the ſame ſtory; for he affirms, that, in 1673, the Duke of York told him the book was not his Father's, but was written by Dr. Gauden, who after the Reſtoration brought the Duke of Somerſet and the Earl of Northampton to the King and himſelf, and vouched their knowledge of its being of that Doctor's writing, and this the Biſhop tells us was the reaſon that Gauden obtained the biſhoprick of Exeter, notwithſtanding he had taken the Covenant, and was oppoſed by Biſhop Sheldon and others for that reaſon (30). It happens unluckily for this ſtory, that the Duke of Somerſet, after a long illneſs, was at reſt in his grave before Dr. Gauden was made a Biſhop; and it is alſo obſervable, that the Earl of Southampton was dead too, before the ſtory was told by the Duke of York to the Biſhop. Beſides this, there are two other unlucky circumſtances, one that the Biſhop did not himſelf believe the Duke, becauſe having enquired of the Earl of Louthian, a zealous Preſbyterian, who knew king Charles I. very well and loved him very little, about this very matter, the Earl told him he was ſure it was the King's book, becauſe he had often heard his Majeſty deliver periods of it in his diſcourſe (31). The other unlucky circumſtance is, that the Biſhop has hinted a reaſon why no body elſe ought to believe the Duke, and which would deſtroy the credit of the Earl of Angleſey's memorandum if it were really his; for the Rev. Prelate informs us, that the Duke of York told him this ſtory of Dr. Gauden, on his preſſing him with paſſages againſt Popery out of his father's book. If theſe brothers were both Papiſts, as the greateſt part of the world ſuppoſes they were, then is there no great reaſon to wonder they ſhould deſire the book in queſtion to be aſcribed to any body rather than King Charles I. But we may be left to wonder after all, how the Earl of Angleſey ſhould forget that Dr. Gauden was Biſhop of Worceſter, as well as Exeter; when there is good reaſon to believe, that it was in conſequence of this noble Earl's ſolicitations that Dr. Gauden was tranſlated from this Biſhopric to that (32). C.

[It muſt be acknowledged, that, in the preceding article, every thing is ſaid for Lord Angleſey which can poſſibly be urged in his favour. He was undoubtedly a nobleman of great abilities: in many caſes he appears to have acted with integrity, and with a regard to the public welfare; and our worthy and able predeceſſor hath certainly been ſucceſsful in removing ſome of the charges which have been brought againſt him. It hath been ſhewn, we think, with ſufficient evidence, that Wood and Biſhop Burnet have been too ſevere in their cenſures. But ſtill we ſearch in vain for a perfect conſiſtency in the Earl of Angleſey's character. A man who began with appearing for King Charles I. and then was zealous for the parliament; who was Preſident of the Republican Council of State, and ardent for the reſtoration of monarchy; who could maintain his poſts for twenty-two years of ſuch a reign as that of Charles II. and afterwards manage matters ſo as to be thought of for Lord High Chancellor to King James II., muſt have been of a very accommodating turn of mind. If we except the remonſtrance mentioned in the text, and in the note [F], it is to no purpoſe that we look into the records of hiſtory for any great exertions of his patriotiſm, at a ſeaſon which afforded ſo many reaſons for it as Charles II.'s reign. When the grand ſtruggle was made in the Houſe of Lords, in 1675, againſt a moſt tyrannical teſt (33), we do not find the name of Lord Angleſey among the noble debaters and proteſters in the cauſe of liberty. However, ever, he appears to have been uſeful as a man of buſineſs in general, which he conducted with great ability. In the Houſe of Peers particularly, he ſeems to have taken an active part in law matters, for which he was well qualified; and ſome of his proteſts are, in this view, worthy of notice (34). He did not ſcruple, when he was not ſatisfied with the reſolutions of the Peers, to enter his proteſtation ſingly (35). His diſſenting, alone, from the vote of the upper Houſe, in the caſe of the Iriſh plot, notwithſtanding the calumny to which he knew he muſt be expoſed, is an inſtance both of his integrity and diſcernment. His conduct was equally remarkable in a parliament of a totally different temper. When, in 1685, a bill was brought in for reverſing the attainder of the Lord Viſcount Stafford, the Earl of Angleſey was the ſole Peer who proteſted againſt it, upon the queſtion's being put, whether the bill with the amendments ſhould be engroſſed: And he and the earl of Clare were the only Lords who entered their proteſts upon the paſſing of the act (36).

General, and Paymaſter of the forces in Ireland. He was ſucceeded, at his death, 1710, by his brother Arthur, who, while he ſat in the Houſe of Commons in Ireland, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the weight and eloquence of his ſpeeches, and was always heard, after his acceſſion to the title of Earl of Angleſey, with the utmoſt attention and reſpect in the Britiſh Houſe of Peers. On the death of Queen Anne, he was appointed, by King George I. one of the Lords Juſtices till he arrived from Hanover; after which, he was ſworn of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, and on the third of January 1714-15, (with Henry Hyde, then Earl of Rocheſter) made Joint-Treaſurer of Ireland, and Treaſurer at War. On the death of the Duke of Mancheſter, he was, on the ninth of February 1721-22, in full ſenate, unanimouſly elected High Steward of the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he had his education. He had been one of their repreſentatives in three ſeveral parliaments, whilſt he was a Commoner. He died on the thirty-firſt of March 1737, and was ſucceeded in his title by his couſin Lord Altham, of the kingdom of Ireland (p). [The ſtate of this family, for the laſt forty years, hath been very peculiar; having given riſe to ſome remarkable events, and to ſeveral extraordinary claims and litigations, which have employed the courts of juſtice in Ireland, and demanded the attention of the Houſes of Peers both in Ireland and in England. But a relation of theſe facts belongs more properly to a Peerage than to the preſent work.]

The ingenious Mr. Walpole, in his uſual lively manner, hath made ſeveral remarks on the character of Lord Angleſey, and upon the account of him in the preceding article, which merit attention (37). We agree with Mr. Walpole, that it is not probable that the Earl of Angleſey ſhould decline being Prime Miniſter to avoid envy. Indeed, it is not at all likely that any ſuch offer ſhould have been made to him at or a little after the Reſtoration; ſince no perſon could at that time ſtand in competition, in this reſpect, with Lord Clarendon. We farther agree with Mr. Walpole, that the Earl of Angleſey's ſitting in judgment upon the regicides, is not ſo honourable to him as hath been repreſented, though he certainly had no concern in the King's death; and that his being employed for 22 years by King Charles II. is but an inſufficient proof of his not having been a bad man. It is certainly an improbable ſuppoſition, as Mr. Walpole juſtly remarks, that the Earl ſhould be thought of for Lord Chancellor by King James II. when he had a Chancellor ſo moulded to his purpoſes as Jefferies. If the fact were true, inſtead of being an honour to Lord Angleſey, it would reflect the greateſt diſgrace on his character.

(37) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, Vol. ii. p. 65—77.

It is from the preceding account of the Earl of Angleſey in particular, that Mr. Walpole hath taken occaſion to make a ſevere ſtricture on our work, by ſaying, that notwithſtanding its ſingular merit, he cannot help calling it Vindicatio Britannica, or a Defence of every body (38). But in anſwer to this remark, it may be obſerved, 1ſt, That the cenſure, ſo far as it is juſt, can only be applied to a few articles. 2dly, That in an undertaking of this kind, which is not intended to be the vehicle of ſcandal, or of petulant criticiſm, but to do juſtice to ability and merit, of whatever religious or political principle, party and profeſſion, it is ſafeſt to err on the candid ſide. 3dly, That the removal of particular charges which have been haſtily or groundleſsly brought againſt eminent men, falls, with peculiar propriety, within the compaſs of our deſign. And 4thly, That if we have been guilty of an exceſs of gentleneſs, we muſt guard, for the future, againſt this amiable error. It will behove us, for inſtance, when we come to the Life of Sir Robert Walpole, to take care that we be not too milky. However, we hope it will be the glory of this work, to treat every character with all the candour which is conſiſtent with truth. The queſtion concerning the author of the Eikon Baſilike, is conſidered in the life of Biſhop Gauden.] K.

ANNESLEY or ANELEY (SAMUEL), a very eminent Non-Conformiſt Miniſter. He was the ſon of John Aneley, of Hareley, in Warwickſhire; where his family were poſſeſſed of a pretty good eſtate (a) [A]. He was born about the year 1620, and his father dying when he was four years old, the care of his education devolved on his mother, who was a very prudent and religious woman (b). In Michaelmas term 1635, he was admitted a Student in Queen's-college at Oxford (c), where, at the uſual times, he took the degrees of Bachelor, and Maſter of Arts (d). While, he was in the Univerſity, he was particularly remarkable for temperance and induſtry. He commonly drank nothing but water, and though he is ſaid to have been but of ſlow

[A] Poſſeſſed of a pretty good eſtate.] It was the misfortune of this gentleman, to live in ſuch times, as, generally ſpeaking, engage men to become of ſome party or other, which is ſure to expoſe them to the hatred of all parties except that of which they are. This is the true reaſon why there is ſcarcely a fact which relates to him uncontroverted. In the firſt place there is no ſmall doubt about his name. Certain it is that he himſelf wrote it Anneſley (1); and Dr. Calamy aſſures us, that Arthur Anneſley, the firſt Earl of Angleſey, was his relation (2). Yet the Oxford Antiquary tells us, that he was entered of the univerſity of Oxford by the name of Samuel Aneley (3), the ſon of John Aneley, and he cites the regiſter in ſupport of this (4). He adds, that our author wrote himſelf afterwards, and was called by the name of Anneſley, becauſe it was a noble name (5). In order to have given ſome light into this matter, I have enquired after the Family of Aneley, but I cannot find that there is ſuch a one in Warwickſhire, or at leaſt if there be ſuch a one it can be of no great note; neither to ſay the truth, do I find that there is any family of the Anneſley's ſettled there (6). Yet after all, as Mr. Wood allows our author to have been a man of probity, I cannot but ſuppoſe he wrote his name as it ſhould be.

parts, yet he ſupplied this defect in nature, by prodigious application (e). He was from his youth inclined to the Miniſtry, and his deſires we are told were much fortified by a dream of his, which was, that being a Miniſter, he was ſent for by the Biſhop of London, who condemned him to be burnt for a Martyr (f). In all probability this dream which he had in his childhood, might be owing to his reading the writings of John Fox, which in thoſe days were put into moſt young people's hands. There is ſome diſpute as to his receiving Holy Orders, that is to ſay, whether he had them from a Biſhop, or according to the Preſbyterian way, and as there is authority on both ſides, the point muſt be diſcuſſed in a note [B]. In 1644 he became Chaplain to the Earl of Warwick, then Admiral of the Parliament's fleet (g). In proceſs of time his own behaviour, and the great intereſt he had with ſuch as were then in power, procured him a very good eſtabliſhment at Cliffe in Kent (h). Here he ſucceeded Doctor Griffith Higges, who was ejected for his loyalty. This was a very conſiderable living, having not only a revenue of between three and four hundred pounds per annum, but being alſo a Peculiar, a great juriſdiction belonged to the incumbent, who therefore holds a court, wherein all things relating to wills, marriage contracts, &c. are decided (i). The people of the pariſh were, it ſeems, extremely fond of Dr. Higges, and therefore treated his ſucceſſor but very roughly, whereupon Mr. Anneſley told them, 'That 'if they conceived him to be biaſſed by the value of ſo conſiderable a living, they 'were exceedingly miſtaken; that he came amongſt them with an intent to do good 'to their ſouls, and that he was reſolved to ſtay, how ill ſoever they uſed him, till he 'had fitted them for the reception of a better miniſter; which, whenever it happened, 'he would leave them, notwithſtanding the great value of the living (k).' On the twenty-ſixth of July 1648, he preached the faſt ſermon before the Houſe of Commons, which by their order was printed (l) [C]. About this time alſo, he was honoured with the title of Doctor of Laws, by the Univerſity of Oxford (m), which has given occaſion to ſome very ſevere reflections [D]. The ſame year, viz. the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, he went to ſea with his Patron the Earl of Warwick, who was employed in giving chaſe to that part of the Engliſh navy which went over to the then Prince, afterwards King Charles II. (n). The Doctor continued at ſea till the tenth of December in the ſame year, when he returned to London (o). Some time after this, he quitted his Kentiſh living, much againſt the will of his pariſhioners, that he might keep the promiſe he had made them, when they were in another diſpoſition (p). In 1657 he was nominated by Oliver Lord-Protector, Lecturer at St. Paul's (q), and afterwards, viz. in 1658, was preſented by Richard Lord-Protector, to the Vicarage of St. Giles's Cripplegate (r). But this preſentation growing quickly uſeleſs, he, in 1660, procured another from the truſtees for the maintenance of Miniſters (s), being alſo a Commiſſioner for the approbation and admiſſion of Miniſters of the Goſpel, after the Preſbyterian manner (t). His ſecond preſentation growing as much out of date as the firſt, he, before the end of the year, viz. Auguſt the twenty eighth, 1660, obtained a third preſentation of a more

[B] Muſt be diſcuſſed in a note.] We have it on the authority of Mr. Wood, that our author took holy orders from a Biſhop (7). Doctor Calamy informs us, that he had Preſbyterian ordination, and he proves it by a certificate dated the 18th of December, 1644, ſubſcribed by ſeven Preſbyterian Miniſters. By this certificate it appears, that the intent of his ordination was, that he might officiate as a Chaplain in a Man of War called the Globe (8). At firſt ſight theſe facts ſeem to be directly oppoſite, yet I cannot avoid informing the reader that it is not abſolutely impoſſible both may be true. I ſay this, becauſe there were in thoſe days inſtances of perſons, who, notwithſtanding their being ordained by Biſhops, deſired to be re-ordained by Preſbyters. Yet I cannot think that this was our author's caſe, for this plain reaſon, that he was but juſt of age to receive orders when he took this certificate.

[C] Which by their order was printed.] It was this ſermon that raiſed Dr. Anneſley ſo many enemies, who have purſued him even beyond the grave. His text was Job xxvii. 5. 6. God forbid that I ſhould juſtify you: Till I die, I will not remove my integrity from me. My righteouſneſs I hold faſt and will not let it go, my heart ſhall not reproach me ſo long as I live (9). In this ſermon he inveighed againſt the King, then a priſoner in the Iſle of Wight, excited the Parliament to do juſtice upon him inſtead of treating with him any more, and at the ſame time highly extolled the Covenant. It is plain that the Houſe were very well pleaſed with his diſcourſe, by their ordering it to be printed; neither can it be denied, that Dr. Anneſley took the Engagement, and went all the lengths with the party, which are the grounds of Mr. Wood's bitterneſs againſt him (10).

(9) Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

[D] Some very ſevere reflections.] Mr. Wood ſays that our author had the degree of Doctor of Laws to qualify him the better for holding his courts as Rector of Cliffe in Kent (11). Dr. Calamy gives quite another reaſon: he ſays, that the Earl of Warwick, having ſeveral chaplains who were Doctors, was deſirous that Mr. Anneſley ſhould be a Doctor too (12). As they diſagree in this, ſo they do in every thing elſe; for Wood aſſerts, that Dr. Anneſley's contemporaries in Queen's Coll. looked upon the giving him this degree as the moſt ſcandalous thing in nature, becauſe they knew he was utterly unacquainted with law: nay, he tells us that ſome of the graveſt fellows there, particularly Dr. Barlow, ſaid often in his hearing, that if this gentleman could then have told what the Pandects were, he ſhould freely have had their vote to go out Doctor of Laws. But ſo it was, continues Wood, that for his money, and favour of thoſe in authority, he had that degree conferred upon him, as others then had degrees in other faculties that knew little or nothing of learning, to the great diſgrace of the univerſity (13). The Oxford Antiquary was ſo fond of this ſtory, that he put it not only into his hiſtory of Oxford writers, but alſo into his account of the graduates of Oxford (14), and it has been tranſcribed by Dr. Walker, without loſing any of his circumſtances (15). Dr. Calamy complains heavily of this; though he has paſſed a ſevere cenſure on Dr. Higges, the Doctor's predeceſſor at Cliffe, with as little reaſon (16). The truth of the matter is, that this degree was beſtowed at the command of Philip Earl of Pembroke, Chancellor of the univerſity, who acted there with boundleſs authority, and therefore theſe are uſually ſtyled the Pembrokian Creations, and, as Wood ſays, were in general ſcandalous enough.

legal ſtamp from King Charles II. (u). Yet even this did not keep him there long; for in 1662 he was ejected for Non-conformity (w). It is ſaid that the Earl of Angleſey, who was his near relation, took ſome pains to perſuade him to conform, and even offered him a conſiderable preferment in the Church, in caſe he would have complied with his requeſt (x); but the Doctor refuſed, and continued to preach privately during that King's reign, and ſo long as King James II. ſat on the throne. His Non-conformity, we are told, created him troubles, but no inward uneaſineſs (y). His goods were diſtrained for keeping a Conventicle; but Dr. Calamy remarks it as the judgment of God, that a Juſtice of Peace died, as he was ſigning a warrant to apprehend him (z). As he had a very ſtrong conſtitution, ſo he laboured earneſtly in the work of his miniſtry for no leſs than fifty-five years (a). At laſt, in the year 1696, he was attacked by a painful diſtemper, which, after ſeventeen weeks intolerable torture, put an end to his life the laſt day of that year (b). He had the reputation of being a warm pathetic preacher, as well as a pious, prudent, and very charitable Divine, laying by the tenth part of his income, whatever it was, for the uſe of the poor [E]. His funeral ſermon was preached by Dr. Daniel Williams, and as to his writings they are mentioned in the notes [F].

[E] For the uſe of the poor.] Dr. Calamy's character of him is ſo full, that it deſerves to be tranſcribed (17), He had, ſays he, a large ſoul and a flaming zeal, and his uſefulneſs was very extenſive. He had the care of all the churches upon him, and was the chief inſtrument in the education and ſubſiſtence of ſeveral Miniſters, whoſe uſeful labours the church had otherwiſe wanted. He was the main ſupport of the morning lecture, for which ſo many have cauſe to be thankful to God, and after the death of old Mr. Care, he took the care of it upon himſelf; in the laſt 30 years of his life, he had great peace of mind from the aſſurance of God's covenant love. For ſeveral years indeed before that, he walked in darkneſs and was diſconſolate, which is no unuſual thing with ſuch as are converted in their childhood, whoſe change being not ſo remarkable as that of many others, is therefore the more liable to be queſtioned, but in his laſt illneſs, he was full of comfort. To this character of Dr. Calamy, let us add our author's Will, becauſe it is very ſhort, and at the ſame time very remarkable (18).

In the name of God, Amen. I Dr. Samuel Anneſley of the Liberty of Norton Folgate, in the County of Middleſex, an unworthy Miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, being through mercy in health of body and mind, do make this my laſt will and teſtament concerning my earthly pittance. For my ſoul I dare humbly ſay, it is, through Grace, devoted unto God otherwiſe than by legacy, when it may live here no longer: And I do believe that my body, after it's ſleeping a while in Jeſus, ſhall be re-united to my Soul, that they may both be for ever with the Lord.

Of what I ſhall leave behind me, I make this ſhort diſpoſal: My juſt debts being paid, I give to each of my children one ſhilling, and all the reſt to be equally divided between my ſon Benjamin Anneſley, my daughter Judith Anneſley, and my daughter Ann Anneſley, whom I make my Executors of this my laſt Will and Teſtament, revoking all former, and confirming this with my hand and ſeal this 29th day of March, 1693.

[It hath juſtly been remarked to us, by a moſt valuable correſpondent, that the Commons may have been pleaſed with Dr. Anneſley's Faſt Sermon, preached before them in 1648; but that no proof of this ariſes from their having ordered it to be printed. Cudworth's Sermon, in the preceding year, was printed by their order; and yet its doctrine could not have been pleaſing. The ſame correſpondent hath obſerved, with regard to the ſtory of the Juſtice of Peace dying, as he was ſigning a warrant to apprehend Dr. Anneſley, that it is preſumptuous to ſay what are the judgments of God; and that, as the Juſtice purſued the poſitive direction of an act of Parliament, it was not his buſineſs to determine concerning the propriety of the Act ordering commitment. Indeed, if he had been ever ſo averſe to a perſecuting law, it would have been out of his power to refuſe a warrant to a legal information. Nothing is more diſgraceful to hiſtory, or is a greater indication of a party-ſpirit, than the aſcribing the calamities of our adverſaries to the Divine Judgments.] K.

ANSELM, Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I., was an Italian by birth, being born in the year 1033, at Aoſt, a town at the foot of the Alps, belonging to the Duke of Savoy. He was deſcended of a conſiderable family: his father's name was Gundulphus, and his mother's Hemeberga (a). After he had gone through a courſe of ſtudies, and travelled for ſome time in Burgundy and France, he took the monaſtic habit in the abbey of Becc in Normandy, of which Lanfranc, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury (b), was then Prior. At that time Anſelm was no more than twenty-ſeven years of age. Three years after, when Lanfranc was made Abbot of Caen, Anſelm ſucceeded him in the Priory of Bece; and when Herluin, Abbot of that monaſtery, died, Anſelm was promoted to the Abbacy. About the year 1092, Anſelm came over into England, being invited thither by Hugh Earl of Cheſter, who requeſted his aſſiſtance in his ſickneſs. Soon after his arrival, William Rufus, falling ſick at Glouceſter, and being preſſed to fill up the See of Canterbury, which had been vacant above four years [A], thought fit to nominate Anſelm; who with much difficulty was prevailed upon to accept that dignity [B]. Before his conſecration, he gained a promiſe from the King for the reſtitution of all the lands, which were in the poſſeſſion of that See in Lanfranc's time. And thus having ſecured the temporalities of the Archbiſhopric, and done homage to the King, he was conſecrated with great ſolemnity on the fourth of December 1093 (c). Soon after his conſecration, the King intending to wreſt the duchy of Normandy from his brother Robert, and endeavouring to raiſe what money he could for that purpoſe, Anſelm made him an offer of five hundred pounds; which the King thinking too little refuſed to accept, and the Archbiſhop thereby fell under the King's diſpleaſure [C]. About that time, he had a diſpute with the Biſhop of London, touching the right of conſecrating churches in a foreign dioceſe (d) [D]. The next year, the King being ready to embark for Normandy, Anſelm waited upon him, and deſired his leave to convene a national Synod, in which the diſorders of the Church and State, and the general diſſolution of manners, might be remedied: but the King refuſed his requeſt, and even treated him very roughly; upon which the Archbiſhop and his retinue withdrew from court (e) [E]. Another cauſe of diſcontent

(a) Baron. Annal. tom. ii. an. 1093.

[A] The See of Canterbury had been vacant above four years.] Archbiſhop Lanfranc died in May 1089, and Anſelm ſucceeded him in December 1093. During the vacancy of the See, the profits were returned into the Exchequer. The King, it ſeems, at that time, was much influenced by one Ranulph, a Clergyman, who, though a Norman and of mean extraction, had a great ſhare in the King's favour, and at laſt roſe to the poſt of Prime Miniſter. This man, having gained the King's ear by flattering his vices, miſled him in the adminiſtration, and put him upon ſeveral arbitrary and oppreſſive expedients. Among others, one was, to ſeize the revenues of a church, upon the death of a Biſhop or Abbot; allowing the Dean and Chapter, or Convent, but a ſlender penſion for maintenance (1). But the King falling ſick, began to be touched with remorſe of conſcience, and to recollect the miſmanagements of his reign. Among other oppreſſions, he was particularly afflicted for the injury he had done the Church and kingdom in keeping the See of Canterbury, and ſome others, vacant. The Biſhops and other great men took this opportunity to entreat the King to fill up the vacant Sees; and Anſelm, who then lived in the neighbourhood of Glouceſter, being ſent for to court, to aſſiſt the King in his illneſs, was pitched upon by the King as a proper perſon, and accordingly nominated to the See of Canterbury (2).

[B] He was with much difficulty prevailed upon to accept that dignity.] He expreſſed great uneaſineſs at this promotion; and when he was hurried into the King's preſence, to receive inveſtiture by delivery of the paſtoral ſtaff and ring, he made all the decent oppoſition imaginable. The Biſhops expoſtulated with him upon his refuſal, telling him, 'That 'his modeſty was no better than a plain deſertion 'of his duty; that things were in the utmoſt confuſion; that all ſorts of diſorders prevailed in the 'Church, and Chriſtianity was almoſt exterminated 'by the licentiouſneſs and tyranny of the adminiſtration: that, ſince the remedy of theſe evils was 'now in his power, the declining to make uſe of it 'was hardly reconcileable to conſcience, or the 'character of an honeſt man; and that the preferring his own eaſe and quiet to the public ſervice of 'religion, was a very indefenſible motive.' Anſelm, in excuſe of himſelf, alledged, 'That he had not 'health and vigour ſufficient for ſo weighty a 'charge; that his inclination was entirely for the 'cloiſter, and that he had always declined concerning himſelf in ſecular affairs.' He deſired, therefore, 'They would not endeavour to drag him 'out of his repoſe, and force him upon his averſion.' He added, I am Abbot of a Monaſtery in a foreign dominion; I am bound to canonical obedience to the Archbiſhop of that province; I owe allegiance to the Prince of the country; and am likewiſe obliged to aſſiſt my convent to the beſt of my power. Things ſtanding thus, I am not at liberty to quit the monaſtery without the conſent of the Monks, nor to diſengage from my Prince without his permiſſion; nor to withdraw myſelf from the juriſdiction of my ſpiritual father the Biſhop, unleſs he is pleaſed to diſcharge me. Finding him perſiſt in his refuſal, they forced him into the King's preſence, who aſked him in a very pathetical manner, 'Why he endeavoured to ruin 'him in the other world; which would infallibly 'follow, in caſe he died before the archbiſhoprick 'was filled.' When no arguments could prevail, the Biſhops and thoſe who were preſent clapped the paſtoral ſtaff into his hands, ſhouted for his election, and bore him by force into the church, where Te Deum was ſung upon the occaſion. But, notwithſtanding all this ſolemnity, Anſelm would not acquieſce, till the King had written to the Duke of Normandy, the Archbiſhop of Roan, and the Monaſtery of Becc, and procured him a diſcharge from the obligations above mentioned (3).

(3) Id. ib. p. 17.

[C] The Archbiſhop thereby fell under the King's diſpleaſure.] When the King heard of the intended ſum, he was pleaſed at firſt; but afterwards ſome of the courtiers, diſaffected to the Archbiſhop, repreſenting it as too trifling an acknowledgment, he refuſed to accept it. This temper of the Court ſurprized Anſelm, who thereupon went to the King, and addreſſed him in this manner: 'Sir, I intreat 'your Highneſs would be pleaſed to accept the preſent I ſent you; it will not be the laſt acknowledgment your Archbiſhop will make you: And 'I humbly conceive, 'tis both more ſerviceable and 'more honourable for your Highneſs to receive a 'leſſer ſum from me with my conſent, than to extort a greater by force and violence; for voluntary 'payments will be more frequent in their return. If 'your Highneſs allows me the freedom and privilege of my ſtation, my perſon, and all that belongs to me, will be at your ſervice; but if I am 'treated like a ſlave, I ſhall be obliged to ſtand off, 'and keep my fortune to myſelf.' This frank declaration greatly diſguſted the King, who bid him take his money and be gone. The Archbiſhop not being in a condition at that time to double the ſum, as the King expected, without racking his tenants, deſiſted after a ſecond offer, and gave the money to the poor (4).

(4) Ibid.

[D] He had a diſpute with the Biſhop of London about the right of conſecrating churches in a foreign dioceſe.] The Archbiſhop was preparing to conſecrate a church, in one of his manors, built by his predeceſſor Lanfranc. The town, called Berga, lay within the dioceſe of London; the Biſhop of which See ſent down two Prebendaries to claim the right of conſecration. Upon this the Archbiſhop conſulted Wulſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, who, being the only Engliſh or Saxon Biſhop then living, was thought the beſt qualified to pronounce upon the controverſy. This Prelate giving his opinion in favour of the Archbiſhop's pretenſions, Anſelm went on with the conſecration, performed Divine ſervice, and executed other parts of his function, in all the towns belonging to the See of London, without moving for the conſent of the dioceſan (5).

(5) Id. ib. p. 21.

[E] The Archbiſhop —— withdrew from court.] Our Prelate began to reflect, that the King's diſpleaſure towards him might prevent his acting in his ſtation with advantage to the Church and kingdom. He applied, therefore, to the Biſhops, to entreat the diſcontent between the King and the Archbiſhop, was, Anſelm's deſiring leave to go to Rome, to receive the pall from Pope Urban II., whom the King of England did not acknowledge as Pope, being more inclined to favour the party of his competitor Guibert. This miſunderſtanding occaſioned great diſputes; and to put an end to the controverſy, a council or convention was held at Rockingham caſtle [F]; the iſſue of which was, that the majority of the Biſhops, being either gained or over-awed by the Court, threw up their canonical obedience, and renounced Anſelm for their Archbiſhop [G]. In conſequence of this proceeding Anſelm deſired a paſſport, to go beyond the ſea, till the preſent miſunderſtandings could be made up. But the King abſolutely refuſed his requeſt, and would only conſent, that there ſhould be a kind of truce or ſuſpenſion of the affair from March to Whitſuntide [H], during which interval the difference was to ſleep. But, long before the expiration of this term, the King broke through the agreement, baniſhed ſeveral clergymen who were Anſelm's favourites, and miſerably haraſſed the tenants of his See. Whitſuntide being come, and the Biſhops having in vain endeavoured to ſoften Anſelm into a compliance; the King, with the advice of his great men, received him into favour upon his own terms; and, becauſe Anſelm perſiſted in refuſing to receive the pall from the King's hands, it was at laſt agreed, that the Pope's Nuncio, who had brought the pall into England (f), ſhould carry it down to Canterbury, and lay it upon the altar of the cathedral; from whence Anſelm was to receive it, as if it had been put into his hands by St. Peter himſelf.

the King to receive him into favour. But the King being inexorable, the Biſhops adviſed him to make his Majeſty a freſh offer of five hundred pounds, with a promiſe of as much more as ſoon as it could be raiſed. To which Anſelm replied, 'That this 'method might prove very unfortunate; that the 'King might probably be angry again ere long, 'upon the ſame proſpect; that the tenants of the 'archbiſhoprick had been miſerably haraſſed ſince 'the death of his predeceſſor; and that to take any 'more from them would be their utter undoing.' Beſides, ſays he, God forbid I ſhould do any thing to make the world believe my Sovereign's favour is mercenary. I owe the King allegiance, and ought to be tender of his honour. How then can I be true to theſe engagements, if I go about to bring an ill report upon his juſtice, and offer to buy his friendſhip with a little money, like a horſe in a fair? At this rate royal favour would be valued no higher than the proportion of the ſum. But far be it from me to undervalue a thing of that dignity, and to put ſo paltry a conſideration in balance againſt it. Your way therefore will be, to perſuade the King not to ſet a price upon his reconciliation, but to receive me upon frank and honourable terms, and treat me as his ſpiritual Father: And for my part I am ready to pay him the duty of a ſubject. But as for the money, ſince he was pleaſed to refuſe it, I have given it to the poor, and have now nothing to offer of that kind. This being reported to the King, he appeared very angry, and declared, 'He would 'never look upon Anſelm as his ghoſtly Father; 'that he hated his prayers and benedictions, and, 'therefore, he might go whither he pleaſed.' Upon this, ſays Eadmer (6), who was one of Anſelm's retinue, we withdrew from Court.

(6) Ubi ſupra.

[F] A council —— was held at Rockingham caſtle.] In this aſſembly, Anſelm, opening his cauſe, told them with what reluctancy he had accepted the archbiſhoprick; that he had made an expreſs reſerve of his obedience to Pope Urban; and that he was now brought under difficulties upon that ſcore. He, therefore, deſired their advice how to act in ſuch a manner, as neither to fail in his allegiance to the King, nor in his duty to the Holy See. The Biſhops were of opinion, he ought to reſign himſelf wholly to the King's pleaſure. They told him, there was a general complaint againſt him, for intrenching upon the King's prerogative; and that it would be prudence in him to wave his regard for Urban; that Biſhop (for they would not call him Pope) being in no condition to do him either good or harm. To this Anſelm returned, that he was engaged to be no farther the King's ſubject than the laws of Chriſtianity would give him leave; that as he was willing to render unto Cæſar the things that were Cæſar's, ſo he muſt likewiſe take in the other part of the precept, and give unto God that which was God's. Upon this William Biſhop of Durham, a Court Prelate, who had inflamed the difference, and managed the argument for the King, inſiſted, that the nomination of the Pope to the ſubject was the principal jewel of the Crown, and that by this privilege the Kings of England were diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the Princes of Chriſtendom (7).

(7) Eadmer. ib. p. 28, 29.

[G] The Biſhops renounced Anſelm for their Archbiſhop.] The King would have had them gone farther, brought him to his trial, and depoſed him in the council. But the Biſhops refuſed to carry their reſentment againſt him ſo far. As for Anſelm, when he heard that his ſuffragans had diſclaimed him, he complained greatly of their ill-treatment of him, and demanded the regard due to a Metropolitan. In a letter, which he wrote to the Iriſh Biſhops about that time, he expreſſes the great uneaſineſs this uſage gave him, and deſires they would put up their prayers on his behalf, 'That God would inſpire 'him with fortitude and reſolution, to preſerve the 'government of the Church, and appear boldly 'againſt diſorder and licentiouſneſs.' And in the cloſe of the letter, If there happen, ſays he, any difficulty in your country about the conſecration of Biſhops, or any other matter relating to eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, I deſire you would inform me of the caſe, and take the aſſiſtance of the beſt advice I can give you (8). It is remarkable, that when the King applied to the temporal nobility, to engage them to follow the example of the Biſhops, and diſclaim Anſelm, they unanimouſly refuſed to do ſo; and this generous declaration of the Barons in favour of the Archbiſhop, made the ſervile compliance of the Biſhops appear the more ſcandalous and unjuſtifiable (9).

[H] A truce, or ſuſpenſion of the affair, from March to Whitſuntide, was agreed upon.] During this interval, Walter, Biſhop of Alba, was ſent by Urban into England, attended by two clergymen, who officiated in the King's chapel. Theſe Eccleſiaſtics had been privately diſpatched to Rome, to enquire into the late election, and examine which of the two pretenders, Guibert or Urban, was canonically choſen. Theſe agents, finding the right lay in Urban, applied to him, and endeavoured to perſuade him to ſend the King the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's pall. This was the King's point; who thought, by getting the pall into his poſſeſſion, he ſhould be able to manage the Archbiſhop (10). The Pope complied ſo far, as to ſend the Biſhop of Alba to the King with the pall, but with ſecret orders concerning the diſpoſal of it. This Prelate arriving at the Engliſh court, diſcourſed very agreeably to the King, making him believe the Pope was entirely in his intereſt; upon which William ordered Urban to be acknowledged as Pope in all his dominions. After he had thus far gratified the See of Rome, he began to treat with the Legate about the deprivation of Anſelm; but was greatly diſappointed, when that Prelate aſſured him the deſign was impracticable. However, it was now too late to go back; and therefore, to ſet the beſt face upon the matter, he reſolved, ſince he could not have his revenge upon Anſelm, to drop the diſpute, and pretend himſelf reconciled (11).

(10) Id. ib. l. ii. p. 32.

Things

Things being thus adjuſted, the Archbiſhop went to Canterbury, and received the pall with great ſolemnity, the June following (g). And now it was generally hoped, that all occaſion of difference between the King and the Archbiſhop was removed: but it appeared ſoon after, that the reconciliation on the King's part was not ſincere. For William, having marched his forces into Wales, and brought that country to ſubmiſſion, took that opportunity to quarrel with Anſelm, pretending he was not ſatisfied with the quota the Archbiſhop had furniſhed for that expedition (h) [I]. Finding therefore his authority too weak to oppoſe the corruptions of the times, he reſolved to go in perſon to Rome, and conſult the Pope. But the King, to whom he applied for leave to go out of the kingdom, ſeemed ſurprized at the requeſt, and gave him a flat denial (i) [K]. Notwithſtanding this, the Archbiſhop reſolved upon the voyage [L], and accordingly embarked at Dover. But when the King heard that he had croſſed the channel, he ſeized upon the Archbiſhopric, and made every thing void which Anſelm had done (k). The Archbiſhop got ſafe to Rome, and was honourably received by the Pope. After a ſhort ſtay in that city, he accompanied the Pope to a country ſeat near Capua, whither his Holineſs retired on account of the unhealthineſs of the town. And here Anſelm wrote a book, in which he gave an account of the reaſon of our Saviour's Incarnation. The Pope wrote to the King of England in a ſtrain of authority, enjoining him to re-inſtate Anſelm in all the profits and privileges of his See. Anſelm, likewiſe, wrote into England upon the ſame ſubject (l). As for the King, he endeavoured to get Anſelm diſcountenanced abroad, and wrote to Roger Duke of Apulia, and others, to that purpoſe (m). But he had not credit enough, it ſeems, to gain his point: for Anſelm was treated with all imaginable reſpect wherever he came [M]. This famous Archbiſhop was very ſerviceable to the Pope in the council of Bari, which was held to oppoſe the errors of the Greek Church, with reſpect to the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt (n). In this Synod Anſelm anſwered the objections of the Greeks, and managed the argument with ſo much judgment, learning, and penetration, that he ſilenced his adverſaries, and gave general ſatisfaction to the Weſtern Church. This argument was afterwards digeſted by him into a Tract [N], and is extant among his other works (o). In the ſame council Anſelm generouſly

[I] The King quarrelled with Anſelm, pretending he was not ſatisfied with the quota he had furniſhed for the Welſh expedition.] The King complained, that the Archbiſhop had failed in his proportion, and that his men were neither well accoutred, nor fit for the ſervice. He even threatened to have him tried for a miſdemeanour, and ordered him to be ready to make his appearance upon the firſt ſummons. Anſelm thought ſilence the beſt expedient upon this occaſion, and therefore returned no anſwer to the King's meſſage (12).

(12) Id. ib. p. 37.

[K] The King, to whom he applied for leave to go out of the kingdom —— gave him a flat denial.] He added, 'That he did by no means underſtand the 'reaſon of ſuch a voyage; that he could not think 'Anſelm ſo far guilty of any crime, as to ſtand in 'need of the Pope's abſolution: and, as for conſulting him, he had that good opinion of the 'Archbiſhop's judgment, that he thought him 'every jot as well qualified to give the Pope advice, as to receive any from him.' Anſelm renewed his petition in vain; and deſpairing to obtain the King's leave, he ſent for the Biſhops of Winchester, Lincoln, Saliſbury, and Bath, who were then at court, and told them, 'That it belonged 'more particularly to their office, to adhere to the 'intereſt of religion: If, therefore, they would 'ſtand by him, upon this occaſion, and be firm to 'the ſervice of the Church, he would lay his intentions before them, and be governed by their advice.' They deſired a little time for deliberation; and having conſulted together, they returned to him with the following anſwer: 'My Lord, we 'know you to be a very religious and holy man, 'and that your converſation is wholly in Heaven; 'but as for ourſelves, we muſt confeſs, our relations and ſecular intereſt are a clog upon us, inſomuch that we cannot riſe up to thoſe ſeraphic 'flights, nor trample upon the world with the 'noble contempt that you do. If you pleaſe to 'ſtoop to our infirmities, and content yourſelf with 'our methods and management, we will ſolicit 'your cauſe with the ſame heartineſs we do our 'own, and aſſiſt you to the utmoſt of our power. 'But if you are all ſpirituality, and have nothing 'but the Church in view, all we can do is to preſerve our former regards to you, and that with a 'reſerve of acting nothing, which may intrench 'upon our allegiance to the King.' After this conference with the Biſhops, the King ſent another meſſage to him, expoſtulating with him upon breach of duty in leaving the kingdom without the royal permiſſion. Upon this Anſelm went to court, and, according to his cuſtomary privilege, ſeating himſelf at the King's right-hand, would have entered upon his juſtification. But the King perſiſted in his denial of leave, and the Archbiſhop left the court, reſolved upon his voyage (13).

(13) Id. ib. p. 39.

[L] The Archbiſhop reſolved upon the voyage.] At his parting from the court, he told the King, 'He 'was now juſt ready to ſet forward; that if he 'could have gained his permiſſion, he conceived it 'might have been more ſerviceable to his Majeſty, 'and more ſatisfactory to all good people: But 'ſince it proved otherwiſe, he muſt acquieſce in 'the misfortune, and ſhould always have the ſame 'regard for the welfare of the King's ſoul: That 'now, not knowing when he ſhould wait upon his 'Highneſs again, he was ready to recommend him 'to God Almighty, and to diſmiſs him with the 'ſame ſolemnity of good wiſhes that were owing 'from a ſpiritual father to a ſon, he had ſo great 'an affection for; and which a King of England 'ought to receive from an Archbiſhop of Canterbury.' And, therefore, unleſs your Highneſs rejects it, ſays he, I am ready to give you my bleſſing. The King replying, he did not refuſe it, Anſelm roſe up, and making the ſign of the croſs over the King's head, who bowed at that ceremony, took his leave; the King and all the court admiring the reſolution and unconcernedneſs of his behaviour (14).

(14) Id. ib. p. 41.

[M] Anſelm was treated with all imaginable reſpect wherever he came.] Finding his preaching had a good effect on his audiences in Italy, he deſired leave of the Pope to reſign his Archbiſhopric, believing he might be more ſerviceable to the world in a more private ſtation. The Pope would by no means conſent to ſuch a ſtep, but charged him, upon his obedience, never to drop his title, or quit his ſtation (15).

(15) Id. ib. p. 45.

[N] This argument was digeſted by him into a Tract.] Baronius's remark upon this diſcourſe of Anſelm's deſerves to be remembered. He takes notice, that the Archbiſhop, in this Tract, does not make uſe of the authorities either of the Greek or Latin Fathers: not of the Latins, becauſe the generouſly interpoſed, and prevented the Pope from pronouncing ſentence of excommunication againſt the King of England, for his frequent outrages on religion (p). After the Synod of Bari was ended, the Pope and Anſelm returned to Rome, where an Ambaſſador from the King of England was arrived, in order to diſprove Anſelm's allegations and complaints againſt his maſter [O]. And, the better to effect his purpoſe, he tried the intereſt of his purſe; and partly by preſents, and partly by promiſes, he bribed the court of Rome to deſert Anſelm (q) [P]. The Archbiſhop, perceiving how matters went, would have returned to Lyons, but the Pope would not part with him; and to ſweeten him after his diſappointment, lodged him in a noble palace, where his Holineſs made him frequent viſits. About that time the Pope having ſummoned a council to ſit at Rome [Q], Anſelm had a very honourable ſeat aſſigned him and his ſucceſſors; this being the firſt time of an Archbiſhop of Canterbury's appearing at a Roman Synod (r). When the Council broke up, Anſelm immediately left Rome, and returned to Lyons, where he was entertained for ſome time by Hugo the Archbiſhop. He ſtaid there till he heard the news of King William's and Pope Urban's death, which happened not long after (s). Henry I., the new King of England, having reſtored the Sees of Canterbury, Wincheſter, and Saliſbury, which had been ſeized by his predeceſſor; Anſelm was ſolicited to return into England; and being come as far as Clugny, an Agent from the King met him with a letter inviting him to return to his archbiſhopric [R]. In this letter the King excuſed himſelf for not ſtaying till Anſelm's return, and being crowned by another Prelate. The Archbiſhop being arrived in England, was received with extraordinary reſpect by the King and the people. And thus far matters went ſmoothly enough. But when it was required of Anſelm, that he ſhould be re-inveſted by the King, and do the cuſtomary homage of his predeceſſors, he refuſed to comply, alledging the canons of the late Synod at Rome about inveſtitures (t) [S]. The King was greatly diſguſted at Anſelm's non-compliance: however, not being well ſettled on the throne, he was unwilling to come to a rupture. It was agreed, therefore, that the diſpute ſhould reſt till the Eaſter following; and in the mean time both parties were to ſend their agents to Rome, to try if they could perſuade the Pope to diſpenſe with the canons of the late Synod in relation to inveſtitures. About this time Anſelm ſummoned a Synod to meet at Lambeth [T], on occaſion of the King's intended marriage with Maud or Matilda, eldeſt daughter of Malcolm King of Scotland.

Greeks excepted againſt their teſtimony, as being friends and parties; nor of the Greeks, becauſe, when they were cited againſt them, they uſed to object againſt the credit and authenticneſs of the copy. Anſelm, therefore, truſting to the goodneſs of the cauſe, took none of theſe auxiliaries into the ſervice, but had recourſe ſolely to the Scriptures, and confuted his adverſaries from thence (16).

[O] The Engliſh Ambaſſador endeavoured to diſprove Anſelm's allegations, and complaints againſt his maſter.] This Miniſter told the Pope, that his maſter was ſurprized at his Holineſs's order for reinſtating Anſelm in his Archbiſhopric, ſince he had poſitively acquainted that Prelate what he muſt expect, in caſe he quitted the realm without his Majeſty's leave. The Pope aſked the Ambaſſador, if he had any thing farther in his inſtructions againſt Anſelm? He anſwered, Nothing. 'Could you 'then (ſaid the Pope) think it worth your while to 'take ſo long and tedious a journey, only to ac'quaint me, that your Primate has been deprived 'of his See for appealing to St. Peter's chair? If 'you have any regard for your maſter, return and 'tell him, that unleſs he will venture the higheſt 'cenſure of the Church, his method will be forth'with to reſtore Anſelm to all his rights and 'properties.' The Ambaſſador being ſhocked with this anſwer, told the Pope, he had ſomething farther to communicate; and deſired a private audience, in which he found means to ſoften his Holineſs, and prevail upon him to relax a little in his demands (17).

(17) Eadmer. ubi ſupra, p. 52.

[P] The Engliſh Ambaſſador bribed the Court of Rome to deſert Anſelm.] This ſtory is modeſtly told by Eadmer (18) in a few words. But William of Malmſbury enlarges with more freedom upon the prevarication of the Court of Rome. He tells us (19), the Pope was under ſome difficulty and irreſolution about the matter; that for ſome time his Holineſs hung in ſuſpence between conſcience and intereſt, but was at laſt overbalanced by the conſideration of a good preſent. And here Malmſbury declaims with a great deal of honeſty and ſatire againſt the prevalency of money; and frankly acknowledges, that it was ſcandalous in a perſon of his Holineſs's ſtation and character to proſtitute his honour and conſcience, and depart from juſtice for the ſake of a little pelf.

[Q] The Pope ſummoned a council to meet at Rome.] When the canons of this council were agreed on, and drawn up, the Pope ordered Reingerius, Biſhop of Lucca, to publiſh them to the aſſembly. This Prelate, after he had gone through part of his commiſſion, ſeemed on a ſudden to be greatly diſturbed; and breaking off the reading of the canons, he cried out: 'What will become of us? We are loading 'the people with new precepts and articles of duty; 'but do not relieve thoſe, who apply to us for pro'tection. The whole world is ſurprized at this con'duct, and complains, that the head of the Church 'does not ſympathize with the members.' Then he expreſsly mentioned Anſelm's caſe, and remonſtrated againſt the delays in doing him juſtice. Here the Pope interpoſed, and deſired him to forbear, with a promiſe that matters ſhould be rectified. Reingerius, being a man of warmth and zeal, replied, 'twas fit it ſhould be ſo; for God would not paſs over the neglect: and when he had ſaid this, he went on with the publication of the canons (20).

[S] Anſelm alledged the canons of the Synod of Rome about inveſtitures.] This Synod excommunicated all lay perſons, who ſhould give inveſtitures for abbies or cathedrals; and all eccleſiaſtics, who ſhould receive inveſtitures from lay hands, or came under the tenure of homage for any eccleſiaſtical promotion, were put under the ſame cenſure (22).

(22) W. Malmſb. ubi ſupra.

[T] Anſelm called a Synod at Lambeth.] The King being generally cenſured for intending to marry the Princeſs Maud, who was ſuppoſed to have embraced a religious life, that Lady applied herſelf upon this occaſion to Archbiſhop Anſelm, and deſired his advice. The Archbiſhop objected the common report to her, and declared, that no motive whatſoever ſhould prevail with him to diſengage her from her vow

Scotland. In this Synod it was determined, that the King might lawfully marry that Princeſs, notwithſtanding ſhe was generally reported to be a Nun, having worn the veil, and had her education in a religious houſe (u). Soon after this marriage, Anſelm was of ſignal ſervice to King Henry againſt his brother the Duke of Normandy [U], who had invaded England, and landed with a formidable army at Portſmouth. For the Archbiſhop not only furniſhed the King with a large body of men, but was very active, likewiſe, in preventing a revolt of the great men from him (w). The agents, ſent by the King and the Archbiſhop to Rome, being returned, brought with them a letter from Pope Paſchal to the King (x), in which his Holineſs abſolutely refuſed to diſpenſe with the canons concerning inveſtitures. The King, on his part, reſolved not to give up what for ſome reigns had paſſed for part of the royal prerogative. And thus the difference was kept on foot between the King and Anſelm. In this diſpute the majority of the Biſhops and temporal nobility were on the Court ſide; and ſome of them were very earneſt with the King, to break entirely with the See of Rome (y). However, it was not thought adviſeable to proceed to an open rupture without trying a farther expedient; and therefore freſh agents were diſpatched by the King to Rome, with inſtructions to offer the Pope this alternative; either to depart from his former declaration, and relax in the point of inveſtitures, or to be content with the baniſhment of Anſelm, and to loſe the obedience of the Engliſh, and the yearly profits accruing from that kingdom. At the ſame time, Anſelm diſpatched two Monks, to inform the Pope of the menaces of the Engliſh Court. But the King's Ambaſſadors could not prevail with the Pope to recede from his declaration; his Holineſs proteſting he would ſooner loſe his life than cancel the decrees of the Holy Fathers (z) [W]: which reſolution he ſignified by letters to the King and Anſelm. Soon after, the King, having convened the great men of the kingdom at London, ſent Anſelm word, that he muſt either comply with the uſages of his father's reign, or quit England. But, the agents diſagreeing in their report of the Pope's anſwer (aa), Anſelm thought proper not to return a poſitive anſwer till farther information. And thus the controverſy ſlept for the preſent (bb). The next year a national Synod was held under Anſelm at St. Peter's Weſtminſter; at which the King and the principal nobility were preſent (cc). The year following the King was pleaſed to relent, and deſire Anſelm to take a journey to Rome, to try if he could perſuade the Pope to relax. Anſelm, at the requeſt of the Biſhops, and the barons, undertook the voyage (dd). At the ſame time, the King diſpatched one William Warelwaſt to Rome. This agent, arriving there before Anſelm, ſolicited for the King his maſter, but to no purpoſe; for the Pope perſiſted in refuſing to grant the King the right of inveſtiture. But, at the ſame time, his Holineſs wrote a very ceremonious letter to the King of England, entreating him to wave the conteſt, and promiſing all imaginable compliance in other matters (ee). Anſelm, having taken leave of the Court of Rome, returned to Lyons, where he received a ſharp and reprimanding letter from a Monk, acquainting him with the lamentable condition of the province of Canterbury [X]. During the Archbiſhop's ſtay at Lyons, the King ſent another embaſſy to Rome, to try if he could prevail with the Pope to bring Anſelm to vow to Almighty God. The Princeſs denied there had been any ſuch engagement, and alledged that, though ſhe had indeed worn a veil, it was againſt her inclination, being forced thereto by her aunt Chriſtian, who had put a piece of black cloth about her head, to prevent her being violated by the Normans. She added, that her father, ſeeing her veiled, broke out into a paſſion, and tore the veil in pieces, proteſting that he deſigned her for marriage, and not for a nunnery. Anſelm thought this caſe too weighty to reſt upon his ſingle judgment, and therefore brought it before the Synod of Lambeth; in which, the truth of the Princeſs's allegations being ſufficiently proved, the aſſembly was of opinion, that the Princeſs Maud was under no neceſſity of being a nun, but might diſpoſe of her perſon as ſhe thought fit. Accordingly that Lady was married to the King. And, to prevent calumny and miſreport, when the wedding was ſolemnized, and a great concourſe of the nobility and people were aſſembled about the church, Anſelm, ſeating himſelf higher than the reſt, gave them an account of what had been decreed in the Synod, and demanded if they had any thing to object to it: upon which they unanimouſly cried out, that the matter was rightly ſettled (23).

(23) Eadmer, ubi ſupra, p. 56, 57, 58.

[U] Anſelm was very ſerviceable to King Henry, againſt his brother the Duke of Normandy.] That Duke, being diſappointed in his expectations from the Engliſh, was contented to ſign an agreement; by which he renounced his pretenſions to the crown, and accepted a yearly penſion of three thouſand marks in lieu of it. And this he did the more readily, becauſe he was well aſſured that Anſelm would excommunicate him for an invader, in caſe he refuſed to comply (24).

(24) Id. ibid. p. 59.

[W] The Pope declared, he would ſooner loſe his life, than cancel the decrees of the Holy Fathers.] It is remarkable, that the agents diſagreed in their report of the Pope's anſwer. The Biſhops ſent by the King declared, that his Holineſs, at a private audience, had given them aſſurance, that, provided the King managed in other points to the ſatisfaction of the Court of Rome, he would indulge his Highneſs in the privilege of inveſtitures, and not excommunicate him for giving Biſhops and Abbots the paſtoral ſtaff: that the reaſon why this favour was not expreſſed in the Bull, was, that it might not come to the notice of other Princes, who would be apt to inſiſt upon the ſame privilege. On the other hand, Anſelm's agents proteſted, that the Pope had given no anſwer by word of mouth in contradiction to his own letters. To this the King's Ambaſſadors replied, that the matter was ſecretly concerted, and without the privity of Anſelm's agents. This diſagreement between the agents occaſioned a diviſion among the great men. Some maintained, that the teſtimony of the Monks ought to be received, and that the Pope's hand and ſeal were not to be queſtioned. Others were of opinion, that the evidence of three Biſhops ought to be taken before that of a ſcroll of parchment blacked over with ink, with a bit of lead at the end of it (25).

(25) Id. ibid. p. 65.

[X] A letter from a Monk, deſcribing the lamentable condition of the province of Canterbury.] This Monk, whoſe name Eadmer does not mention, tells the

to a ſubmiſſion. But the Pope, inſtead of being gained, excommunicated ſome of the Engliſh Court, who had diſſuaded the King from parting with the inveſtitures. However, his Holineſs declined pronouncing any cenſure againſt the King (ff). Anſelm, perceiving the Court of Rome dilatory in its proceedings, removed from Lyons, and made a viſit to the Counteſs Adela, the Conqueror's daughter, at her caſtle in Blois. This lady enquiring into the buſineſs of Anſelm's journey, he told her that, after a great deal of patience and expectation, he muſt now be forced to excommunicate the King of England. The Counteſs was extremely concerned for her brother, and wrote to the Pope to procure an accommodation. The King, who was come into Normandy, hearing that Anſelm deſigned to excommunicate him, deſired his ſiſter to bring him with her into Normandy, with a promiſe of condeſcenſion in ſeveral articles. To this Anſelm agreed, and waited upon the King at a caſtle called L'Aigle, where the King reſtored to him the revenues of the archbiſhopric, but would not permit him to come into England, unleſs he would comply in the affair of the inveſtitures: which Anſelm refuſing to do continued in France, till the matter was once more laid before the Pope (gg). And now the Engliſh Biſhops, who had taken part with the Court againſt Anſelm, began to change their minds, as appears by their letter directed to him in Normandy [Y]. In this letter, after having ſet forth the deplorable ſtate of the Church, they preſs him to come over with all ſpeed, promiſing to ſtand by him, and pay him the regard due to his character: it is ſubſcribed by Gerrard Archbiſhop of York, Robert Biſhop of Cheſter, Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, Ralph Biſhop of Chicheſter, Samſon Biſhop of Worceſter, and William Elect of Wincheſter (hh). Anſelm expreſſed his ſatisfaction at this conduct of the Biſhops, but acquainted them that it was not in his power to return, till he was farther informed of the proceedings of the Court of Rome. In the mean time, being informed, that the King had fined ſome of the clergy for a late breach of the canons [Z], he wrote to his Highneſs to complain of that ſtretch of his prerogative [AA]. At length the Ambaſſadors returned from Rome, A.D. 1106. and brought with them a deciſion more agreeable than the former: for now the Pope thought fit to make ſome advances towards gratifying the King [BB]; and though he would not give up the point of inveſtitures, yet he diſpenſed ſo far as to give the Biſhops and Abbots leave to do homage for their temporalities (ii) [CC]. The King, who the Archbiſhop, 'That all places were over-run 'with violence and injuſtice, that the churches were 'haraſſed and oppreſſed, the poor plundered, and 'the conſecrated virgins violated: that if the Arch-'biſhop had maintained the ancient diſcipline, this 'diſorder had not happened: that his quitting the 'kingdom gave great advantages to the enemies of 'religion: that he, who has undertaken the ma-'nagement of the helm, ought by no means to quit 'the veſſel at the approach of a ſtorm, but keep 'faſter to his poſt than ever: that 'tis poſſible, at 'the great day he may be aſhamed of his exceſſive 'caution, when he ſhall ſee ſo many brave gover-'nors of the Church, who ſtood by their flocks in 'time of danger. How glorious then will be the 'memory of the holy Biſhop St. Ambroſe, who 'maintained the authority of his character to the 'Emperor Theodoſius's face, and refuſed him en-'trance into the church, till he had qualified him-'ſelf by repentance? What change in affairs might 'not ſuch holy zeal, ſuch heroic fortitude produce?' He proceeds to tell the Archbiſhop, 'That the 'blackeſt proſpect of torture and death could not 'have excuſed his withdrawing himſelf. What, 'therefore, could be ſaid, when this was not his 'caſe? His liberty had not been taken from him, 'nor his perſon inſulted: he ſeemed to have been 'frightened out of the kingdom by the menaces of 'a ſingle courtier; and by thus going had left 'open the gates to the enemy, and let in the 'wolves upon the ſheep.' He takes the freedom to acquaint the Archbiſhop, 'That his conduct had 'proved a very unfortunate precedent; that the 'courage of his ſuffragans was ſunk by their Pri-'mate's cowardice. Indeed, what is to be expected, 'when a General quits the field?' He therefore exhorts Anſelm 'to return immediately to his pro-'vince, where he will find a great many perſons 'ready to eſpouſe the intereſt of religion, and ſtand 'by him (26).'

[Y] The letter of the Engliſh Biſhops, directed to Anſelm in Normandy.] This letter is extant in Eadmer (27), and in Mr. Collier's collection of Records, No. 15, at the end of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, Vol. I.

(27) Ubi ſupra, p. 84.

[Z] The King had fined the Clergy for a late breach of the canons.] Eadmer, in enumerating ſeveral grievances relating more particularly to the Church, tells us (28), that the Prieſts and ſecular canons, who had been enjoined celibacy by the late Synod of London, had taken the opportunity of Anſelm's abſence to break through the injunction, and many of them were married. The King, who took every method of collecting money, made his advantage of this behaviour of the clergy, and forced them to fine for the liberty they had taken.

(28) Id. ib p. 83.

[AA] The Archbiſhop —— wrote to the King, to complain of the ſtretch of his prerogative.] In his letter, he remonſtrates, that the Prince's interpoſing ſo far in eccleſiaſtical matters was unprecedented in the Church of God: that the correction of Prieſts for violation of the canons, belonged only to their reſpective Ordinaries. He, therefore, intreats the King not to break in upon the government of the Church, telling him, that the money, raiſed by ſo indefenſible an expedient, would prove unſerviceable to his purpoſe, and endanger his ſoul. Laſtly, he deſires his Highneſs to remember, that he had taken him into his protection, and reſtored him to the profits and privileges of his Archbiſhopric; and that the puniſhing the miſdemeanours of the clergy was a peculiar branch of his juriſdiction; the ſpiritual adminiſtration and authority being more eſſential to his character, than any temporal privilege and property whatever (29).

(29) Id. ibid. p. 85.

[BB] The Pope thought fit to make ſome advances towards gratifying the King.] In a letter, which Pope Paſchal wrote upon this occaſion to Anſelm, he tells him, 'That he imputes the King's tract-'ableneſs and good diſpoſition to the effect of his '(the Archbiſhop's) prayers.' He deſires him 'not to be ſurprized at his condeſcenſions to the 'Engliſh court; that it was only done out of a 'pious motive to recover them from their error, 'and fix them more firm to their duty: that he 'who would lift another up muſt neceſſarily ſtoop 'his own body: that this bending poſture, though 'it may ſeem to tend towards a fall, does by no 'means throw a man off his legs.' His Holineſs therefore 'abſolves thoſe, who lay under excom-'munication about the matter in diſpute, and gives 'Anſelm leave to communicate with ſuch as had 'received inveſtitures from the crown (30).'

(30) Id. ibid. p. 77.

[CC] The Pope would not give up the point of inveſtitures, but diſpenſed ſo far as to give the Biſhops and Abbots leave to do homage for their temporalities.] As who was highly pleaſed with this condeſcenſion in the Pope, ſent immediately to invite Anſelm into England: but the meſſenger finding him ſick, the King himſelf went over into Normandy, and made him a viſit at the abbey of Becc; where all differences between them were perfectly adjuſted. And now Anſelm, being recovered from his ſickneſs, embarked for England, and, landing at Dover, was received with extraordinary marks of welcome. To omit other circumſtances of reſpect, the Queen herſelf travelled before him upon the road, to provide for his better entertainment (kk). From this time very little remarkable happened in the life of this famous Archbiſhop, excepting only his conteſt with Thomas elected Archbiſhop of York, who endeavoured to diſengage himſelf from a dependency upon the See of Canterbury (ll) [DD]. Before the termination of this diſpute, Anſelm died at Canterbury, in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age, and the ſeventeenth of his prelacy, on the twenty firſt of April, A. D. 1109. This great Prelate was author of ſeveral pieces. The largeſt edition of his works is that

As the diſpute concerning the right of inveſtiture is the moſt material circumſtance in the life of Archbiſhop Anſelm, I ſhall here give the reader the ſtate of the queſtion, as it is drawn up by a judicious hiſtorian. 'I begin (ſays our author (31)) with 'laying it down as a fact, which appears to me in-'conteſtable, that from the reign of Charlemagne, 'ſovereign Princes took upon them to give the in-'veſtiture of the greater benefices by the ring and 'paſtoral ſtaff. Gregory VII. was the firſt who en-'deavoured to take from them this right, towards 'the end of the XIth century. The Popes, his 'ſucceſſors, continued the proſecution of this de-'ſign with the ſame zeal. It muſt be allowed, 'that Princes themſelves gave but too frequent 'occaſions to the Popes to cry out againſt the abuſes 'of this prerogative. Under pretence that the 'Biſhops and Abbots could not take poſſeſſion of 'their benefices before they had received the in-'veſtiture of them, they publicly ſold the biſho-'rics and abbeys to the higheſt bidder. I ſay, 'they ſold them: for, though the elections might 'ſeem to be agreeable to the canons, the ſovereigns 'nevertheleſs were maſters of them, ſince they had 'it in their power to refuſe inveſtiture to thoſe 'who were not agreeable to them. By this means 'they were ſufficiently enabled to procure the elec-'tion of thoſe whom they recommended, there be-'ing no eccleſiaſtic who deſired to be a Biſhop or an 'Abbot, without enjoying the temporalities an-'nexed to the benefice. In order, therefore, to be 'choſen, it was neceſſary to have the conſent of the 'Prince; after which the Biſhop or Abbot, even 'before conſecration, received the inveſtiture in 'the manner already mentioned. Beſides that 'ſimony had too often a place in elections made 'after this manner, there was another reaſon which 'ſeemed to juſtify the Popes in their endeavours to 'aboliſh the inveſtitures. This was, that Princes, 'by inveſting eccleſiaſtics in a manner different 'from that which was practiſed with reſpect to the 'laity, and even before their conſecration, ſeemed 'to aſſume the privilege of conferring on them the 'character. This the Popes called a manifeſt 'uſurpation upon the rights of the Church. In-'deed, one cannot but diſcover ſomething like it in 'this practice, on account of the two characters 'which were confounded in the Biſhop elect, 'namely that of a Miniſter of the Church, and that 'of a temporal Lord of lands annexed to the bene-'fice. If the Popes and the Princes had acted fair-'ly, they would carefully have diſtinguiſhed theſe 'two characters: on the contrary, they found their 'reſpective advantages in confounding them. 'Hence Princes got the elections into their power, 'and hence alſo the Popes took occaſion to diſpute 'with Sovereigns the right they were in poſſeſſion 'of. And, therefore, all the conteſts between 'Princes and the Popes upon this ſubject aroſe, 'properly ſpeaking, from this confuſion. The for-'mer ſaid, they could not ſuffer any perſon to 'poſſeſs lands dependent on their crown, without 'having received the inveſtiture thereof from their 'hands. The Popes on their ſide maintained, 'that it was not reaſonable that Princes ſhould in-'terpoſe in elections, or confer a character, which 'it belonged to the Church alone to give. Both 'parties were equally diſtant from the true ſtate of 'the queſtion. It was very poſſible for a man to 'be a Biſhop or an Abbot, without holding lands 'of the crown; in which caſe Princes could pretend 'to nothing. On the other ſide, Princes could re-'ceive no prejudice by the ſpiritual character's 'being conferred without their conſent, ſince they 'had it in their power to take their own precau-'tions, before they put the Prelates in poſſeſſion of 'the temporalities. But it was impoſſible to reduce 'them to this point, in the diſpoſition they were in 'of making no conceſſions on either ſide. Thus 'it plainly appears, that the temperament, which 'Paſchal II. and Henry I. followed, was a very 'reaſonable one, and no ways prejudicial to the 'rights of the Church or the King.'

[DD] He had a conteſt with Thomas, elected Archbiſhop of York, who endeavoured to diſengage himſelf from a dependency on the See of Canterbury.] Thomas, elect of York, not moving for his conſecration at Canterbury ſo ſoon as was expected, Anſelm put him in mind of this delay in a letter, in which he acquainted him, that, according to the canons, a Biſhop's See ought not to be vacant above three months. He enjoins him, therefore, to come to Canterbury, within a time prefixed for that purpoſe; and in caſe he ſhall fail to make his appearance, Anſelm declares, that the juriſdiction of the province of York belongs to himſelf, and that he ſhall manage accordingly (32). Thomas making dilatory excuſes, and ſending an unſatisfactory anſwer, Anſelm wrote to Pope Paſchal to ſtop his Pall, till his Holineſs ſhould be informed by letter, that Thomas had received his conſecration, and made the cuſtomary profeſſion of canonical obedience to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (33). The Pope wrote him an anſwer, and promiſed to ſatisfy his requeſt (34). It ſeems, Thomas and the Chapter of York were in concert to throw off the uſual acknowledgment to the See of Canterbury, and ſet up for an independent province. They conceived the preſent juncture, if rightly managed, very favourable to their deſign. For now Anſelm was grown old, and not likely to live much longer; and, therefore, if Thomas could invent any colourable delays, and put off his conſecration till after Anſelm's death, the point might probably be carried: for it was believed the See of Canterbury would not immediately be filled; and if Thomas was conſecrated during the vacancy, the profeſſion of canonical obedience might be ſlipped, there being no Archbiſhop of Canterbury to demand it of him. Anſelm ſaw through this deſign; and, therefore, finding himſelf near his end, he endeavoured to countermine the Elect of York, and ſecure the rights of his own See to poſterity. To this purpoſe he wrote another letter to Thomas, in which he commands him, in the name of God, not to preſume to execute any part of his epiſcopal office, till he ſhall have returned to his duty, and made the cuſtomary ſubmiſſions to the See of Canterbury. At the ſame time, he wrote to all the Biſhops, enjoining them, under pain of excommunication, not to conſecrate him themſelves, nor communicate with him in caſe he ſhould be conſecrated by any foreign prelate (35). Anſelm died before the termination of this affair. After his death, the Biſhops unanimouſly reſolving to obey his laſt directions, and the King concurring in opinion with them, Thomas thought fit to comply; and having made his ſubmiſſion to the See of Canterbury, was conſecrated Archbiſhop of York. This made the clergy ſay among themſelves, that Anſelm was now become a kind of Guardian Angel to the Church (36).

The second part contains practical and devotional Tracts. The third part takes in Anselm's Letters in four books. We shall give the reader a more particular list of this author's works in the remark [FF], and shall subjoin the learned Mr. Du Pin's judgment concerning them [GG]. As to the character of Archbishop Anselm, it may be partly collected from the circumstances of his life above recited. He has been much praised for the resolution he shewed in the disputes he had with William Rufus and Henry I. Where he believed the rights of the Church, and the interest of Religion concerned, no greatness, no menaces of Princes, nor prospect of danger, could discourage him in the pursuit of his point [HH]. Malmesbury tells us (nn), he was a person of great strictness and self-denial: his temper and sedateness were such, that, after he turned Monk, he never was heard to utter the least reproachful word. This Archbishop was the first who restrained the English clergy from marrying [II]. He was canonized in the reign of Henry VII, at the instance [EE] The first, containing dogmatical tracts, is intitled Monologia.] It is so called, because it is thrown into the form of soliloquy and meditation, and represents a person, who reasons with himself in search of divine truths, and explains them in order as they are discovered. It begins with a treatise concerning the existence of God, of his attributes, and of the Holy Trinity. In this division the author treats, likewise, of the fall of the Devil, of Original Sin, and of the reasons why God created man. He examines, also, the liberty of the will, and shews the consistency of this freedom with the divine Prescience (37).

[GG] M. Du Pin's judgment concerning Anſelm's works.] 'We do not find (ſays that learned critic) 'any eccleſiaſtical writers before St. Anſelm, who 'wrote after ſo ſcholaſtic a manner, ſtarted ſo many 'metaphyſical queſtions, or argued with the appear-'ance of ſo much logic and acuteneſs as he has 'done. He is alſo the firſt, who compoſed long 'prayers in the form of meditations. His letters 'are written in a leſs elaborate ſtyle, neither are 'they ſo correct as his other works. His exhorta-'tions are plain Homilies, interſperſed with a great 'many myſtical notions, in which there is neither 'much rhetoric nor morality. He does not ſeem 'to have been a great maſter in Poſitive Divinity: 'however he had read St. Auguſtin's works, and 'borrowed many principles from them, which he 'makes uſe of in his reaſonings upon ſubjects of 'Divinity (41).'

[HH] No proſpect of danger could diſcourage him from purſuing his point.] This is evident from the whole hiſtory of his life, particularly his conteſt with King William Rufus, about the acknowledging Pope Urban, and with King Henry I., about the right of inveſtitures. As to the former of theſe diſputes, though Fox (42) blames him for his oppoſition to the King, yet Anſelm ſeems to have had the right ſide of the queſtion. For if we conſider the conſtitution of the Engliſh Church in that age, we ſhall find, that the Pope had at leaſt a patriarchal power in England; and conſequently the Engliſh Biſhops were obliged to pay him a ſuitable acknowledgment. This patriarchal power reſulting from the privilege of his See, the King had no right to deprive him of, or to diſcharge Anſelm from acknowledging him under that character of ſuperiority. But though the Archbiſhop was right in the principles upon which he acted in this affair, it is poſſible he might be too obſtinate in other caſes of leſs conſequence; as, in his refuſing to gratify King William Rufus with the payment of a thouſand pounds. Upon the whole, though the prejudices of the age he lived in might miſlead him in ſome points, yet he ſeems to have been a perſon of great probity and conſcience.

[II] Archbiſhop Anſelm was the firſt, who reſtrained the Engliſh clergy from marrying.] This was done in the national Synod held at Weſtminſter, A. D. 1102; the fourth canon of which provides, 'that no Archdeacon, Prieſt, Deacon, or 'Canon, instance of Cardinal Morton, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury (oo). Johannes Sariſburienſis, who wrote the Life of Archbiſhop Anſelm, has recorded ſeveral miracles ſaid to be wrought by him. Particularly he tells us, that a Flemiſh nobleman was cured of a Leproſy by drinking the water, in which Anſelm had waſhed his hands in celebrating the Maſs: that he extinguiſhed fires, calmed tempeſts, and healed diſeaſes, only by making the ſign of the croſs: that he reſcued a hare, which had taken refuge under his horſe's feet, by commanding the dogs not to purſue her any more: that two ſoldiers were cured of an ague, by taſting the crumbs of ſome bread he had been eating: that, by praying to God, he produced a ſpring of excellent water at the very top of a hill, for the relief of certain villagers; and that a ſhip, in which he ſailed, having a large hole in one of her planks, nevertheleſs took in no water ſo long as the holy man was on board. The ſame author tells us, that this holy Archbiſhop continued to work miracles after his death: particularly that a Monk of the church of Canterbury was reſtored to health by paying his devotions at the tomb of St. Anſelm: that one born blind, deaf, and dumb, received ſight, hearing, and ſpeech, by the ſame means: that a ſoldier was cured of a dropſy by winding the Saint's girdle about his body; and that the ſame girdle was ſucceſsfully applied to the aſſiſtance of women in childbirth (pp).

(43) Henr. Hunting. Hiſtor. l. xvii. fol. 217.

[There is, in the preceding article, a favourable colouring given to the whole character and conduct of Anſelm, which the Editor of this part of the preſent edition cannot entirely approve. Anſelm is undoubtedly entitled to ſome diſtinction, as an able man, who had conſiderable learning for the time in which he lived, and who had the merit, ſhall we call it? or the demerit, of contributing to the introduction of that ſcholaſtic method of writing, which was afterwards carried to a moſt ridiculous exceſs. The hiſtory of his life is important, as affording a ſtriking view of the grand object of the diſputes between the Popes and Princes of that age; and he appears to have been a Prelate of integrity and piety, who thought that he was ſupporting a right cauſe. But ſtill it muſt be acknowledged, that he was a bigoted Prieſt, who was inflexibly devoted to the tyranny of the Biſhops of Rome. To ſpeak, as is done in the note [HH], of the Pope's having then a patriarchal power in England, which the King had no right to deprive him of; to aſſert, that the Engliſh Biſhops were obliged to pay him a ſuitable acknowledgment, and that Anſelm had the right ſide of the queſtion, is uſing very improper, we might ſay, ſhameful, language. The power which the Roman Pontiffs claimed, in the affair of inveſtitures, had no foundation in reaſon or equity; and the aſcendancy they had gained in the diſpoſal of eccleſiaſtical preferments, was the reſult of a ſcheme of fraud and arrogance, which had been carried on to the injury of mankind, and in violation of the juſt title of Princes and Magiſtrates, to diſpenſe the promotions of their own dominions. Our Monarchs, therefore, however blameable they might ſometimes be in their perſonal conduct, were certainly juſtifiable in oppoſing ſuch a ſcandalous uſurpation. This is the light in which the matter is repreſented by the beſt hiſtorians. Lord Lyttelton, in his relation of Anſelm's behaviour, makes the following judicious and candid remark upon his character. ' There ' is reaſon to believe, that he was an honeſt and ' pious, but narrow-minded man; who acted purely ' from a miſguided conſcience, according to the ' divinity then taught in the ſchools, which he underſtood better than either the principles of civil ' government, or the conſtitution of England. ' And it grieves one to ſee ſo much ſpirit and ' reſolution ſo ill employed. But it was one of ' the greateſt misfortunes attending the corrupted ' ſtate of religion, in thoſe times, and long afterwards, that piety and virtue were drawn away ' from their natural and proper courſe: ſo that ' men of the beſt diſpoſitions were often made inſtruments of pernicious deſigns; and the Public ' was not only deprived of the benefit which it ' would have derived from their goodneſs, but ' frequently ſuffered by it, in proportion to the ' power with which they were armed (44).' Mr. Hume is leſs favourable to Anſelm's memory. Throughout his well-written hiſtory of the Archbiſhop's diſputes with William Rufus and Henry the Firſt, he treats his oſtentatious humility, and his auſterity of manners, with ſome degree of contempt. Indeed, though we allow Anſelm to have been upright in his intentions, contempt or indignation can ſcarcely be avoided, when we ſee ſo much obſtinacy applied to ſuch unworthy purpoſes. Mr. Hume's reflections upon the circumſtances which enabled the Popes to ſupport their claims, are too ingenious to be omitted. ' The policy of the ' court of Rome has been commonly much admired; ' and men, judging by ſucceſs, have beſtowed the ' higheſt eulogies on that prudence, by which a ' power, from ſuch ſlender beginnings, could advance, without force of arms, to eſtabliſh an univerſal and almoſt abſolute monarchy in Europe. ' But the wiſdom of ſuch a long ſucceſſion of men, who ' filled the papal throne, and who were of ſuch different ages, tempers, and intereſts, is not intelligible, ' and could never have place in nature. The inſtrument, indeed, with which they wrought, the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the people, is ſo groſs an ' engine, of ſuch univerſal prevalence, and ſo little ' liable to accident or diſorder, that it may be ſucceſsful even in the moſt unſkilful hands; and ſcarce ' any indiſcretion can fruſtrate its operations. While ' the court of Rome was openly abandoned to the ' moſt flagrant diſorders, even while it was torn with ' ſchiſms and factions, the power of the church made ' daily a ſenſible progreſs in Europe; and the temerity ' of Gregory and the caution of Paſcal were equally ' fortunate in promoting it. The clergy, feeling ' the neceſſity of protection againſt the violence of ' princes, or vigour of the laws, were well pleaſed to ' adhere to a foreign head, who, being removed from ' the fear of the civil authority, could freely employ the ' power of the whole church in defending their ancient or uſurped properties and privileges, when invaded in any particular country: the monks, deſirous of an independence on their dioceſans, profeſſed ſtill a more devoted attachment to the triple ' crown; and the ſtupid people poſſeſſed no ſcience ' nor reaſon, which they could oppoſe to the moſt exorbitant pretenſions. Nonſenſe paſſed for demonſtration: The moſt criminal means were ſanctified by ' the piety of the end: Treaties were not ſuppoſed ' to be binding where the intereſts of God were concerned: The ancient laws and cuſtoms of ſtates had ' no authority againſt a divine right: Impudent forgeries were received as authentic monuments of antiquity: And the champions of holy church, if ſucceſsful, were celebrated as heroes; if unfortunate, ' were worſhipped as martyrs; and all events thus ' turned out equally to the advantage of clerical ' uſurpations. Paſcal himſelf, the preſent Pope, was, ' in the courſe of this very controverſy concerning ' inveſtitures, involved in circumſtances, and neceſſitated to follow a conduct, which would have ' drawn diſgrace and ruin on any temporal prince, ' that had been ſo unfortunate as to fall into a like ' ſituation. His perſon was ſeized by the Emperor ' Henry V. and he was obliged by a formal treaty, to ' reſign to that monarch the right of granting inveſtitures, for which they had ſo long contended. In ' order to add greater ſolemnity to this agreement, the ' Emperor and Pope communicated together on the ' ſame hoſte; one half of which was given to the ' Prince, the other taken by the Pontiff: The moſt ' tremendous imprecations were publicly denounced ' on either of them who ſhould violate the treaty: ' Yet no ſooner did Paſcal recover his liberty, than ' he recalled all his conceſſions, and pronounced the ' ſentence of excommunication againſt the Emperor, ' who, in the end, was obliged to ſubmit to the terms ' required of him, and to yield up all his pretenſions, ' which he could never recal.'(45) We ſhall add from the the ſame elegant hiſtorian, a fact relative to Anſelm's ſucceſs in decrying a particular mode of dreſs, with which he was diſpleaſed. 'He preached zealouſly 'againſt the long hair and curled locks, which were 'then faſhinonable among the courtiers; he refuſed 'the aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday to thoſe who were ſo 'accoutred; and his authority and eloquence had 'ſuch influence, that the young men univerſally aban-'doned that ornament, and appeared in the cropt hair, 'which was recommended to them by the ſermons of 'the Primate. The noted hiſtorian of Anſelm (Ead-'mer), who was alſo his companion and ſecretary, ce-'lebrates highly this effort of his zeal and piety (46).'

In forming an eſtimate of Anſelm's character, his putting a total ſtop to the marriage of the Engliſh clergy, may be mentioned as a farther inſtance of his abſurd principles. His conduct in this reſpect, though very prejudicial to the State, and highly injurious to the cauſe of real virtue, was probably owing to his miſtaken ideas of purity and chaſtity: but, at the ſame time, it was well calculated to aſſiſt the unjuſt claims of the church of Rome.—As to the miracles attributed to Anſelm, the recital of them may ſerve to ſhew the credulity of the age in which the account of them was written. Were ſuch idle ſtories worthy of being ſeriouſly refuted, it might be obſerved, that they are not related by Eadmer, the friend and contemporary of Anſelm, but by John of Saliſbury, who, perhaps, was not born when the Archbiſhop died. It is certain, that John of Saliſbury's death was ſeventy-two or ſeventy-three years later than the deceaſe of Anſelm (47).] K.

[ANSON (GEORGE*) an eminent ſea commander, and diſtinguiſhed Nobleman, of the eighteenth century, was deſcended from an ancient and reſpectable family, which had long been ſettled in Staffordſhire [A]. He was born at Shugborough manor, in the pariſh of Colwich, in that county, on the 23d of April, 1697; being the third ſon of William Anſon, Eſq; by Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter and co-heir of Robert Carrier, Eſq; of Wirkſworth, in Derbyſhire; another of whoſe daughters, by marrying Sir Thomas Parker, became afterwards Counteſs of Macclesfield, and was mother to the late, and grandmother to the preſent Earl (a). The navy being Mr. Anſon's choice, he went early to ſea; and on the 9th of May 1716, was made ſecond Lieutenant of his Majeſty's ſhip, the Hampſhire, by Sir John Norris, commander in chief of a ſquadron ſent to the Baltic; which promotion was confirmed by the Board of Admiralty (b). In the next year, he was again in the Baltic, in the fleet commanded by Sir George Byng; and, at this time, he had an opportunity, which pleaſed him much, of ſeeing, on the Daniſh ſhore, the illuſtrious Czar Peter of Ruſſia, and the famous Catherine, who was afterwards publicly married by that Prince, and crowned as his Empreſs. On the 15th of March, 1717-18, Mr. Anſon was appointed ſecond Lieutenant of the Montagu, one of the ſhips of Sir George Byng's ſquadron, in the expedition to Sicily; and he was preſent in the celebrated action near that iſland, by which the Spaniſh fleet was effectually deſtroyed, and the deſigns of the King of Spain againſt Sicily received a very conſiderable check (f). On the 19th of June, 1722, he was preferred to be Maſter and Commander of the Weazel ſloop; and, on the firſt of February, 1723-4, he was raiſed to the rank of Poſt Captain, and to the command of the Scarborough man of war. Though it is poſſible that he might derive ſome advantage, in theſe early and ſpeedy promotions, from his connection with the Earl of Macclesfield, then Lord Chancellor of England, yet it can ſcarcely be ſuppoſed that they could have been ſo quickly attained, in a time of peace, if he had not given peculiar proofs of merit in his profeſſion. Soon after his appointment to the Scarborough, he was ordered in her to South Carolina, in which ſtation he continued above three years; and while he reſided in that province, he erected a town, Anſon Bourgh, and gave name to a county, which is ſtill called Anſon County. After his return from his ſettlement in South Carolina, he always ſpoke with ſatisfaction both of that country and its inhabitants. Being commanded home in October 1727, he returned to England in the following ſpring, and was paid off in May 1728. On the 11th of October, in the ſame year, Mr. Anſon was appointed Captain of the Garland man of war, and went out in her to South Carolina; from whence he was ordered back, in December 1729, and the ſhip was put out of commiſſion at Sheerneſs. However, having the good fortune to be well with Lord Torrington and Sir Charles Wager, ſucceſſively firſt Lords of the Admiralty, he did not remain long out of employ; for, on the 19th of May 1731, the command of the Diamond, one of the Downs ſquadeon, was beſtowed upon him; which command he held but about three months, the Diamond being then paid off. On the 25th of January 1731-2, he was again called into public ſervice, and appointed Captain of the Squirrel man of war; in which ſhip he was ordered, in the following April, for South Carolina. This was the third time of his being placed upon that ſtation, and it was probably peculiarly agreeable to him, on account of the property he had acquired, and the ſettlement he had made in the province. Here he continued till the ſpring of the year 1735, when, in conſequence of an order, given in December 1734, he returned to England; and, in the month of June, was paid off at Woolwich (m). It appears, from ſome original letters of Mr. Anſon to the Board of Admiralty, with the ſight of which we have been favoured, that he conducted himſelf, in theſe ſeveral employments, with an ability and diſcretion which gave general ſatisfaction. After his laſt return from South Carolina, we find that he ſtaid at home between two and three years; it being the 9th of December 1737, when he was put into the command of the Centurion. In this ſhip, he was ordered, in the February following, to the coaſt of Guinea; from which ſtation, he returned to his own country, by the courſe of Barbadoes and South Carolina, on the 10th of July 1739 (n). It is evident, from the journal of the Centurion during this period, compared with the inſtructions given to Captain Anſon by the Board of Admiralty, (both of which have obligingly been put into our hands), that he executed, with great prudence and fidelity, the directions of Government; and it is underſtood in the family, that he obliged the French to deſiſt from their attempt to hinder our trade upon that coaſt, without coming to any action, at a time when it would have been very inconvenient to the Britiſh court to have had an open rupture with the court of France.

[A] Family which had long been ſettled in Staffordſhire.] The family of Anſon have been ſeated in Staffordſhire for ſeveral generations, firſt at Dunſton in the pariſh of Penchrich, and then at Shugborough, the manor of which being purchaſed, in James the Firſt's time, by William Anſon, Eſq; he made it his principal reſidence (1). This gentleman was of the ſociety of Lincolns Inn in Queen Elizabeth's reign; and in that of King James, he was an eminent Counſel at Law. Sir William Dugdale ſpeaks of him as having bought two manors in Warwickſhire, of Sir Walter Aſton, Knight of the Bath and Baronent, which he afterwards diſpoſed of to William Cumberford of Tamworth, Eſq; and to Anne his wife (2). He lived to a great age, and writing himſelf, William Anſon, of Shutborough manor, Eſq; declared his laſt Will and Teſtament, on the 10th of May, 1644; in which year he died, leaving for executrix his widow, Joan, daughter of Richard Mitchel, of Olbury, in the county of Warwick, Eſq; (3). William Anſon, Eſq; their ſon and heir, was born in 1628, and married Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas Stafford, of Botham-hall, in the county of Derby, Eſq; By this lady he had had, when he was thirty-five years of age, three daughters, beſides William, his ſon and heir, who was born in 1656. This William, who was the third lord of the manor of Shugborough, had iſſue, beſides George, who is the ſubject of the preſent article, Thomas, his eldeſt ſon, who ſucceed to the family ſeat and eſtate, another ſon who died young, and four daughters, Jennette, Iſabella, Anna, and Johanna. William Anſon, Eſq; died in Auguſt, 1720 (4).

Mr. Anſon's conduct, in his various ſituations and employments, had produced ſo favourable an opinion of his capacity and ſpirit, that when, in the war which broke out with Spain in 1739, it was determined to attack the American ſettlements of the Spaniards in the great Pacific Ocean, and by this means to affect them in their moſt ſenſible parts, he was, from the beginning, fixed upon to be the commander of the fleet which was deſigned for that purpoſe (o). As the hiſtory of this expedition, which laid the foundation of his future fortunes, hath, in conſequence of the excellent account that has been written of it by the late Mr. Robins, and the curious and intereſting nature of the ſubject, been more read than almoſt any other which hath ever appeared, it is not neceſſary to give a detail of it in the preſent article. It is well known, that he departed from St. Helen's on the 18th of September 1740, at the head of a ſquadron conſiſting of five men of war, a ſloop of war, and two victualling ſhips; that he ſtopped firſt at Madeira, then at the iſland of St. Catherine's on the coaſt of Braſil, and next at Port St. Julian in Patagonia; that he encountered prodigious difficulties in doubling Cape Horn; that, in this perilous paſſage, the remainder of his fleet was ſeparated from him, and part of it never joined him again; that, at length, he arrived at the iſland of Juan Fernandes; that from thence he proceeded to Peru, took the town of Paita, anchored a few days at Quibo, ſailed to the coaſt of Mexico, and formed the deſign of intercepting the Acapulco ſhip; that, after ſtopping a while at the harbour of Chequetan, he determined to croſs the Pacific Ocean; that, at laſt, his ſquadron was reduced to his own ſingle ſhip, the Centurion; that he made ſome ſtay at Tinian, one of the Ladrones or Marian Iſlands, from which he went to Macao; that, ſailing back from Macao, in queſt of the Manila Galeon, he had the happineſs of meeting with it, and of taking it, on the 30th of June 1743; that, after this enterprize, he returned to Canton, from whence he embarked to England by the Cape of Good Hope; that, having completed his voyage round the World, he came ſafe to an anchor at Spithead, on the 15th of June 1744; and that he executed the whole of the undertaking with ſingular honour and advantage to himſelf, and the officers and people under him, though, from original errors and defects in the embarkation, and from cauſes in which he was in no wiſe concerned, the grand deſign of the expedition was not fully anſwered (p). If any of our readers ſhould happen to be unacquainted with theſe tranſactions, they will have recourſe to the account of them at large, that has been publiſhed under the name of Mr. Walter; it being only our intention to ſelect ſuch circumſtances as have a more immediate relation to the perſonal character of Mr. Anſon, and which indicate the turn of his mind. As, before he ſet ſail upon the expedition, he took care to furniſh himſelf with the printed journals of the voyages to the South-Seas, and the beſt manuſcript accounts he could procure of all the Spaniſh ſettlements upon the coaſts of Chili, Peru, and Mexico, which he afterwards carefully compared with the examinations of his priſoners, and the information of ſeveral intelligent perſons who fell into his hands (q); ſo, through the whole enterprize, he acted with a remarkable diſcretion, and with a calmneſs which particularly diſtinguiſhes his character. When he was ready to depart from St. Catherine's, and conſidered that his own ſhip might poſſibly be loſt, or diſabled from getting round Cape Horn, he gave ſuch directions to the other commanders, as would have prevented the undertaking's being, even in that caſe, abandoned (r). His humanity was diſplayed at the iſland of Juan Fernandes, in his aſſiſting with his own labour, and obliging the officers, without diſtinction, to give their helping hand, in carrying the ſick ſailors, in their hammocks, to ſhore (s). At the ſame place he ſowed lettuces, carrots, and other garden plants, and ſet, in the woods, a great variety of plumb, apricot, and peach ſtones, for the better accommodation of his countrymen who ſhould hereafter touch there (t) [B]. From a like regard to future navigators, Commodore Anſon was particularly,

[B] He ſowed lettuces, carrots, &c. and ſet, in the woods, a great variety, &c.] Mr. Anſon was afterwards informed that the plumb, apricot, and peach ſtones which had been ſet by him had thriven to a remarkable degree. Some gentlemen, who, in their paſſage from Lima to Old Spain, were brought to England, having procured leave to wait upon Mr. Anſon, to thank him for his generoſity and humanity to his priſoners, ſeveral of whom were their relations, they in caſual diſcourſe with him about his tranſactions in the South Seas, particularly aſked him, if he had not planted a great number of fruit-ſtones, on the iſland of Juan Fernandes; for they told him, that their late navigators had diſcovered great numbers of peach trees, and apricot trees, which being fruits before unobſerved in that place, they concluded them to have been produced from kernels ſet by him (5).

cularly industrious in directing the roads and coasts to be surveyed, and other observations to be made; for he well knew, by his own experience of the want of these materials, of how great consequence they might prove to any British vessels, which, in succeeding times, might be employed in those seas (u) [C]. His integrity and generosity in the treatment of some female prisoners who had fallen into his hands, and his care to prevent their meeting with any degree of rudeness, from a set of sailors who had not seen a woman for nearly a twelvemonth, are greatly to his honour (w). By the wise and proper use which he made of the intelligence he had obtained from some Spanish captures, the Commodore was encouraged to form the design of attacking the town of Paita; and his conduct, in that attack, added much to his reputation. Such was the excellent discipline to which he had accustomed his men, that, in the taking of the town, only one man was found, who was known to have so far neglected his duty as to get drunk (x). After the attack upon Paita, when a spirit of jealousy and envy arose about the distribution of the plunder, he manifested his prudence and equity in allaying this spirit, and his liberality in giving up his own share (y). But there was nothing from which Mr. Anson derived greater personal credit, or which reflected greater glory upon the English nation, than his behaviour to his prisoners in general, and especially to the women before mentioned. This behaviour was so honourable in itself, and so beneficial in its consequences, that it deserves to be particularly noticed (z) [D]. Though his force was rendered very weak by

[C] Which, in succeeding times, might be employed in those seas.] There is no doubt but that late navigators have considerably availed themselves of the lights which have been afforded by the surveys and observations which Mr. Anson took care to have made. A voyage to the Pacific Ocean, and round the world, is become no longer a matter of difficulty, but is undertaken with the greatest safety and pleasure. Much depends, in this respect, on selecting the proper seasons; and it was owing to Commodore Anson's fleet being sent out at a wrong time of the year, that it encountered such prodigious difficulties and dangers in doubling Cape Horn. Great praise is due to government, as well as to the commanders themselves, for the wisdom and success with which the voyages of Commodore Byron, Captain Wallis, Captain Carteret, Captain Furneaux, and Captain Cook have been conducted. But of all the improvements which have been made in the art of navigation, that of preserving the health of the seamen is the most important, and the most deserving of applause. This matter hath been carried, by the good sense and attention of Capt. Cook, to the highest point of perfection of which it seems capable. It is well known what dreadful ravage was occasioned by the scurvy, or at least what was esteemed so (6), among Mr. Anson's men (7). Whereas Capt. Cook, having been absent from England, in the ship Resolution, somewhat above three years, lost in that time, and in all the changes of climate, but four men, and only one of them by sickness (8). However, this affair doth not reflect any discredit or blame upon Commodore Anson. 'In justice to that prudent as well as brave commander, says Sir John Pringle, it must be observed, that the arrangements preparatory to his voyage were not made by himself; that his ship was so deeply laden as not to admit of opening the gunports, except in the calmest weather, for the benefit of air; and that nothing appears to have been neglected by him, for preserving the health of his men, that was then known and practised in the navy (9).'

(6) Sir John Pringle seems to think, that the pestilential kind of distemper, which hath been distinguished by the name of the jail or hospital fever, was combined with the scurvy.

[D] That it deserves to be particularly noticed.] Commodore Anson's conduct to his prisoners makes so shining a part of his history, and is so well related in the voyage, that we shall give the passages concerning it. 'Besides the prize's crew,' says the author, speaking of the Spanish vessel, the Santa Teresa de Jesus, which had lately been taken, 'there 'were on board her ten passengers, consisting of four 'men and three women, who were natives of the 'country, born of Spanish parents, together with 'three black slaves that attended them. The women 'were a mother and her two daughters, the eldest 'about twenty-one, and the youngest about fourteen. 'It is not to be wondered at, that women of these 'years should be excessively alarmed at the falling 'into the hands of an enemy, whom, from the 'former outrages of the Buccaneers, and by the 'artful insinuations of their priests, they had been 'taught to consider as the most terrible and brutal 'of all mankind. These apprehensions too were 'in the present instance exaggerated by the sin'gular beauty of the youngest of the women, and 'the riotous disposition which they might well ex'pect to find in a set of sailors, who had not seen a 'a woman for near a twelvemonth. Full of these 'terrors, the women all hid themselves upon our 'officer's coming on board, and when they were 'found out, it was with great difficulty that he 'could persuade them to approach the light: 'However, he soon satisfied them, by the humani'ty of his conduct, and by his assurances of 'their future security and honourable treatment, 'that they had nothing to fear. Nor were these 'assurances of the officers invalidated in the sequel: 'For the Commodore being informed of the mat'ter, sent directions that they should be continued 'on board their own ship, with the use of the same 'apartments, and with all the other conveniencies 'they had enjoyed before, giving strict orders that 'they should receive no kind of inquietude or 'molestation whatever: And that they might be 'the more certain of having these orders complied 'with, or have the means of complaining, if they 'were not, the Commodore permitted the Pilot, 'who in Spanish ships is generally the second per'son on board, to stay with them, as their guar'dian and protector. The Pilot was particularly 'chosen for this purpose by Mr. Anson, as he seem'ed to be extremely interested in all that concerned 'the women, and had at first declared that he was 'married to the youngest of them; though it after'wards appeared, both from the information of 'the rest of the prisoners, and other circumstances, 'that he asserted this with a view, the better to 'secure them from the insults they expected on 'their first falling into our hands. By this com'passionate and indulgent behaviour of the Com'modore, the consternation of our female prisoners 'entirely subsided, and they continued easy and 'chearful during the whole time they were with us, 'as I shall have occasion to mention more particu'larly hereafter.' After the relation of the taking of Paita, the writer goes on as follows: 'There re'mains still another matter to be related, which, on 'account of the signal honour which our national 'character in those parts has thence received, and the 'reputation which our Commodore in particular has 'thereby acquired, merits a distinct and circumstan'tial discussion. It has been already observed, that 'all the prisoners taken by us in our preceding prizes 'were here put on shore, and discharged; amongst 'whom there were some persons of considerable dis'tinction, especially a youth of about seventeen years 'of age, son of the Vice-President of the Council of 'Chili. As the barbarity of the Buccaneers, and the 'artful use the Ecclesiastics had made of it, had filled 'the natives of those countries with the most ter'rible ideas of the English cruelty; we always 'found our prisoners, on their first coming on board 'us, to be extremely dejected, and under great 'horror and anxiety. Particularly this youth whom 'I last mentioned, having never been from home 'before, lamented his captivity in the most moving 'manner, regretting, in very plaintive terms, his 'parents, his brothers, his sisters, and his native 'country; of all which he was fully persuaded he 'had taken his last farewel, believing that he was 'now devoted, for the remaining part of his life, to by the ſickneſs and death of great numbers of his men, and by the ſeparation or loſs of the larger part of his ſmall ſquadron, we find that he was always intent upon contriving ſome ſcheme or other, by which, if poſſible, the deſign of his expedition might be anſwered (a). When no purpoſe was likely to be effectual, but the taking of the Acapulco ſhip, he purſued that plan with the greateſt ſagacity and perſeverance (b). In no inſtance was the fortitude of his mind more tried, than when the Centurion was driven out to ſea, from the uninhabited iſland of Tinian; himſelf, many of the officers, and part of the crew being left on ſhore. Nevertheleſs, in this gloomy and diſconſolate ſituation, he preſerved his uſual compoſure and ſteadineſs, though he could not be without his ſhare of inward diſquietude. He calmly applied to every meaſure which was likely to keep up the courage of his men, and to facilitate their departure from the iſland. He perſonally engaged in the moſt laborious part of the work which was neceſſary to the conſtructing of a veſſel for this purpoſe; and it was only upon the pleaſing and unexpected news of the return of the Centurion, that, throwing down his axe, he by his joy broke through, for the firſt time, the equable and unvaried character which he had hitherto preſerved (c). Commodore Anſon, when he was at Macao, exerted great ſpirit and addreſs in procuring the neceſſary aid from the Chineſe, for the refitting of his ſhip (d). In the ſcheme of taking the Manila Galeon, and in the actual taking of it, he diſplayed united wiſdom and courage; nor did the accuſtomed calmneſs of his mind forſake him on a moſt trying occaſion; when, in the moment of victory, the Centurion was dangerouſly on fire near the powder-room (e). During his ſubſequent ſtay at Canton, he acted, in all reſpects, with the greateſt ſpirit, and firmly maintained the privileges and honour of the Britiſh flag (f). The perils, with which he had ſo often been threatened, purſued him to the laſt: for on his arrival in England, he found that he had ſailed through the midſt of a French fleet then cruizing in the channel; from which he had the whole time been concealed by a fog. Thus was his expedition finiſhed, when it had laſted three years and nine months; 'after having, by its event,' ſays the writer of 'an abject and cruel ſervitude. Indeed his companions on board, and all the Spaniards that came into our power, had the ſame deſponding opinion of their ſituation. Mr. Anſon conſtantly exerted his utmoſt endeavours to efface theſe terrifying impreſſions they had received of us; always taking care, that as many of the principal people among them as there was room for, ſhould dine at his table by turns; and giving the ſtricteſt orders too, that they ſhould at all times, and in every circumſtance, be treated with the utmoſt decency and humanity. But notwithſtanding this precaution, it was generally obſerved, that the firſt day or two they did not quit their fear, ſuſpecting the gentleneſs of their uſage to be only preparatory to ſome unthought-of calamity. However, being at length convinced of our ſincerity, they grew perfectly eaſy in their ſituation, and remarkably chearful, ſo that it was often diſputable, whether or no they conſidered their being detained by us as a misfortune. For the youth I have above mentioned, who was near two months on board us, had at laſt ſo far conquered his melancholy ſurmiſes, and had taken ſuch an affection to Mr. Anſon, and ſeemed ſo much pleaſed with the manner of life, totally different from all he had ever ſeen before, that it is doubtful to me whether, if his own opinion had been aſked, he would not have preferred a voyage to England in the Centurion, to the being ſet on ſhore at Paita, where he was at liberty to return to his country and friends.

'This conduct of the Commodore to his priſoners, which was continued without interruption or deviation, gave them all the higheſt idea of his humanity and benevolence, and induced them likewiſe (as mankind are fond of forming general opinions) to entertain very favourable thoughts of the whole Engliſh nation. But whatever they might be diſpoſed to think of Mr. Anſon before the capture of the Tereſa, their veneration for him was prodigiouſly increaſed by his conduct towards thoſe women, whom (as I have already mentioned) he took in that veſſel: For the leaving them in the poſſeſſion of their apartments, the ſtrict orders given to prevent all his people on board from approaching them, and the permitting the Pilot to ſtay with them as their guardian, were meaſures that ſeemed ſo different from what might be expected from an enemy and an heretic, that the Spaniards on board, though they had themſelves experienced his beneficence, were ſurprized at this new inſtance of it, and the more ſo, as all this was done without his ever ſeeing the women, though the two daughters were both eſteemed handſome, and the youngeſt was celebrated for her uncommon beauty. The women themſelves too were ſo ſenſible of the obligations they owed him, for the care and attention with which he had protected them, that they abſolutely refuſed to go on ſhore at Paita, till they had been permitted to wait on him on board the Centurion, to return him thanks in perſon. Indeed, all the priſoners left us with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their grateful remembrance of his uncommon treatment. A Jeſuit in particular, whom the Commodore had taken, and who was an Eccleſiaſtic of ſome diſtinction, could not help expreſſing himſelf with great thankfulneſs for the civilities he and his countrymen had found on board, declaring, that he ſhould conſider it as his duty to do Mr. Anſon juſtice at all times; adding, that his uſage of the men priſoners was ſuch as could never be forgot, and ſuch as he could never fail to acknowledge and recite upon all occaſions: But that his behaviour to the women was ſo extraordinary and ſo extremely honourable, that he doubted all the regard due to his own eccleſiaſtical character, would be ſcarcely ſufficient to render it credible. Indeed we were afterwards informed, that he and the reſt of our priſoners had not been ſilent on this head, but had, both at Lima and at other places, given the greateſt encomiums to our Commodore; the Jeſuit in particular, as we were told, having, on his account, interpreted in a lax and hypothetical ſenſe that article of his church, which aſſerts the impoſſibility of heretics being ſaved.

'Nor let it be imagined, that the impreſſions which the Spaniards hence received to our advantage, is a matter of ſmall import; for, not to mention ſeveral of our countrymen who have already felt the good effects of theſe prepoſſeſſions; the Spaniards are a nation, whoſe good opinion of us is doubtleſs of more conſequence than that of all the world beſides: Not only as the commerce we had formerly carried on with them, and perhaps may again hereafter, is ſo extremely valuable; but alſo as the tranſacting it does ſo immediately depend on the honour and good faith of thoſe who are intruſted with its management. However, had no national conveniences attended it, the Commodore's equity and good temper would not leſs have deterred him from all tyranny and cruelty to thoſe, whom the fortune of war had put into his hands. I ſhall only add, that by his conſtant attachment to theſe humane and prudent maxims, he has acquired a diſtinguiſhed reputation amongſt the Creolian Spaniards, which is not confined merely to the coaſt of the South Seas, but is extended through all the Spaniſh ſettlements in America; ſo that his name is frequently to be met with in the mouths of moſt of the Spaniſh inhabitants of that prodigious empire (10).'

his voyage, 'ſtrongly evinced this important truth, That though prudence, intrepidity, 'and perſeverance united, are not exempted from the blows of adverſe fortune; yet, in 'a long ſeries of tranſactions, they uſually riſe ſuperior to its power, and in the end 'rarely fail of proving ſucceſsful (g).

Mr. Anſon, a few days after his return to his own country, was made a Rear Admiral of the Blue; and in a very ſhort time, he was choſen member of parliament for Heydon in Yorkſhire (h). On the 27th of December, 1744, when the Duke of Bedford was appointed firſt Lord of the Admiralty, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners of the Admiralty; and on the 23d of April, in the following year, he was made a Rear Admiral of the White. On the 14th of July 1746, he was raiſed to the rank of Vice Admiral (i). In the latter end of the year 1746, and the beginning of 1747, he commanded the ſquadron in the channel ſervice; and bore the inconveniences of a long and tempeſtuous Winter navigation, with his uſual patience and perſeverance (k). Nothing would have fruſtrated the ſucceſs of this expedition, but the accidental intelligence which was given, by the maſter of a Dutch veſſel, to the Duke of d'Anville's fleet, of Admiral Anſon's ſtation and intention. However, being employed again early in the enſuing ſpring, he had an opportunity of rendering a very ſignal ſervice to his country. Being then on board the Prince George, of ninety guns, with Rear Admiral Warren, in the Devonſhire, and twelve ſhips more under his command, he intercepted, on the third of May (1747) off Cape Finiſterre, a conſiderable fleet, bound from France to the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, and laden with merchandiſe, treaſure, and warlike ſtores; and took ſix men of war, and four Eaſt Indiamen, not one of the enemy's veſſels of war eſcaping [E]. By this ſucceſsful exploit, he defeated the pernicious deſigns of two hoſtile expeditions, made a conſiderable addition to the force and riches of our own kingdom, and thus converted into a public benefit, the intended means of a public calamity. M. On the 13th of June following, his Majeſty King George the Second, in conſideration of Mr. Anſon's eminent ſervices, was pleaſed to raiſe him to the honour of an Engliſh Peerage, by the ſtile and title of Lord Anſon, Baron of Soberton, in the county of Southampton (n); and his Lordſhip made choice of a motto, very happily ſuited to the dangers he had gone through, and the ſucceſſes he had met with, Nil deſperandum (o). Vulcan Fireſhip,	Capt. Pattigrew

'being off Cape Finiſterre, which bore S. E. diſ'tant 24 leagues, fell in with the French fleet, con'ſiſting of 38 ſhips, nine of which ſhortened ſail, and 'were drawing into a line of battle ahead, and the 'reſt of the fleet, which appeared to be under their 'convoy, ſtretched to the weſtward with all the ſail 'they could ſet. Mr. Anſon formed his fleet into a 'line, but obſerving by the motions of the enemy 'that their aim was to gain time, and endeavour to 'eſcape under favour of the night, he made the ſig'nal for the whole fleet to chaſe and engage the ene'my, without any regard to the line of battle. The 'Centurion, Capt. Denis, having got up with the 'ſternmoſt French ſhip about 4 o'clock in the after'noon, began to engage her, upon which two of the 'enemy's largeſt ſhips bore down to her aſſiſtance. 'The Namur, Defiance, and Windſor, being the 'next headmoſt ſhips, ſoon entered into the action, 'and after having diſabled thoſe French ſhips in ſuch 'a manner that the Britiſh ſhips a-ſtern muſt ſoon 'come up with them, they made ſail a-head to pre'vent the van of the enemy from eſcaping, as did 'alſo ſeveral other ſhips of the fleet. The Yarmouth 'and Devonſhire having got up and engaged the 'enemy, and the Prince George being near the In'vincible, and going to fire into her, all the ſhips in 'the enemy's rear ſtruck their colours between 6 and '7 o'clock, as did all thoſe which were in the line 'before night. Vice-Admiral Anſon brought to at 'ſeven, having detached the Monmouth, Yarmouth, 'and Nottingham, to purſue the convoy, who then 'bore W. by S. at about 4 or 5 leagues diſtance, ſo 'that there are hopes of having a very good account 'of them. The Falcon Sloop, which the vice-admiral 'had ſent after the convoy during the action, with 'orders to make ſignals for a guidance to the other 'ſhips, returned to the fleet the next day with the 'Dartmouth Indiaman. The number and quality 'of the ſhips taken from the enemy, as follows, viz.

'The loſs on our ſide was not very conſiderable, 'except that of Capt. Grenville, of the Defiance, 'who was an excellent officer, and whoſe death can'not be ſufficiently lamented. Capt. Boſcawen, of 'the Namur, was wounded in the ſhoulder with a 'muſket ball, but is in a very fair way of recovery.

'The French chef d'Eſcadre, M. de la Jonquiere, 'was ſhot under the blade-bones of both his ſhoulders, 'but it was thought he would recover. One of the 'French captains was killed, and another loſt his 'leg.

'Moſt of our ſhips have ſuffered in their maſts and 'rigging (11).'

of April 1748, he married Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Philip Lord Hardwicke, at that time Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, which Lady died, without iſſue, on the firſt of June 1760 (p) [F]. He had frequently the honour of convoying the late King from England to Holland. The firſt time was in the year 1748; and ever after he conſtantly attended his Majeſty on his going abroad, and on his return to this kingdom (q). On the 12th of July 1749, his Lordſhip was made Vice-Admiral of Great Britain, an appointment that is more of a civil than a military nature; but which, nevertheleſs, is always given to a military man. On the 12th of June 1751, he was preferred to be firſt Commiſſioner of the Admiralty, in the room of the Earl of Sandwich; and, in the years 1752 and 1755, he was one of the Lords Juſtices of the kingdom, during his Majeſty's abſence (r). The ſquadrons fitted out in the laſt-mentioned year, on the proſpect of a war with France, were got ready with ſingular diſpatch, the officers ſent to the ports exerting themſelves in a remarkable manner. That more ſucceſs did not attend them was owing to accidents. Mr. Boſcawen commanded one diviſion of the fleet, and Sir Edward Hawke the other: and both theſe gallant Admirals always ſerved with credit, often with the moſt brilliant ſucceſs. It was the run of the times, inflamed by party writers, to blame Lord Anſon, for not ſending a fleet to relieve Minorca in time, when Port Mahon was beſieged by the Duke of Richlieu; and it was alledged, that when he did ſend one, it was not ſtrong enough. As to his not ſending it ſooner, this was occaſioned, in a great meaſure, by Mr. Boſcawen's ſquadron (on which we depended for a ſupply of ſeamen) not coming in, by ſeveral weeks, ſo early as was expected. And after that, the government was kept in ſuſpenſe, by the alarms of an invaſion, founded on very particular intelligence. With regard to the ſtrength of the fleet, the ableſt ſea-officers (men whoſe judgment no one could diſpute) always thought that the force under Byng was quite ſufficient. It was a match, in numbers, for the French Admiral, and was a ſquadron remarkably well appointed. To this may be added, that neither the time of ſending a fleet, nor the ſtrength of it, depended ſolely upon the firſt Lord of the Admiralty, but muſt have had the concurrent opinion of the whole cabinet. On the 16th of November 1756, Lord Anſon, upon a change in the adminiſtration, reſigned his poſt as firſt Commiſſioner of the Admiralty. A very accurate enquiry was made, in the next ſeſſion of parliament, into the affair of Minorca; and the miniſtry of that time were, by ſeveral reſolutions of the houſe of commons, acquitted of any blame or neglect of duty (*). On the 24th of February 1757, he was made an admiral; and on the ſecond of July, he was again placed at the head of the Admiralty Board, where he continued during the remainder of his life. He came in with his old friends, the Duke of Newcaſtle and the Earl of Hardwicke, [F] Which lady died without iſſue, on the firſt of June, 1760.] Lady Anſon had great benevolence of diſpoſition, and was very charitable. She did many kind offices with her Lord for perſons who ſtood in need of her aſſiſtance. She had a fine taſte in drawing and painting, and there was much vivacity and chearfulneſs in her temper. Her compoſitions in proſe and verſe were remarkable lively and elegant, and her whole conduct and behaviour were diſtinguiſhed by virtue, dignity, and politeneſs. and

and in the moſt honourable manner: for he renewed his ſeat with the concurrence of every individual in the Miniſtry, Mr. Pitt reſuming the Seals as Secretary of State, and with the particular approbation of King George the Second. All the reſt of his conduct, as Firſt Commiſſioner of the Admiralty, was crowned with ſucceſs, under the moſt glorious adminiſtration which this country ever ſaw. The laſt time that Lord Anſon commanded at ſea, was in 1758, to cover the expedition againſt the coaſt of France. Being then Admiral of the White, and having hoiſted his flag on board the Royal George of 100 guns, he ſailed from Spithead, on the firſt of June, with a formidable fleet, Sir Edward Hawke ſerving under him; and by cruizing continually before Breſt, he protected the deſcents which were made that Summer at St. Maloe's, Cherburg, &c. (x). The French fleet not venturing to come out, he kept his own ſquadron and ſeamen in conſtant exerciſe; a thing which, he thought, had been too much diſregarded. On the 30th of July 1761, his Lordſhip was raiſed to the dignity of Admiral and Commander in Chief of the Fleet (y); and in a few days he ſailed from Harwich, in the Charlotte yacht, to convoy her preſent Majeſty to England; whom he landed, after a rough and tedious paſſage, on the ſeventh of September (z). In February 1762, he went to Portſmouth, to accompany the Queen's brother, Prince Charles of Mecklenburgh, and to ſhew him the arſenal, and the fleet which was then upon the point of ſailing, under the command of Sir George Pocock, for the Havanna. Lord Anſon, in attending the Prince, caught a violent cold, that was accompanied with a gouty diſorder, under which he languiſhed two or three months. This cold, at length, ſettled upon his lungs, and was the immediate occaſion of his death (a). He died, at his ſeat at Moor Park, in Hertfordſhire, on the ſixth of June 1762, and was buried in the family vault at Colwich (b). Beſides the other honours we have mentioned, he was a member of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, one of the elder Brethren of the Trinity-houſe, and a Governor of the Charter-houſe (c). He was very aſſiduous at the Admiralty Board, and remarkably quick and ready in making naval diſpoſitions of every kind, and in appropriating the proper ſtrength and proper ſort of ſhips to the different ſervices. He liked to ſee his table filled with the gentlemen of the Navy; and many eminent and valuable men of that profeſſion frequently met there (d). Among the various ſervices, which will render the name of Anſon illuſtrious, his diſcreet and ſucceſsful choice of officers deſerves particularly to be mentioned; as will be allowed by all who recollect, that ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed, as Sir Charles Saunders, Captain Saumarez, Sir Percy Brett, Admiral Keppel, Sir Peter Denis, Admiral Campbell, and others, were either his Lieutenants in the Centurion, or ſerved under him on different occaſions. He may, in general, be ſaid to have been a true friend and patron to men of real merit and capacity in the ſervice. In a late work (e), the Editor of which hath taken very little pains to obtain authentic information concerning the perſons treated of, it is aſſerted 'that Lord Anſon, at home, leſſened his great reputation by a fooliſh 'attachment to gaming; that, having ſeen little of the polite world, he eaſily became 'the dupe of ſharpers in high life, who eaſed him of a conſiderable ſhare of his wealth; 'and that the ridicule he incurred upon theſe occaſions, it is thought, affected his 'ſpirits, and contributed not a little to bring on that decline which ſhortened his days.' But we have the beſt authority for ſaying, that this repreſentation of things is as falſe as it is injurious to his Lordſhip's character. Upon the whole, he neither won nor loſt by gaming; and he made it, like hundreds of others, who paſs uncenſured, his amuſement, rather than his buſineſs. To affirm, that any ridicule affected his ſpirits, is an abſolutely groundleſs aſſertion. The great regard which was ſhewn him, in all the companies he frequented, muſt put his memory above ſuch an aſperſion. Lord Anſon left his whole fortune to his brother, Thomas Anſon, Eſq; who was member of Parliament for Litchfield, and with whom he had always lived in the ſtricteſt friendſhip. This gentleman was well known for his liberal patronage of, and his exquiſite ſkill in the fine arts (*). Upon his deceaſe, the united fortunes of the family devolved to his nephew, by his eldeſt ſiſter, George Adams, Eſq; who hath aſſumed the name of Anſon.] K.

ANTHONY or ANTONY (Dr. Francis), a very learned phyſician and Chemiſt in the latter end of the ſixteenth and the beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries. His father was an eminent Goldſmith in the city of London, and had an employment of conſiderable value in the jewel-office under the reign of Queen Elizabeth (a). This ſon of his was born April 16, 1550; and having been carefully inſtructed in the firſt rudiments of learning while at home, was, about the year 1569, ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he ſtudied with great diligence and ſucceſs, and ſome time in the year 1574 took the degree of Maſter of Arts (b). It appears from his own writings, that he applied himſelf, for many years that he ſtudied in that univerſity, to the theory and practice of chemiſtry, with ſedulous induſtry, and made no ſmall progreſs (c). It is not at all clear from any memoirs that have reached our hands, when he left Cambridge, and came up to London; but it ſeems highly probable, that it was not before he attained the age of forty. He began ſoon after his arrival to publiſh to the world the effects of his chemical ſtudies, and in the year 1598, ſent abroad his firſt treatiſe, concerning the excellency of a medicine drawn from gold (d); but not having taken the neceſſary precautions of addreſſing himſelf to the College of Phyſicians, for their licence, he fell under their diſpleaſure, and being, ſome time in the year 1600, ſummoned before the Preſident and Cenſors, he confeſſed that he had

This cold, at length, ſettled upon his lungs, and was the immediate occaſion of his death (a). He died, at his ſeat at Moor Park, in Hertfordſhire, on the ſixth of June 1762, and was buried in the family vault at Colwich (b). Beſides the other honours we have mentioned, he was a member of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, one of the elder Brethren of the Trinity-houſe, and a Governor of the Charter-houſe (c). He was very aſſiduous at the Admiralty Board, and remarkably quick and ready in making naval diſpoſitions of every kind, and in appropriating the proper ſtrength and proper ſort of ſhips to the different ſervices. He liked to ſee his table filled with the gentlemen of the Navy; and many eminent and valuable men of that profeſſion frequently met there (d). Among the various ſervices, which will render the name of Anſon illuſtrious, his diſcreet and ſucceſsful choice of officers deſerves particularly to be mentioned; as will be allowed by all who recollect, that ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed, as Sir Charles Saunders, Captain Saumarez, Sir Percy Brett, Admiral Keppel, Sir Peter Denis, Admiral Campbell, and others, were either his Lieutenants in the Centurion, or ſerved under him on different occaſions. He may, in general, be ſaid to have been a true friend and patron to men of real merit and capacity in the ſervice. In a late work (e), the Editor of which hath taken very little pains to obtain authentic information concerning the perſons treated of, it is aſſerted 'that Lord Anſon, at home, leſſened his great reputation by a fooliſh 'attachment to gaming; that, having ſeen little of the polite world, he eaſily became 'the dupe of ſharpers in high life, who eaſed him of a conſiderable ſhare of his wealth; 'and that the ridicule he incurred upon theſe occaſions, it is thought, affected his 'ſpirits, and contributed not a little to bring on that decline which ſhortened his days.' But we have the beſt authority for ſaying, that this repreſentation of things is as falſe as it is injurious to his Lordſhip's character. Upon the whole, he neither won nor loſt by gaming; and he made it, like hundreds of others, who paſs uncenſured, his amuſement, rather than his buſineſs. To affirm, that any ridicule affected his ſpirits, is an abſolutely groundleſs aſſertion. The great regard which was ſhewn him, in all the companies he frequented, muſt put his memory above ſuch an aſperſion. Lord Anſon left his whole fortune to his brother, Thomas Anſon, Eſq; who was member of Parliament for Litchfield, and with whom he had always lived in the ſtricteſt friendſhip. This gentleman was well known for his liberal patronage of, and his exquiſite ſkill in the fine arts (*). Upon his deceaſe, the united fortunes of the family devolved to his nephew, by his eldeſt ſiſter, George Adams, Eſq; who hath aſſumed the name of Anſon.] K.

ANTHONY or ANTONY (Dr. Francis), a very learned phyſician and Chemiſt in the latter end of the ſixteenth and the beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries. His father was an eminent Goldſmith in the city of London, and had an employment of conſiderable value in the jewel-office under the reign of Queen Elizabeth (a). This ſon of his was born April 16, 1550; and having been carefully inſtructed in the firſt rudiments of learning while at home, was, about the year 1569, ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he ſtudied with great diligence and ſucceſs, and ſome time in the year 1574 took the degree of Maſter of Arts (b). It appears from his own writings, that he applied himſelf, for many years that he ſtudied in that univerſity, to the theory and practice of chemiſtry, with ſedulous induſtry, and made no ſmall progreſs (c). It is not at all clear from any memoirs that have reached our hands, when he left Cambridge, and came up to London; but it ſeems highly probable, that it was not before he attained the age of forty. He began ſoon after his arrival to publiſh to the world the effects of his chemical ſtudies, and in the year 1598, ſent abroad his firſt treatiſe, concerning the excellency of a medicine drawn from gold (d); but not having taken the neceſſary precautions of addreſſing himſelf to the College of Phyſicians, for their licence, he fell under their diſpleaſure, and being, ſome time in the year 1600, ſummoned before the Preſident and Cenſors, he confeſſed that he had had practiſed phyſic in London for ſomewhat more than ſix months, and had cured twenty perſons, or more, of ſeveral diſeaſes, to whom he had given purging and vomiting phyſic, and to others, a diaphoretic medicine, prepared from gold and mercury, as their caſe required; but withal acknowledged that he had no licence, and being examined in ſeveral parts of phyſic, and found inexpert, he was interdicted practice. About a month after, he was committed to the Counter-priſon, and fined in the ſum of five pounds propter illicitam Praxin, that is, for preſcribing phyſic againſt the ſtatutes and privilege of the College; but upon his application to the Lord Chief Juſtice, he was ſet at liberty, which gave ſo great umbrage to the College, that the Preſident and one of the Cenſors waited on the Chief Juſtice, to requeſt his favour in defending and preſerving the College privileges; upon which Mr. Anthony ſubmitted himſelf, promiſed to pay his fine, and was forbidden practice (e). But not long after he was accuſed again for practiſing phyſic, and upon his own confeſſion was fined five pounds; which fine, on his refuſing to pay it, was increaſed to twenty pounds, and he committed to priſon till he paid it; neither were the College ſatisfied with this, but commenced a ſuit at law againſt him in the name of the Queen, as well as of the College, in which they prevailed, and obtained judgment againſt him; but after ſome time, were prevailed upon by the intreaties of his wife, to remit their ſhare of the penalty, as appears by their warrant to the keeper of the priſon for his diſcharge, dated under the College ſeal, the ſixth of Auguſt 1602 (f). After his releaſe, he ſeems to have met with conſiderable patrons, who were able to protect him from the authority of the College; and though Dr. Goodall tells us, that this learned ſociety thought him weak and ignorant in phyſic, yet it ſeems there were other learned bodies of another opinion; ſince after all theſe cenſures, and being toſſed about from priſon to priſon, he became Doctor of Phyſic in our own univerſities (g). This did not hinder new complaints being brought againſt him, by Dr. Taylor, and another Phyſician, who grounded their proceedings chiefly on his giving a certain noſtrum, which he called Aurum potabile, or potable gold, and which he repreſented to the world, as an univerſal medicine. There were at this time alſo ſeveral things written againſt him, and his manner of practice, inſinuating that he was very inaccurate in his method of philoſophizing, that the virtues of metals as to phyſical uſes were very uncertain, and that the boaſted effects of his medicine were deſtitute of proof. Dr. Anthony, upon this, publiſhed a very learned and modeſt defence of himſelf and his Aurum potabile in Latin, written with great decency, much ſkill in chemiſtry, and with an apparent knowledge in the theory and hiſtory of phyſic. This book, which he publiſhed in 1610 [A], was printed at the univerſity preſs of Cambridge, and had a very

[A] Which he publiſhed in 1610.] The title of this book at large runs thus, Medicinæ Chymicæ, et veri potabilis Auri aſſertio, ex Lucubrationibus Fra. Anthonii Londinenſis, in Medicina Doctoris. Cantabrigiæ, ex officina Cantrello Legge celeberrimæ Academiæ Typographi. 4to id eſt, A Defence of Chemical Phyſick in the true potable Gold made by Francis Anthony of London, Doctor in Phyſic. After the Dedication there follows a very ſhort Preface, wherein the author tells his readers, that after inexpreſſible labour, watching, and expence, he had, through the bleſſing of God, attained all he ſought for in his enquiries. But now when he ſhould have reaped the fruits of his labour, he complains that ſome envious perſon had ſown tares with his wheat, whence he was under a neceſſity of writing this apologetical diſcourſe, wherein his intention was to prove, that himſelf was no impoſtor, and that there were both truth and certainty in that ſcience, which had particularly engroſſed his ſtudies. This treatiſe is but very ſhort, but withal very methodical, and extremely fit to remove thoſe prejudices which his enemies had very induſtriouſly infuſed into the minds of the learned, for chiefly to them this Latin diſcourſe related. It is divided into ſeven chapters. In the firſt he enquires whether there be ſuch a thing as potable Gold? In this chapter he diſplays his great reading, and perfect acquaintance with the writings of the moſt eminent Philoſophers, Phyſicians, and Chemiſts. He cites from their own works their teſtimonies pro and con in this matter, and in the end concludes from their concurring ſentiments (under certain reſtrictions), That there are very great virtues in metals, and that there may poſſibly be diſcovered an aurum potabile, or potable Gold, of excellent uſe in medicine. In the ſecond chapter he endeavours to prove in the rational way, that there really are great virtues both for preſerving health and curing diſeaſes in the mineral kingdom. The third chapter explains the ſuperior virtues of gold. In this chapter alſo he obviates an objection, which he ſuppoſes might be raiſed from the extravagant promiſes of the Spargyric Philoſophers, obſerving juſtly, that lyes are not to prejudice the truth, and that though many may have failed in their operations on this metal, or may have boaſted of more than they could perform; yet this is no proof that others might not arrive at what they ſought, or might not make diſcoveries which theſe men had no acquaintance with. In the fourth chapter he treats of the great myſtery of diſſolving and diſtilling Gold. This is the moſt laboured part of the treatiſe, and herein the author very fairly and accurately relates the whole proceſs of his aurum potabile, concealing only the method by which it is diſſolved, and in which he aſſures us, he made uſe of no corroſive liquors, whence all thoſe miſchievous conſequences flow, which have juſtly brought many metalline preparations into diſrepute. After all he affirms, that this medicine is a kind of extract or honey of gold, capable of being diſſolved in any liquor whatſoever, whence he thinks it may juſtly be ſtiled potable. Here again he mentions the common objection, that there is an affinity between the aurum potabile and the Philoſopher's Stone, whence the diſcovering of either is judged to be impracticable. In anſwer to this, he does not deny the tranſmutation of metals, but he ſhews that there is a real diſtinction between the operation of which he ſpeaks, and the ſo much talked of tranſmuting powder or Philoſopher's Stone, and that the poſſibility or impoſſibility of finding the one, doth not either infer or conclude the poſſibility or impoſſibility of finding the other. The fifth chapter is ſpent in offers to his adverſaries of ſhewing the whole operation to proper and unſuſpected witneſſes. This he preſumes will take away all doubts and jealouſies, and ſilence all ſuſpicions and evil inſinuations. In the ſixth chapter he labours to prove, That aurum potabile may well be called the Univerſal Medicine. He deſcribes its manner of acting, its power of preſerving health, of cheriſhing the natural heat, comforting the bowels, invigorating the blood, promoting ſecretions and evacuations, after which, he ſhows how it acts in aſſiſting nature to free the human body from diſeaſes. The laſt chapter enumerates the ſeveral diſtempers which this aurum potabile cures. Such as frequent and dangerous vomitings, all ſorts of fluxes, ſtoppages of urine and diabetes, putrid and epidemic fevers; nay, even the plague itſelf, as he aſſerts to have been demonſtrated by experience in the Plague which depopulated the city of London in the year 1602. He alſo inſiſts on its curing palſies, and aſſures us that though it be an anodyne, yet it is without any ſtupifying quality. He then adds four certificates, the firſt is ſigned by Thomas (it ſhould be George) Lewkner, a very florid dedication to King James prefixed. He, likewiſe, annexed ſuch certificates of cures, under the hands of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, and ſome too of the faculty, that it very plainly appeared, he did not by any means deſerve to be treated as an ignorant empiric, or a mere pretender to chemiſtry. His book, however, was quickly anſwered, and the controverſy about aurum potabile grew ſo warm (b), that he was obliged to publiſh another apology in the Engliſh language, which was alſo tranſlated into Latin, and is ſtill in great eſteem abroad (i); yet here at home it was far enough from anſwering the Doctor's expectation, for it did not at all abate the oppoſition formed againſt his practice by the Faculty, or allay that bitterneſs with which his opponents treated his arguments and writings [B]. But, conſidered in another light, it proved very advantageous to him; for it procured the general good-will of ordinary readers, and contributed exceedingly to ſupport and extend his practice, notwithſtanding all the pains taken to decry it. Yet what chiefly contributed to maintain his own reputation, and thereby reflected credit on his medicine, was his unblemiſhed character in Lewkner, Doctor of Phyſic (1). It relates to a cure performed on the Doctor's daughter-in-law; by the Biſhop of Wincheſter's recommending the aurum potabile. She had been long in a declining way, and at the time the aurum potabile was exhibited in convulſions; yet in the ſpace of half an hour, all theſe extraordinary ſymptoms ceaſed, and ſhe was able to eat fleſh, which in the ſpace of a month ſhe had not taſted. The ſecond is dated at Barkhamſtead, the 13th of Auguſt, 1609, and is ſubſcribed H. Cary. In it we are told, that a new diſeaſe had then lately ſhewed itſelf in Hertfordſhire, which occaſioned ſuch pains in the head, ſtomach, and bones, as threw the patient into a kind of phrenſy, but upon giving a ſmall quantity of the aurum potabile, the ſymptoms ceaſed, or if it was given in time, they were prevented. From this letter we learn the price of the medicine, which was five ſhillings an ounce. The third is ſubſcribed by Walter Haſtings, it is dated December 10, 1609, from Kirby. The laſt is from Lewis Lewkner, whom I take to have been Sir Lewis Lewkner, brother to Dr. George Lewkner (2): It is dated January the 7th, the ſame year with the reſt, and contains an account of a wonderful cure performed on the Counteſs of Dorcheſter. This our author's book was anſwered the next year after it was publiſhed, by Dr. Matthew Gwinne, of the College of Phyſicians, London. The title of his work ran thus, Aurum non Aurum, ſive Adverſaria in aſſertorem Chymiæ, ſed veræ Medicinæ deſertorem Franciſcum Anthonium. Lond. 1611. 4to. i. e. Gold not Gold, or remarks on the Treatiſe written by Francis Anthony, a Defender of Chymiſtry, but a deſerter of True Phyſic (3). Beſides this book of Dr. Gwinne's, there were other treatiſes written by the learned againſt Dr. Anthony's diſcourſe on his aurum potabile. Amongſt the reſt Dr. John Cotta, of whom we ſhall make large mention in the next note, wrote a full and direct anſwer, which, by the perſuaſion of our author's friends, he was prevailed upon to lay aſide, though on the reviving of the diſpute it was afterwards publiſhed (4).

[B] That bitterneſs with which his opponents treated his arguments and writings.] The Engliſh Treatiſe publiſhed by Dr. Anthony, was called an Apology in defence of his Medicine, ſtiled Aurum Potabile, Lond. 1616, 4to. In this treatiſe was involved moſt of the arguments printed in the Latin diſcourſe, but with great variations, and ſome additions, particularly in the rational proofs of the univerſality of this medicine. For inſtance, he obſerves that the very beſt Phyſicians allow to certain medicines ſeveral and ſeparate virtues, whence he would conclude, that it is poſſible there may be a medicine having ſtill more virtues than any they are acquainted with; nay, which may indeed have them all. He obſerves farther, That all diſeaſes are no more than ſo many perturbations of the natural temper of the human frame, and therefore, if any medicine can be contrived of ſo friendly a nature to the temperament of the human body, as to ſupport it when taken in health, and aſſiſt in reſtoring it if altered by accident, then will this medicine deſerve to be ſtiled univerſal. A third reaſon he offers, is from the cordial nature of gold, which he ſupports from the authorities of various eminent writers, and from the known and undeniable qualities of his potable gold. Many other things he ſays of the ſame kind, and in the cloſe, adds a much larger collection of certificates of great cures. Amongſt theſe there are two, which ſeem to bear a little hard on one Dr. Cotta, a Phyſician at Northampton, in as much as they ſay, That a patient of his, Sir William Samuel, had been cured by aurum potabile, after he had been a long time under Dr. Cotta's care, and had by his directions taken a great deal of phyſic. This Doctor being naturally a warm man, and having a ready wit, no ſooner ſaw this Apology attended with theſe certificates, but he ſet pen to paper, in order to vindicate himſelf in his practice. Whoever reads Dr. Cotta's writings, will acknowledge the juſtneſs of the character here given him, and yet this angry gentleman did not immediately ſend abroad his performance, as might naturally have been expected from a man of his temper. He finiſhed his treatiſe in 1616, the ſame year that Dr. Anthony publiſhed his Apology. He then ſhewed it to ſome Doctors at London, from whence he ſent it to Oxford to be printed, with a dedication prefixed, to the Gentlemen of the Faculty in that univerſity. But Dr. Anthony's friends applying themſelves to Dr. Cotta, and aſſuring him, that he ſhould receive full ſatisfaction for the injury ſuppoſed to have been done to his character as a Phyſician, the work was ſtayed at the preſs, and a treaty of accommodation was ſet on foot. It appears to have laſted about ſeven years, and then the quarrel broke out afreſh. Upon this Dr. Cotta publiſhed his long conſidered piece, under the following title, Cotta contra Antonium, or an Ant-Antony, or an Ant-Apology, manifeſting Dr. Anthony his Apology for Aurum potabile, in true and equal balance of right reaſon to be falſe and counterfeit, by John Cotta, Doctor in Phyſic. At Oxford, printed by John Lichfield and James Short, for Henry Cripps, Anno Dom. 1623, 4to. This work conſiſts of ten chapters, is written in a paſſionate, waſpiſh ſtile, embroidered with variety of quotations, and interſperſed both with Latin and Engliſh verſes. Here we find great pains taken to refute Dr Anthony's reaſons, to enervate his proofs, and to draw both the credit of the medicine and of the phyſician into queſtion. As this anſwer was publiſhed in the very year Dr. Anthony died, it could not be replied to. However, there is no reaſon to think that it much prejudiced the reputation of the Aurum potabile, the whole being rather a play upon words, and a diſplay of what its author thought wit, than a clear and intelligible anſwer to the book which Dr. Anthony had publiſhed. Beſides, Dr. Cotta requires what was very unreaſonable, a diſcovery of the diſſolving liquor, wherein lay the whole ſecret, otherwiſe, he ſaid, it would not be plain, that no corroſive ingredient were uſed; whereas Dr. Anthony noted, that this might be eaſily known from the effects of the medicine. Beſides, the pains taken, as Dr. Cotta confeſſes, by ſome worthy and eminent Doctors of London, and ſome illuſtrious and learned Doctors of Oxford, to hinder his treatiſe from being publiſhed, muſt have flowed, either from a ſenſe of Dr. Anthony's being in the right, or from an apprehenſion that this piece would not prove him in the wrong, either of which deſtroys the credit of this cenſure. On the whole, we may reſt ſatisfied, that the grand objection about the diſſolving liquor, ought not to have any great weight. The following note will ſhew, that there really is ſuch a liquor, and that Dr. Anthony's might be a uſeful, nay, and an excellent medicine, notwithſtanding all that Cotta and his other adverſaries ſaid againſt it. Though on the other hand, it is highly likely, that the inventor and his party, carried the thing too far; however, between them both, the medicine ſeems now to be loſt, though this article will remain a proof, That Dr Anthony firſt aſſerted, the poſſibility of making an Aurum potabile in England.

private life. For our Dr. Anthony was a man of unaffected piety, untainted probity, of eaſy addreſs, great modeſty, and boundleſs charity; which procured him many friends, and left it not in the power of his enemies to attack any part of his conduct, except that of diſpenſing a medicine, of which they had no opinion (k). It is not either in our inclination, or agreeable to the deſign of this work, to enter deeply into this controverſy; but it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that though much has been ſaid to diſcredit the uſe of gold in medicine, yet ſome very able and ingenious men have written very plauſibly in ſupport of thoſe principles on which Dr. Anthony's practice was founded; an inſtance of which we ſhall give in the notes, from a deſervedly admired, and altogether unſuſpected author [C]. It is very natural for the curioſity of the world to be raiſed by the high pretences of chemical writers, who at the ſame time affect a very myſterious ſecrecy, for which reaſon, it will not be thought improper, ſince it ſo happens that we have it in our power, to reveal this boaſted medicine, and give the true proceſs of our author's Aurum potabile, which is accordingly placed in the notes [D]. The age in which Dr. Anthony

[C] A deſervedly admired and altogether unſuſpected author.] This author is the famous Robert Boyle, Eſq; who ſpeaking of certain preparations from gold, that were made by two foreign Phyſicians, proceeds thus (5): 'Though I have been long prejudiced 'againſt the pretended Aurum potabile, and other 'boaſted peparations of gold, for moſt of which I 'have ſtill no great eſteem; yet I ſaw ſuch extraordinary and ſurpriſing effects from the tincture of 'gold I ſpeak of, upon perſons of great note, with 'whom I was particularly acquainted, both before 'they fell deſperately ſick, and after their ſtrange 'recovery, that I could not but change my opinion 'for a very favourable one, as to ſome preparations 'of gold. But though this ſimple medicine can only 'be made in ſmall quantities, and that too not without a great deal of pains and time, I can ſpeak 'thus circumſtantially of it, becauſe by the kindneſs 'of the artiſts, and the pains I had beſtowed in working upon the ſame ſubject they uſe for their menſtruum, I ſo far knew and partly ſaw the preparation of it, as to apply what has been ſaid to the 'preſent occaſion. There is here but a ſingle ingredient aſſociated to the gold, and that comes from 'above, and is reputed one of the ſimpleſt bodies in 'nature, two or three ounces of which may be taken 'altogether unprepared without the leaſt inconvenience. Yet the doſe of this almoſt inſipid medicine 'that was given to one old courtier in a violent apoplexy, after other remedies had by ſkilful men been 'uſed in vain, was but ſix or eight drops. In another very antient and corpulent perſon the doſe was 'greater; the tincture being then more unripe and 'diluted: But the effect was as ſudden, though the 'patient were not bled; and though there was not in 'either of theſe caſes any remarkably ſenſible evacuation made. The two perſons thus recovered are 'yet alive. The ſame medicine a while after ſaved 'the life of another gentleman whom I knew, that 'having lain above twenty-two days ſick of an ill-conditioned fever, was condemned by three phyſicians; one whereof told me, That he could not 'out-live the next morning; yet upon taking a large 'doſe of this tincture he was preſently relieved; and 'from that time found a ſenſible amendment, and 'afterwards recovered his health, which he now enjoys, 'though he was then reputed to be fourſcore years old. 'I could relate ſome other odd effects of this remedy; 'but the preſent may ſuffice to alleviate a prejudice 'againſt medicines, made of ſo fixed and ſuppoſed unalterable a metal as gold.'

[D] Accordingly placed in the notes.] This account of Dr. Francis Anthony's method of making his aurum potabile was tranſcribed from his own manuſcript, which was once in the poſſeſſion of a Chemiſt well known to the author of this life from whom he had it. The ſecret was long in Dr. Anthony's family, and very beneficial to them; but in all probability loſt its credit by being given in too great doſes, or by unſkilful hands. The reader hath in this note, the whole of Dr. Anthony's receipt without the ſmalleſt alteration or omiſſion.

'There ſeems to be no reaſon at all, why we 'ſhould imagine the mineral kingdom leſs uſeful to 'mankind than the vegetable or animal, and ſuch as 'have treated our doctrine with contempt, have had 'a large ſhare of that credulity, which they imputed 'to others. The ſulphurs of metals, if it be poſſible 'to extract them, muſt be very efficacious for medicinal purpoſes, becauſe we ſee them frequently 'produce very deadly and dangerous conſequences 'when roughly treated. The vigour of ſuch preparations when rightly directed, will be proportionate 'to the force of their poiſons when not artificially 'managed. But we are not only taught this by the 'light of reaſon, and the authority of Spargyric philoſophers. Experience has ſhewn us, that out of lead 'many profitable medicines are made, more out of 'iron, and from copper, or vitriol which is but the ruſt 'of copper, moſt of all; I mean moſt of all that are 'in common uſe. If from moſt or from all other 'metals medicines are made, why ſhould it appear 'ſo ſtrange, that we attempt ſomething of the ſame 'kind from gold; or what reaſon is there to conceit, 'that all the learned and great men who have written 'ſo much, and in ſuch ſtrong terms of the virtues of 'gold, ſhould be either cheated themſelves or intend 'to cheat others?

'According to the ableſt writers on theſe ſubjects, 'the great difficulty in making gold uſeful in medicine, 'conſiſts in opening it to ſuch a degree, as that its ſulphur may become active, and work upon the humours 'in the human body. To open it there are required a 'liquor and a ſalt which together compoſe the menſtruum. Both theſe may be prepared after the following manner.

The Philoſophic Vinegar.

'Take 6 gallons of the ſtrongeſt red wine vinegar, 'and ſet as many ſtills at work at a time as your 'Balneum will hold. Throw away the firſt pint that 'comes over, waſh and wipe the Still, and then put 'in that which was diſtilled, putting away always the 'firſt pint for 5 times, ſo out of a gallon you ſhall have '3 pints, and out of the whole 6 gallons 10 quarts of 'ſpirit of vinegar, which keep in glaſs bottles well 'corked with a leather over it.

The Philoſophic Salt.

'Take an iron pan, like a dripping pan, and having made it red hot, put into it as much as you 'will of block-tin, and ſtir it continually, until it 'turns to a kind of aſhes or calx, and keep the fire 'up to a good height all the time, which may be 'half a day or fifteen hours, ſome of theſe aſhes will 'look red, which is a ſign the operation is well performed. Theſe aſhes thus obtained keep in a glaſs 'cloſe covered.

The Proceſs for diſſolving Gold.

'Take 4 ounces of theſe aſhes, and of the ſpirit 'of vinegar 3 pints, put them in a glaſs like an urinal, and let the aſhes be put in firſt. Lute the 'veſſel, ſet it in a hot bath for 10 days, then take 'it out and ſet it to cool, ſhaking it every 2 hours, 'and in three days all the dregs will fall to the 'bottom. Let that which is clear be drawn off into 'a glaſs baſon by 2 or 3 woollen threads, then diſtill it; to this diſtilled water put 4 ounces of freſh 'aſhes, put alſo a quart of ſpirit of vinegar on the 'firſt aſhes; lute the glaſs as before, ſet it in a hot 'bath, and let it digeſt 10 days, filtre this and diſtil 'as before; thirdly, put on that aſhes a pint of ſpirit 'of vinegar, ſet it in the hot bath 10 days, filtre and 'diſtil it, after the third infuſion throw away the 'aſhes. Take this diſtilled water, pour it on freſh 'aſhes, keeping the weight and order in fuſions, filterings, and diſtillations 7 times, then the ſpirit will 'be well impregnated with the ſalt and you have the 'menſtruum ſought.

'Take an ounce of pure gold in the ingot, file it 'into ſmall duſt, put it into a crucible with as much white

Anthony flouriſhed was very favourable to his notions, ſince chemiſtry was then full as much admired, though perhaps not ſo well underſtood as at preſent. He had, therefore, a very extenſive and beneficial practice, which enabled him to live hoſpitably at his houſe in Bartholomew-Cloſe, and to be very liberal in his alms to the poor. He died on the twenty-ſixth of May, 1623, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age (l), and was buried in the church of St. Bartholomew the Great, in the iſle which joins to the north ſide of the chancel, where a handſome monument has been erected to his memory, with a very remarkable inſcription (m) [E]. Our author was twice married, and by his laſt wife, whoſe name was Elizabeth, he had two ſons, John and Charles, both Phyſicians; the former ſold his father's Aurum potabile, and lived by it very handſomely, the latter ſettled in the town of Bedford, where he attained the character of a learned, honeſt, and induſtrious man in his profeſſion (n).

ARABELLA (STUART), commonly called the Lady Arabella, ſo often talked of for a Queen, that cuſtom ſeems to have given her a right to an article in this manner under her Chriſtian name, as that by which our hiſtorians diſtinguiſh her. She was the daughter of Charles Stuart, Earl of Lenox, who was younger brother to Henry Lord Darnley, father to King James VI. of Scotland, and Firſt of England; by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Cavendiſh, Knt. (a) She was born as near as can be computed, in the year 1577, and educated at London, under the eye of the old Counteſs of Lenox, her grand-mother. She was far from being either beautiful in her perſon, or from being diſtinguiſhed by any extraordinary qualities of mind (b), and yet ſhe met with many admirers, on account of her royal deſcent, and near relation to the Crown of England [A]. Her father dying in the year 1579, and leaving her thereby ſole heireſs, as ſome underſtood, of the Houſe of Lenox, ſeveral matches were thought of for her at home and abroad (c). Her couſin, King James, inclined to have married her to Lord Eſme Stuart, whom he had created Duke of Lenox, and whom before his marriage he conſidered as his heir; but this match was prevented by Queen Elizabeth, though it was certainly a very fit one in all reſpects (d) [B]. As the Engliſh ſucceſſion was at [A] Royal deſcent and near relation to the Crown of England.] In this note we ſhall inform the reader, how this Lady ſtood allied to both the Royal Families. In the firſt place it muſt be obſerved, that the Earls of Lenox, of the name of Stuart, were deſcended from Walter, the ſecond of that name, High-Steward of Scotland, anceſtor alſo to the Royal Family. Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lenox, in the reign of King James V. of Scotland, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the French ſervice in Italy, where he gained great reputation. Coming into Scotland after that King's death, he, through the intrigues of Cardinal Beaton, came to be ſo embarraſſed with thoſe who had the adminiſtration of affairs at home, and was alſo upon ſuch bad terms with the houſe of Guiſe, who governed all in France, that he found himſelf obliged to retire into England in the year 1543, and to put himſelf under the protection of King Henry VIII, who afforded him a moſt kind and gracious reception, and ſome time afterwards married him to his niece, Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to Margaret Queen of Scotland, by Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, her ſecond huſband. By this Lady Margaret Douglas, Matthew Earl of Lenox had two ſons, Henry, Lord Darnley, father to James VI. King of Scotland, who was murdered in the ſaid Earl's life-time, and Charles, who, on the death of Matthew, Earl of Lenox, in 1571, ſucceeded him in his title, and who dying in 1576, in the 21ſt year of his age, left behind him this Lady Arabella, or rather Arbella his only child (1). Thus it appears, that by her father's ſide ſhe was firſt couſin to King James VI., and nearly allied to Queen Elizabeth, as being deſcended in the fourth degree from Henry VII., grandfather to the ſaid Queen.

[B] A very fit one in all reſpects.] The perſon propoſed by King James for the huſband of this young Lady, was her couſin, being the ſon of John, Lord Aubigny (2), brother to Matthew, Earl of Lenox, grandfather to the Lady Arabella. It is true, the title at this time very problematical, the great powers on the Continent formed many deſigns about it, and thought of many huſbands for the Lady Arabella, ſuch as the Duke of Savoy, a Prince of the houſe of Farneſe, and others (e). In the mean time, this Lady had ſome thoughts of marrying herſelf at home, as a celebrated writer informs us, to a ſon of the Earl of Northumberland's (f); but it is not credible that this took effect, though he ſays it did privately [C]. The very attempt procured her Queen Elizabeth's diſpleaſure, who confined her for it. In the mean time her title to the crown, ſuch as it was, became the ſubject, amongſt many others, of Father Perſons's famous book, wherein are all the arguments for and againſt her, and which ſerved to divulge her name and deſcent all over Europe (g); and yet this book was not very favourable to her intereſt [D]. On the death of the Queen, ſome malecontents framed an odd deſign of diſturbing the public peace, and amongſt other branches of title of Lenox, belonged of right to Lord Robert Stuart, the uncle of this nobleman, and his father's elder brother, but he willingly reſigning his claim, King James VI. created Eſme, Lord Aubigny, Duke of Lenox (3), and looking upon him as the heir male of his family, he would willingly have married him to this Lady Arabella, his neareſt relation. But Queen Elizabeth, who did not care to ſee her heirs multiplied in her life-time, refuſed to conſent to this marriage, under pretence that the Duke of Lenox was a Papiſt, which however was falſe, and this refuſal of her's gave King James very great diſtaſte (4).

[C] Though he ſays it did, privately.] The account Thuanus gives us of this matter, runs thus: Angli quidam Proceres, &c. 'Some Engliſh Lords, and 'other perſons, on whom Elizabeth had conferred 'honours, either out of favour, or as a reward for 'their ſervices, ſeeing a new King and a foreigner, 'coming from Scotland, and fearing that by this 'change, they ſhould be deprived of thoſe dignities 'which they expected, reſolved among themſelves to 'kill the King, after which Arbella, who, during 'the reign of Queen Elizabeth, had been ſecretly 'married to the ſon of the Earl of Northumberland, 'and was for that reaſon put into priſon, and had 'been ſince ſet at liberty, and was preſent at the 'Queen's funeral, was to be made Queen, and to be 'married to the Duke of Savoy with the conſent of 'Philip III.' i. e. King of Spain (5).

[D] Was not very favourable to her intereſt.] The book referred to in the text, ſtates at large the arguments for and againſt Lady Arabella's claim to the Engliſh ſucceſſion. Firſt, her deſcent is ſet down, which having been cleared in a former note, need not be repeated here. Secondly, ſaith that author, it is alleged in her behalf, That ſhe is an Engliſh woman, born in England, and of parents who at the time of their birth were of Engliſh allegiance, wherein ſhe goeth before the King of Scots, as hath been ſeen; as alſo in this other principal point, that by her admiſſion no ſuch inconvenience can be feared of bringing in ſtrangers, or cauſing troubles or ſedition within the realm, as in the pretence of the Scottiſh King hath been conſidered: And this, in effect, is all that I have heard alleged for her. But againſt her, by other competitors and their friends, I have heard diverſe arguments of no ſmall importance and conſideration produced; whereof the firſt is, that which before hath been alleged againſt the King of Scotland, to wit, That neither of them is properly of the houſe of Lancaſter. The ſecond impediment againſt the Lady Arbella, is the famous teſtament of King Henry VIII., and the two acts of parliament for authorizing the ſame; by all which it is pretended, that the houſe of Suffolk is preferred before this other of Scotland. A third argument is, For that there is yet living one of the houſe of Suffolk, that is nearer by a degree to the ſtem, to wit, Henry VII. (to whom, after the deceaſe of her Majeſty that now is, we muſt return) than is the Lady Arabella, or the King of Scots, and that is the Lady Margaret, Counteſs of Derby, mother to the preſent Earl of Derby, who was daughter to Lady Eleanor, daughter of Queen Mary of France, that was ſecond daughter of King Henry VII.; ſo as this Lady Margaret, Counteſs of Derby, is but in the third degree from the ſaid Henry, whereas both the King of Scotland and Arabella are in the fourth; and conſequently, ſhe is next in propinquity of blood; and how greatly this propinquity hath been favoured in ſuch caſes, though they were of the younger Line, might be proved from many examples. Fourthly, laſtly, and moſt ſtrongly of all, They do argue againſt the title of the Lady Arabella, affirming, that the deſcent is not free from baſtardy, which they prove firſt, for that Queen Margaret, ſoon after the death of her firſt huſband, King James IV., married ſecretly one Stuart, Lord of Annandale; which Stuart was alive long after her marriage with Douglas; and conſequently, this ſecond marriage with Douglas (Stuart being alive) could not be lawful; which they do prove alſo another way, for that they ſay, it is moſt certain, and to be made evident, that the ſaid Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, had another wife alſo alive, when he married the ſaid Queen: which points they ſay were ſo publick, as they came to King Henry's ears; whereupon he ſent into Scotland, the Lord William Howard, brother to the old Duke of Norfolk, and father to the preſent Lord Admiral of England, to enquire of theſe points, and the ſaid Lord Howard found them to be true, and ſo he reported, not only to the King, but alſo afterwards many times to others, and namely, to Queen Mary, to whom he was Lord Chamberlain, and to diverſe others, of whom many be yet living, which can and will teſtify the ſame, upon the relation they heard from the ſaid Lord William's own mouth; whereupon King Henry was greatly offended, and would have hindered the marriage between his ſaid ſiſter and Douglas, but that they were married in ſecret, and had conſummated their marriage before this was known, or that the thing could be prevented, which is thought was one eſpecial cauſe and motive alſo to the King afterward, to put back the iſſue of his ſaid ſiſter of Scotland, as by his forenamed teſtament is pretended; and this touching Arabella's title by propinquity of birth (6). ——— In another part of his book, ſpeaking of the intereſt of the ſeveral competitors, he delivers himſelf thus. 'I do not know 'to whom the Proteſtant party is particularly devoted 'at this day, more than to the reſt, though the 'houſe of Hertford was wont to be much favoured 'by them; but of later years, little ſpeech hath been 'thereof, but rather of Arabella for whom the 'Lord Treaſurer is ſaid eſpecially to be at this preſent, though for himſelf, it be held ſomewhat 'doubtful, whether he be more faſt to the Proteſtant, 'or to the Puritan; but if the Proteſtant party ſhould 'be divided, then their forces will be the leſs (7).' At the cloſe of his book, he delivers the following judgment of her pretenſions: ——— 'As for Ara- 'bella, in that ſhe is a young Lady, ſhe is thereby 'fit to procure good wills and affections, and in that 'ſhe is unmarried, ſhe may perhaps by her marriage 'join ſome other title with her own, and thereby alſo 'friends. But of herſelf, ſhe is nothing at all allied 'with the nobility of England; and except it be the 'Earl of Shrewſbury, in reſpect of friendſhip to his 'old mother-in-law, that is, grandmother to the 'Lady, I ſee not what Nobleman in England hath 'any band of kindred, or alliance, to follow her. 'And as for her title, it ſeemeth as doubtful as the 'reſt, if not more, as by that which hath been ſaid 'before, hath appeared. And for her religion, I 'know it not, but probably it can be no great motive, either againſt her, or for her, for that, by all 'likelihood, it may be ſuppoſed to be as tender, 'green, and flexible yet, as is her age and ſex, and 'to be wrought hereafter, and ſettled according to 'future events and times (8).' ——— The reader muſt obſerve, that this book was publiſhed in the year 1594, the dedication to the Earl of Eſſex being dated the laſt day of the preceding year.

their dark ſcheme, one was to ſeize the Lady Arabella, and to cover their proceedings by the ſanction of her title, intending alſo to have married her to ſome Engliſh Nobleman, the more to increaſe their intereſt, and the better to pleaſe the people (b). But this conſpiracy was fatal to none but its authors, and thoſe who converſed with them; being ſpeedily defeated, many taken, and ſome executed. As for the Lady Arabella, it does not appear that ſhe had any knowledge of this engagement in her behalf (i), whatever it was; for domeſtic writers are perplexed, and foreign hiſtorians run into abſurdities when they endeavour to explain it [E]. She continued at liberty, and in ſome kind of favour at court, though her circumſtances were narrow till the latter end of the year 1608, when ſome way or other ſhe drew upon her King James's diſpleaſure (k). However, at Chriſtmas, when there was much mirth and good-humour at court, ſhe was again taken into favour, had a ſervice of plate preſented to her of the value of two hundred pounds, a thouſand marks given her to pay her debts, and ſome addition made to her annual income (l). This ſeems to have been done, in order to have gained her to the intereſt of the court, and to put the notions of marriage ſhe had entertained out of her head, all which however proved ineffectual; for in the beginning of the month of February 1609, ſhe was detected in an intrigue with Mr. William Seymour, ſon to the Lord Beauchamp, and grandſon to the Earl of Hertford, to whom, notwithſtanding ſhe was privately married, ſome time afterwards (m). Upon this diſcovery, they were both carried before the Council, and ſeverely reprimanded, and then diſmiſſed. In the ſummer of the year 1610, the marriage broke out, whereupon the Lady was ſent into cloſe cuſtody, at the houſe of Sir Thomas Parry, in Lambeth; and Mr. Seymour was committed to the Tower for his contempt, in marrying a Lady of the Royal Family, with ut the King's leave (n). It does not appear that this confinement was attended with any great ſeverity to either; for the Lady was allowed the uſe of Sir Thomas Parry's houſe and gardens, and the like gentleneſs, in regard to his high quality, was ſhewn to Mr Seymour [F]. Some intercourſe they had by letters, which after a time was diſcovered, and a reſolution taken thereupon to ſend the Lady to Durham, a reſolution

[E] When they endeavour to explain it.] The great Cardinal D'Oſſat, in a letter of his to King Henry IV. of France, dated from Rome, October 26, 1601, gives a long and diſtinct account of ſeveral ſchemes then on foot, for diſpoſing of the Engliſh ſucceſſion to any body, rather than King James VI. of Scotland. He obſerves, that the Pope firſt thought of the Duke of Parma, as being of his own family, and ſought to advance him, under colour of his deſcent, from a baſtard of King Edward IV. In caſe, however, this was found impracticable, his Holineſs was content to join his intereſt, with that of the Lady Arbella; but inaſmuch as the Duke of Parma was married, he was for permitting his brother Cardinal Farneſe, to eſpouſe the Lady, and, in her right, to become King of England. He then ſpeaks of Father Perſons's book, and ſets it in its true light; but ſeems to give a little too much into that wild notion, that a rebellion might be raiſed in England, in ſupport of the Cardinal's pretended title (9). —— I cannot help taking notice, that the celebrated M. Amelot, in a note of his on this letter, makes a great miſtake, though he was a learned and judicious writer. He tells us, 'That in 'the Lady Arbella's party, were all thoſe Engliſh 'Lords, who had been the judges of Queen Mary, 'and who, fearing leſt the King of Scotland her ſon 'ſhould revenge her death upon them, if ever he ac'ceded to the Crown of England, intended to 'marry Arbella with the Earl of Hertford, to ex'clude King James from the ſucceſſion (10).' —— The authors of the General Dictionary, having cited this paſſage, ſay, This is probable enough, though Amelot quotes no authority for it (11). But with their leave, the fact is abſolutely falſe, none of Queen Mary's judges were of Arabella's party, but on the contrary, many amongſt the Papiſts were the Lady Arabella's friends. The truth of the matter was this, Sir Walter Raleigh, on King James's coming to the crown, drew up a memorial, wherein he charged Cecil, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury, and Lord High-Treaſurer of England, with having, in conjunction with his father, a deep concern in the murder of the Queen of Scots. By this ſtep, he hoped to eſtabliſh his own, and to deſtroy Cecil's credit. But he was miſtaken, the King continued to confide in his rival, and forbad Raleigh's attendance (12). This threw him into that conſpiracy, which was fatal to him, and according to the charge of the Attorney-General againſt Raleigh at his trial, it ſeems the plot was to ſeize the perſon of the King, to ſet up the Lady Arabella, with the title of Queen, and to govern the kingdom in her name, by aſſiſtance from Spain. Raleigh denied all this, and with reſpect to him, there was no ſort of proof, or even colour of proof. At this trial, Lord Cecil delivered himſelf thus in court. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near kinſwoman of the King's. Let us not ſcandal the innocent by confuſion of ſpeech; ſhe is as innocent of all theſe things as I, or any man here, only ſhe received a letter from my Lord Cobham to prepare her, which ſhe laughed at, and immediately ſent it to the King. Then the Earl of Nottingham, who ſtood by the Lady Arabella, ſaid, The Lady doth here proteſt upon her ſalvation, that ſhe never dealt in any of theſe things, and ſo ſhe willed me to tell the court. This was farther confirmed by Lord Cecil, who, when the Earl of Nottingham had done ſpeaking, proceeded thus: The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come and ſpeak with her, and gave her to underſtand, that there were ſome about the King, that laboured to diſgrace her. She doubted it was but a trick. But Brook, Lord Cobham's brother, ſaith, that my Lord moved him to procure Arabella to write to the King of Spain, but he affirms, that he never did move her, as his brother deviſed (13).

[F] In regard to his high quality was ſhewn to Mr. Seymour.] This gentleman was the ſecond ſon of the Lord Beauchamp, eldeſt ſon and heir to the Earl of Hertford, by the Lady Catharine, who was the eldeſt ſurviving daughter of the Lady Frances Ducheſs of Suffolk, daughter of Mary Queen Dowager of France, and younger daughter to King Henry VII. Thus this gentleman was very nearly allied to the Royal Family, and a ſort of title of his Grandfather's to the crown, is mentioned in Perſons's Book before taken notice of (14). But that ever there was a deſign of marrying the Lady Arabella to the old Earl of Hertford, as Mr. Amelot aſſerts, is ſcarcely credible. It is very likely that this was miſtaken for the very match which took effect, ſince the plain deſign of it was to unite the claims of the Lady Arabella, with thoſe of the houſe of Hertford, and very probably the relation this had to Lord Cobham's ſcheme mentioned in the laſt note, might alarm the court; which will ſtill appear the more likely, if we conſider what is ſaid, in a ſubſequent proclamation on the commitment of theſe noble perſons. At the coming of Mr. Seymour to the Tower, Mr. Melvin, a Miniſter, a priſoner there for Nonconformity, ſaluted him in this elegant diſtich.

ſolution which threw her into deep affliction. Upon this, by the interpoſition of friends, ſhe and her huſband concerted a ſcheme for their eſcape, which was ſucceſsfully executed in the beginning, though it ended unluckily (o). The Lady, under the care of Sir James Crofts, was at the houſe of Mr. Conyers, at Highgate, from whence ſhe was to have gone the next day to Durham, on which ſhe put a fair countenance now, notwithſtanding the trouble ſhe had before ſhewn. This made her keepers the more eaſy, and gave her an opportunity of diſguiſing herſelf, which ſhe did on Monday the third of June 1611, by drawing over her petticoats a pair of large French faſhioned hoſe, putting on a man's doublet, a peruke which covered her hair, a hat, black cloak, ruſſet boots with red tops, and a rapier by her ſide. Thus equipped, ſhe walked out between three and four with Mr. Markham. They went a mile and half to a little inn, where a perſon attended with their horſes. The Lady, by that time ſhe came thither, was ſo weak and faint, that the hoſtler, who held the ſtirrup when ſhe mounted, ſaid that gentleman would hardly hold out to London. Riding however ſo raiſed her ſpirits, that by the time ſhe came to Blackwall, ſhe was pretty well recovered. There they found waiting for them two men, a gentlewoman, and a chambermaid, with one boat full of Mr. Seymour's and her trunks, and another boat for their perſons, in which they haſted from thence towards Woolwich. Being come ſo far, they bad the watermen row on to Graveſend. There, the poor fellows were deſirous to land, but for a double freight were contented to go on to Lee, yet being almoſt tired by the way, they were forced to lie ſtill at Tilbury, whilſt the rowers went on ſhore to refreſh themſelves; then they proceeded to Lee, and by that time the day appeared, and they diſcovered a ſhip at anchor a mile beyond them, which was the French bark that waited for them. Here the Lady would have lain at anchor expecting Mr. Seymour, but through the importunity of her followers, they forthwith hoiſted ſail and put to ſea. In the mean time Mr. Seymour, with a peruke and beard of black hair, and in a tawny cloth ſuit, walked alone without ſuſpicion, from his lodging out at the great weſt door of the Tower, following a cart that had brought him billets. From thence he walked along by the Tower-wharf, by the Warders of the ſouth gate, and ſo to the iron gate, where one Rodney was ready with a pair of oars to receive him. When they came to Lee, and found that the French ſhip was gone, the billows riſing high, they hired a fiſherman for twenty ſhillings, to put them on board a certain ſhip, that they ſaw under ſail. That ſhip they found not to be it they looked for, ſo they made forwards to the next under ſail, which was a ſhip from Newcaſtle. This with much ado they hired for forty pounds, to carry them to Calais, and the Maſter performed his bargain, by which means Mr. Seymour eſcaped, and continued in Flanders. On Tueſday in the afternoon, my Lord Treaſurer being advertiſed that the Lady Arabella had made an eſcape, ſent immediately to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to ſet ſtrict guard over Mr Seymour, which he, ſays my author, promiſed, after his yare manner, he would thoroughly do, that he would (p); but coming to the priſoner's lodgings, he found, to his great amazement, that he was gone from thence one whole day before. A pink being diſpatched from the Downs into Calais road, ſeized the French bark, and brought back the Lady and thoſe with her (q); but before this was known, the proclamation iſſued, which the reader will find in the notes [G]. As ſoon as ſhe was brought to town, ſhe was, after examination, committed to the Tower, declaring that ſhe was not ſo ſorry for her own reſtraint, as ſhe ſhould be glad if Mr. Seymour eſcaped, for whoſe welfare, ſhe affirmed ſhe was more concerned than for her own (r). Her aunt, the Counteſs of Shrewſbury, was likewiſe committed, on ſuſpicion of having prompted the Lady Arabella, not only to her eſcape, but to other things, it being known that ſhe had amaſſed upwards of twenty thouſand pounds in ready money (s). The Earl of Shrewſbury was confined to his houſe, and the old Earl of Hertford ſent for from his ſeat (t). By degrees things grew cooler, and though it was known that Mr Seymour continued in the Netherlands, yet the court made no farther applications to the Arch-Duke about him (u). In the beginning of the year 1612, a new ſtorm began to break out; for the Lady Arabella, either preſſed at an examination, or of her own free will, made ſome extraordinary diſcoveries, upon which ſome quick ſteps would have been taken, had it not ſhortly after appeared, that her misfortunes had turned her head, and that, conſequently, no uſe could be made of the evidence of a perſon out of her ſenſes (w). However, the Counteſs of Shrewſbury, who before had leave to attend her huſband in his ſickneſs, was very cloſely ſhut up, and the court was amuſed with abundance of ſtrange ſtories, which wore out by degrees, and the poor Lady Arabella languiſhed in her confinement till the twenty-ſeventh of September 1615, when her life and ſorrows ended together (x), as is well obſerved in an elegant epitaph, written by a right reverend author [H]. Even in her grave this poor lady was not at peace, a report being ſpread that ſhe was poiſoned, becauſe ſhe happened to die within two years of Sir Thomas Overbury (y). A writer of great reputation has put this circumſtance in much too ſtrong a light; for it was a ſuſpicion at moſt, and never had the ſupport of the leaſt colour of proof (z) [I]. As for her huſband, Sir William Seymour, he

How do I thank thee, Death, and bleſs thy power,
That I have paſt the guard, and ſcap'd the Tower!

[I] Had not the ſupport of the leaſt colour of proof.] The author here meant, is the celebrated Sir Bulſtrode Whitlock, whoſe Memorials of Engliſh affairs, from the ſuppoſed expedition of Brute, to the end of the reign of King James I., were publiſhed by the famous William Pen, with a recommendatory preface by Dr. Wellwood. He having under the year 1616, given a long account of the poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury, and the ſuſpicion there was, that Sir Thomas had a hand in poiſoning Prince Henry, immediately adds; 'The Lady Arabella, daughter to Charles Stuart, 'younger brother to the King's father, having mar-'ried Sir William Seymour, ſon of the Lord Beau-'champ, and grandchild to the Earl of Hert-'ford, both allied to the crown, and committed to 'the Tower, deſigned an eſcape by diſguiſes. But 'the poor Lady fearful, and ſtaying beyond the 'hour at which they were to meet; her huſband 'went to ſea without her, leaving notice for her to 'follow; but ſhe was apprehended, and brought 'back to the Tower where ſhe died; which ſet 'mens tongues and fears on work, that ſhe went 'the ſame way (18).' It is plain all theſe facts are aſſembled under a wrong year, viz. the year after the Lady was dead, and that no notice is taken of the diſtance of time in which they happened, though there was no leſs than four years between her impriſonment and her death. What is ſtill more remarkable, and which indeed ſhews this to be an unfounded calumny, is the conſideration of the time of her death, which was after the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury was diſcovered, and conſequently at a time, when practices of that ſort in the Tower were leaſt likely to be undertaken; and that ſhe had been well treated before, appears from the Earl of Somerſet's Trial, wherein he alleges, Sir William Wade was removed from being Lieutenant of the Tower, for allowing her a key, by which ſhe might have made her eſcape (19).

This report was at firſt, in all probability, occaſioned by the precaution uſually taken by the Court in caſes of this nature; for it appears, that as ſoon as the death of this Lady was known, the Secretary of State directed his warrant to this effect.

To my very loving friend the Preſident of the College of Phyſicians in the City of LONDON.

'AFTER my hearty commendations: whereas 'the Lady Arabella is lately deceaſed in the 'Tower, and that it is his Majeſty's pleaſure, ac-'cording to former cuſtom, upon like occaſions, 'when perſons of great quality do die in that place, 'her body ſhould be viewed by perſons of ſkill 'and truſt, and thereupon certificate to be made of 'what diſeaſe ſhe died, as to their judgment it ſhall 'appear: theſe are therefore to will and require 'you, to appoint ſome three Phyſicians of your So-'ciety, of good reputation, as well for their learn-'ing as otherwiſe, who, together with the Phy-'ſicians of the ſaid Lady Arabella, ſhall preſently 'repair unto the Tower, and there view and ſearch 'the corpſe of the ſaid Lady, and to return jointly 'their opinion unto me, of the nature of the diſ-'eaſe whereof ſhe died, that we may acquaint his 'Majeſty therewithall. And ſo I bid you heartily 'farewell. From the Court at Whitehall, this 27th 'of September, 1615.

Your loving friend,
RALPH WINWOOD.'

According to the King's command, ſome Phyſicians of the College met at the Tower, and upon a diligent inſpection of the body of the Lady Arabella, were of an opinion, that the cauſe of this noble Lady's death, was a long chronical ſickneſs; that the ſpecies of her diſeaſe was a Cachexy, which daily increaſing (partly by her own neglect, and partly by her averſion to medicine) did at length bring her into a confirmed indiſpoſition of her liver and extream leanneſs, from which cauſes death muſt needs enſue. This teſtimony was ſigned by the Preſident, Regiſter, and four Fellows of the College (20). C.

[Mr. Ballard hath given a place to the Lady Arabella, in his Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, who have been celebrated for their writings or ſkill in the learned Languages, Arts, and Sciences. His reaſons for ſo doing are, that Mr. Evelyn, in his Numiſmata, hath put her in his liſt of learned women, and Mr. Philips, in his Theatrum Poetarum, has introduced her among his modern poeteſſes (21). Though no works of this lady have appeared, which can ſerve to ſhew on what foundation her literary reputation is built, yet it is not probable that Mr. Evelyn and Mr. Philips ſhould, without cauſe, have aſſigned her the rank they have done. Three letters of her's are tranſcribed, by Mr. Ballard, from a MS. volume in Mr. Aſhmole's ſtudy, which prove her to have been a woman of good underſtanding (22). We ſhall add, from the ſame author, a ſhort copy of Latin verſes, addreſſed to the Lady Arabella, by the noted epigrammatiſt, Mr. John Owen, together with a tranſlation of them, by Mr. Thomas Harvey.

As there are theſe teſtimonies to the Lady Arabella's having had a better underſtanding than is mentioned in the text, ſo it ſhould ſeem, from Mr. Oldys's manuſcripts, that ſhe had, at leaſt when young, a far greater ſhare of beauty than is above repreſented. From a picture of her, which was drawn at full length in white in 1589, when ſhe was thirteen years and a half old, it appears that ſhe was, at that time, very beautiful in her perſon. Her complexion was fair as alabaſter: She had ſweet large grey eyes and long flaxen hair, flowing almoſt to her waiſt, and finely curled at top. Mr. Oldys ſays, that ſhe was born in 1575 (25).] K.

ſoon after her deceaſe, procured leave to return, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by loyally adhering to the King during the civil wars, and, ſurviving to the time of the Reſtoration, was reſtored to his great-grandfather's title of Duke of Somerſet, by an Act of Parliament, which entirely cancelled his attainder; and on the giving his royal aſſent to this act, King Charles II. was pleaſed to ſay in full Parliament, what perhaps was as honourable for the family, as the title to which they are reſtored. His words were theſe, As this is an Act of an extraordinary nature, ſo it is in favour of a perſon of no ordinary merit: he has deſerved of my father, and of myſelf, as much as any ſubject poſſibly could do; and I hope this will ſtir no man's envy, becauſe in doing it I do no more than what a good maſter ſhould do for ſuch a ſervant (a). By his Lady Arabella, this noble perſon had no iſſue; but that he ſtill preſerved a warm affection for her memory, appears from hence, that he called one of his daughters by his ſecond wife, Frances, daughter and co-heireſs of Robert Devereux Earl of Eſſex, Arabella (b) Seymour.

[ARAM (EUGENE), a man of conſiderable erudition, which he acquired under great diſadvantages, and who was alſo remarkable for his unhappy fate, and the ſingular circumſtances that occaſioned and attended it, was born at Ramſgill, a little village, in Netherdale, Yorkſhire, in the year 1704. He was deſcended from an ancient family, but his father was in no higher ſtation than that of a gardener, though of great merit in that occupation [A]. He was removed, when very young, together with his mother, to Skelton, near Newby: and when he was five or ſix years old, his father making a little purchaſe in Bondgate near Rippon, his family went thither. He was there ſent to ſchool, where he learned to read the New Teſtament in Engliſh, which was all he was ever taught, except that, ſome conſiderable time after, he was under the tuition of the Rev. Mr. Alcock of Burnſal, for about a month (a). When he was about thirteen or fourteen years of age, he went to his father at Newby, and attended him in the family there, till the death of Sir Edward Blackett. It was in the houſe of this gentleman, to whom his father was gardener, that his propenſity to literature firſt appeared. He was, indeed, always of a ſolitary diſpoſition, and uncommonly fond of retirement and books; and here he enjoyed all the advantages of leiſure and privacy. He applied himſelf at firſt chiefly to mathematical ſtudies, in which he made a conſiderable proficiency [B]. At about ſixteen years of age, he was ſent to London to the houſe of Mr. Chriſtopher Blackett, whom he ſerved for ſome time in the capacity of book-keeper. After continuing here a year, or more, he was taken with the ſmall-pox, and ſuffered ſeverely under that diſtemper. He afterwards returned into Yorkſhire, in conſequence of an invitation from his father, and there continued to proſecute his ſtudies, but found in polite literature much greater charms than in the mathematics; which occaſioned him now chiefly to apply himſelf to poetry, hiſtory, and antiquities [C]. After this he was invited to Netherdale, where he engaged in a ſchool, and married. But his marriage proved an unhappy connection; for to the miſconduct of his wife he afterwards attributed the misfortunes that befel him. In the mean while, having perceived his deficiency in the learned languages, he applied himſelf to the grammatical ſtudy of the

[A] Of great merit in that occupation.] He ſays himſelf, 'My father was of Nottinghamſhire, a 'gardener, of great abilities in botany, and an excellent draughtſman. He ſerved the right rev. the 'Biſhop of London, Dr. Compton, with great approbation; which occaſioned his being recommended to Newby, in this county (Yorkſhire), to Sir 'Edward Blackett, whom he ſerved in the capacity 'of a gardener, with much credit to himſelf, and 'ſatisfaction to that family for above thirty years. 'Upon the deceaſe of that Baronet, he went and was 'retained in the ſervice of Sir John Ingilby of 'Ripley, Bart. where he died; reſpected when living, and lamented when dead.

'My father's anceſtors were of great antiquity and 'conſideration in this county, and originally Britiſh. 'Their ſirname is local; for they were formerly lords 'of the town of Haram, or Aram, on the ſouthern 'banks of the Tees, and oppoſite to Sockburn, in the 'Biſhoprick; and appear in the records of St. Mary's, 'at York, among many charitable names, early and 'conſiderable benefactors to that abbey. They, many centuries ago, removed from theſe parts, and 'were ſettled, under the fee of the Lords Mowbray 'in Nottinghamſhire, at Aram, or Aram-Park, in 'the neighbourhood of Newark upon Trent; where 'they were poſſeſſed of no leſs than three knights fees 'in the reign of Edward III. Their lands, I find 'not whether by purchaſe or marriage, came into 'the hands of the preſent Lord Lexington. While 'the name exiſted in this county, ſome of them were 'ſeveral times high-ſheriffs for this county; and one 'was profeſſor of divinity, if I remember right, at 'Oxford, and died at York. The laſt of the chief 'of this family, was Thomas Aram, Eſq; ſome time 'of Gray's Inn, and one of the commiſſioners of the 'Salt-office, under the late Queen Anne. He married one of the co-heireſſes of Sir John Coningſby, 'of North Mims, in Herefordſhire. His ſeat, which 'was his own eſtate, was at the Wild, near Shenby, 'in Hertfordſhire, where I ſaw him, and where he 'died without iſſue (1).'

[B] In which he made a conſiderable proficiency.] In the letter before-cited, he ſays, 'My ſtudy at that 'time was engaged in the Mathematics: I know 'not what my acquiſitions were; but I am certain 'my application was at once intenſe and unwearied. 'I found in my father's library there, which con'tained a very great number of books in moſt 'branches, Kerſey's Algebra, Leyburn's Curſus 'Mathematicus, Ward's Young Mathematician's 'Guide, Harris's Algebra, and a great many more; 'but theſe being the books in which I was ever moſt 'converſant, I remember them the better. I was 'even then equal to the management of quadratic 'equations, and their geometrical conſtructions. 'After we left Newby, I repeated the ſame ſtudies 'in Bondgate, and went over all the parts I had 'ſtudied before, I believe not unſucceſsfully.'

[C] To poetry, hiſtory, and antiquities.] 'At home,' he ſays, 'with leiſure upon my hands, and a new 'addition of authors to thoſe brought me from 'Newby, I renewed not only my mathematical 'ſtudies, but begun and proſecuted others, of a 'different turn, with much avidity and diligence. 'Theſe were Poetry, Hiſtory, and Antiquities; the 'charms of which quite deſtroyed all the heavier 'beauties of numbers in lines, whoſe applications 'and properties I now purſued no longer, except 'occaſionally in teaching.'

Latin and Greek tongues; after which he read, with great avidity and diligence, all the Latin claſſics, hiſtorians and poets (b). He then went through the Greek Teſtament; and, laſtly, ventured upon Heſiod, Homer, Theocritus, Herodotus, and Thucydides, together with all the Greek tragedians [D]. In 1734, William Norton, Eſq; a gentleman who had a friendſhip for him, invited him to Knareſborough. Here he acquired the knowledge of the Hebrew, and read the Pentateuch in that language [E]. In 1744 he returned to London, and ſerved the Rev. Mr. Painblanc, as Uſher in Latin and writing, in Piccadilly; and, with this gentleman's aſſiſtance, he acquired the knowledge of the French language. He was afterwards employed, as an uſher and tutor in ſeveral different parts of England; during which time he became acquainted with heraldry and botany [F]. He alſo ventured upon Chaldee and Arabic, the former of which he found eaſy from its near connection with the Hebrew. He then inveſtigated the Celtic, as far as poſſible, in all its dialects; and having begun to form collections, and made compariſons between the Celtic, the Engliſh, the Latin, the Greek, and the Hebrew, and found a great affinity between them, he reſolved to proceed through all theſe languages, and to form a comparative Lexicon [G]. But in the midſt of theſe learned labours and inquiries, it appears, that Aram committed a crime, which could not naturally have been expected from a man of ſo ſtudious

[D] All the Greek tragedians.] Of the extreme aſſiduity with which he proſecuted his ſtudies, an idea may be formed from the following paſſage in the letter before referred to. 'Perceiving,' ſays he, 'the deficiency in my education, and ſenſible of my 'want of the learned languages, and prompted by 'an irreſiſtible covetouſneſs of knowledge, I com-'menced a ſeries of ſtudies in that way, and under-'took the tediouſneſs, the intricacies, and the labour 'of grammar. I ſelected Lilly from the reſt; all 'which I got, and repeated by heart. The taſk of 'repeating it all every day, was impoſſible while I 'attended the ſchool; ſo I divided it into portions; 'by which method it was pronounced thrice every 'week: and this I performed for years.

'Next I became acquainted with Camden's Greek 'grammar, which I alſo repeated in the ſame man-'ner, memoriter. Thus inſtructed, I entered upon 'the Latin claſſics, whoſe allurements repaid my 'aſſiduities and my labours. I remember to have, at 'firſt, hung over five lines for a whole day; and 'never, in all the painful courſe of my reading, left 'any one paſſage, but I did, or thought I did, perfectly 'comprehend.

'After I had accurately peruſed every one of the 'Latin claſſics, hiſtorians, and poets, I went through 'the Greek Teſtament, firſt parſing every word as I 'proceeded: next, I ventured upon Heſiod, Homer, 'Theocritus, Herodotus, Thucydides, and all the 'Greek tragedians: a tedious labour was this; but 'my former acquaintance with hiſtory leſſened it ex-'tremely; becauſe it threw a light upon many paſſages, 'which, without that aſſiſtance, muſt have appeared 'obſcure.'

[E] Read the Pentateuch in that language.] 'Not 'ſatisfied with my former acquiſitions, I proſecuted 'the attainment of the Hebrew; and with indefati-'gable diligence. I had Buxtorff's Grammar; but 'that being perplexed, or not explicit enough, at 'leaſt in my opinion at that time, I collected no leſs 'than eight or ten different Hebrew grammars; and 'here one very often ſupplied the omiſſions of the 'others; and this was, I found, of extraordinary 'advantage (2).'

(2) Letter ut ſupra.

[F] Became acquainted with heraldry and botany.] He ſays, 'I well knew Tournefort, Ray, Miller, 'Linnæus, &c. I made frequent viſits to the botanic 'garden at Chelſea; and traced pleaſure through a 'thouſand fields: at laſt, few plants, domeſtic or 'exotic, were unknown to me.'

[G] To form a comparative Lexicon.] 'I had made 'notes,' ſays he, 'and compared above three thou-'ſand of theſe together, and found ſuch a ſurpriſing 'affinity, even beyond my expectation or conception, 'that I was determined to proceed through the whole 'of all theſe languages, and form a comparative 'Lexicon; which I hoped would account for num-'berleſs vocables in uſe with us, the Latins, 'and Greeks, before concealed and unobſerved '(3).'

(3) Letter ut ſupra.

In an eſſay which Aram left behind him, relative to his intended Lexicon, are ſome curious and pertinent remarks, and particularly the following animadverſions on Lexicographers. 'All our lexico-'graphers,' ſays he, 'a very few excepted, for aught 'I have adverted to, have been long employed, and 'have generally contented themſelves too, within the 'limits of a narrow field. They ſeem to have looked 'no farther than the facilitating for youth the at-'tainment of the Latin and Greek languages, and 'almoſt univerſally conſider the former, as only de-'rived from the latter. Theſe two ſingle points ſeem 'to have confined their whole view, poſſeſſed their 'whole attention, and engroſſed all their induſtry.

'Here and there indeed, and in a few pieces of 'this kind, one ſees interſperſed, derivations of the 'Engliſh from the Latin, Greek, &c. inferred from 'a conformity of orthography, ſound, and ſignifica-'tion, and theſe are very true. But whence this 'relation, this conſonancy aroſe, why it has conti-'nued from age to age to us, has floated on the 'ſtream of time ſo long, and paſſed to ſuch a diſtance 'of place; how antient words have ſurvived conqueſts, 'the migrations of people, and the ſeveral coalitions 'of nations and colonies, notwithſtanding the fluc-'tuating condition of language in its own nature, 'they have neither obſerved with diligence, nor ex-'plained with accuracy.

'Almoſt every etymologiſt that has fallen into my 'hands, and detained my eye, have not been miſ-'taken then in the compariſon they have made, or 'the uniformity they have obſerved, between the 'Latin and the Greek, and between both thoſe lan-'guages and our own; but then their inſtances have 'been but ſhort and few, and they have failed in ac-'counting for this uniformity: they have indeed ſuf-'ficiently evinced a ſimilarity, but produced no rea-'ſons for it. It is not to be thought of, much leſs 'concluded, that the multitude of words among us, 'which are certainly Latin, Greek, and Phœnician, 'are all the relics of the Roman ſettlements in Britain, 'or the effects of Greek or Phœnician commerce here: 'no, this reſemblance was co-æval with the primary 'inhabitants of this iſland, and the acceſſion of other 'colonies did not obliterate, but confirm this reſem-'blance, and alſo brought in an increaſe and acceſ-'ſion of other words from the ſame original, and 'conſequently bearing the ſame conformity. How 'nearly related is the Cambrian, how nearly the 'Iriſh, in numberleſs inſtances, to the Latin, the 'Greek, and even Hebrew, and both poſſeſſed this 'conſimilarity long ago, before Julius Cæſar, and 'the Roman invaſion: I know not, but the Latin 'differed more from itſelf in the ſucceſſion of ſix con-'tinued centuries, than the Welſh and Iriſh at this 'time from the Latin. Concerning this agreement 'of theirs with the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, not 'to mention others, a gentleman of great penetration, 'and extraordinary erudition, Dr. Davis, may be 'conſulted; and the learned Sheringham, who has 'exhibited a long and curious ſpecimen of Greek and 'Cambrian words, ſo exactly correſpondent in ſound 'and ſenſe, or at leaſt ſo viſibly near, that, as far as 'I know, no gentleman has ever yet queſtioned, 'much leſs diſputed their alliance.

'This ſimilitude ſubſiſting in common between the 'Iriſh, Cambrian, Greek, Latin, and even Hebrew, 'as it has not eſcaped the notice, and animadverſions

ſtudious a turn, and which is the more extraordinary, as the inducement that led him to it is ſaid to have been only gain, though he himſelf afterwards aſſigned a different motive. On the 8th of February 1744-5, he murdered Daniel Clark, a ſhoemaker, in conjunction with whom, and another perſon, he ſeems before to have been concerned in ſome fraudulent practices. The murder, however, was concealed near fourteen years, and then was diſcovered by a ſkeleton being accidentally found, which was ſuppoſed to be that of Clark. This was a miſtake; but it led to a diſcovery of the whole tranſaction [H]. And Aram's wife, from whom he had been ſeparated a conſiderable time, was a principal evidence againſt him. When he was apprehended, on ſuſpicion of this murder, he was uſher of a ſchool at Lynn, in Norfolk. He was brought from thence to York-caſtle, and on the 3d of Auguſt 1759, was tried at the county-aſſizes for the murder. He was found guilty on the teſtimony of Richard Houſeman, corroborated by that of his own wife, and other circumſtantial evidence. The defence which he read in court on this occaſion, which is exceedingly curious, and at once an evidence of his taſte, and his erudition, though not of his innocence, is inſerted in the note [I] below. After his

'of the learned, ſo their ſurpriſe has generally increaſed with their reſearches, and conſiderations about it: new circumſtances of agreement perpetually ariſing. A great many gentlemen, converſant in antiquities, and pleaſed with literary amuſements of this kind, have aſcribed theſe palpable connexions to conqueſt, or to commerce: they have ſuppoſed that the intercourſe, which on the latter account antiently ſubſiſted between the Phœnicians, Greeks, and the Britons (4), occaſioned this very remarkable community between their languages. Indeed, this accident of commerce muſt needs have had its influence; but then this influence muſt have been but weak and partial; not prevalent and extenſive. Commerce has, and always will make continual additions to any language, by the introduction of exotic words: yet would words of this kind, and at that time, hardly extend a great way; they would only affect the maritime parts, and thoſe places frequented by traders, and that but feebly, and would be very far from acting or making any conſiderable impreſſion upon the whole body of our language.

(4) See Boch, Huet, &c.

'But even ſuppoſing, that a number of Greek vocables may have found admittance and adoption in Britain, and after this manner, yet could they never penetrate into the more interior parts of it, into receſſes remote from the ſea; ſtrangers to all correſpondence, without the temptation, without the inclination to leave their natural ſoil, their own hereditary village, yet is Greek even here; we find pure Greek in the Peak itſelf, whither foreigners, eſpecially at the diſtance of more than twice ten centuries, can ſcarcely be ſuppoſed to have come. There could have been but few invitations to it then; and perhaps there are not many now (5).'

(5) Vide Annual Regiſter, for the year 1759.

[H] Led to a diſcovery of the whole tranſaction.] A labourer was employed to dig for ſtone to ſupply a lime-kiln at a place called Thiſtle-Hill, near Knareſborough, and having dug about two feet deep, he found the bones of a human body, and the bones being ſtill joined to each other by the ligatures of the joints, the body appeared to have been buried double. This accident immediately became the ſubject of general curioſity and inquiry. Some hints had been formerly thrown out by Aram's wife, that Clark was murdered; and it was well remembered, that his diſappearance was very ſudden. This occaſioned Aram's wife to be ſent for, as was alſo the coroner, and an inquiſition was entered into; it being believed, that the ſkeleton found was that of Daniel Clark. Mrs. Aram declared, that ſhe believed Clark had been murdered by her huſband and Richard Houſeman. The latter, when he was brought before the coroner, appeared to be in great confuſion, trembling, changing colour, and faultering in his ſpeech during the examination. The coroner deſired him to take up one of the bones, probably to obſerve what further effect that might produce; and Houſeman accordingly taking up one of the bones, ſaid, 'This is no more Dan. Clark's bone than it is mine.' Theſe words were pronounced in ſuch a manner, as convinced thoſe preſent, that they proceeded not from Houſeman's ſuppoſition that Clark was alive, but from his certain knowledge where his bones really lay. Accordingly, after ſome evaſions, he ſaid that Clark was murdered by Eugene Aram, and that the body was buried in St. Robert's cave near Knareſborough. He added further, that Clark's head lay to the right, in the turn at the entrance of the cave; and a ſkeleton was accordingly found there exactly in the poſture that he deſcribed. In conſequence of this Aram was apprehended at Lynn in Norfolk. He was conveyed to the city of York, where he and Houſeman were brought to their trial; and Houſeman being arraigned and acquitted, became an evidence againſt Aram. The teſtimony of Houſeman was corroborated by that of Aram's wife, and other circumſtantial evidence. The fact ſeems to have been, that Houſeman and Aram together murdered Clark, and jointly dragged his body into the cave, where it was found in the poſture deſcribed by Houſeman. It was ſuppoſed, that Aram got all the money Clark had received for his wife's fortune, amounting to above 160l.

[I] The defence which he read in court, &c.]

'My Lord,

'I Know not whether it is of right, or through ſome indulgence of your lordſhip, that I am allowed the liberty at this bar, and at this time, to attempt a defence; incapable, and uninſtructed, as I am to ſpeak. Since, while I ſee ſo many eyes upon me, ſo numerous and awful a concourſe, fixed with attention, and filled with I know not what expectancy, I labour not with guilt, my lord, but with perplexity. For having never ſeen a court but this, being wholly unacquainted with law, the cuſtoms of the bar, and all judiciary proceedings, I fear I ſhall be ſo little capable of ſpeaking with propriety in this place, that it exceeds my hope, if I ſhall be able to ſpeak at all.

'I have heard, my lord, the indictment read, wherein I find myſelf charged with the higheſt crime; with an enormity I am altogether incapable of; a fact, to the commiſſion of which there goes far more inſenſibility of heart, more profligacy of morals, than ever fell to my lot. And nothing poſſibly could have admitted a preſumption of this nature, but a depravity, not inferior to that imputed to me. However, as I ſtand indicted at your lordſhip's bar, and have heard what is called evidence induced in ſupport of ſuch a charge, I very humbly ſolicit your lordſhip's patience, and beg the hearing of this reſpectable audience, while I, ſingle and unſkilful, deſtitute of friends, and unaſſiſted by counſel, ſay ſomething, perhaps, like argument, in my defence. I ſhall conſume but little of your lordſhip's time; what I have to ſay will be ſhort, and this brevity, probably, will be the beſt part of it: however, it is offered with all poſſible regard, and the greateſt ſubmiſſion to your lordſhip's conſideration, and that of this honourable court.

'Firſt, my lord, the whole tenor of my conduct in life contradicts every particular of this indictment. Yet I had never ſaid this, did not my preſent circumſtances extort it from me, and ſeem to make it neceſſary. Permit me here, my Lord, to call upon malignity itſelf, ſo long and cruelly buſied in this proſecution, to charge upon me any immorality, of which prejudice was not the author. No, my Lord, I concerted no ſchemes of fraud, projected no violence, injured no man's perſon or property. My days were honeſtly laborious, my nights intenſely ſtudious. And, I humbly conceive, my notice of his conviction, he confeſſed the juſtice of his ſentence [K], but made an attempt upon his own life, by cutting his arm in two places with a razor, which he had concealed for that purpoſe.

'this, eſpecially at this time, will not be thought 'impertinent, or unſeaſonable; but, at leaſt, de-'ſerving ſome attention: becauſe, my Lord, that 'any perſon, after a temperate uſe of life, a ſeries of 'thinking and acting regularly, and without one 'ſingle deviation from ſobriety, ſhould plunge into 'the very depth of profligacy, precipitately and at 'once, is altogether improbable and unprecedented, 'and abſolutely inconſiſtent with the courſe of things. 'Mankind is never corrupted at once; villainy is 'always progreſſive, and declines from right, ſtep 'after ſtep, till every regard of probity is loſt, and 'every ſenſe of all moral obligations totally periſhes.

'Again, my Lord, a ſuſpicion of this kind, which 'nothing but malevolence could entertain, and ig-'norance propagate, is violently oppoſed by my very 'ſituation at that time, with reſpect to health: for, 'but a little ſpace before, I had been confined to 'my bed, and ſuffered under a very long and ſevere 'diſorder, and was not able, for half a year together, 'ſo much as to walk. The diſtemper left me indeed, 'yet ſlowly and in part; but ſo macerated, ſo en-'feebled, that I was reduced to crutches; and was 'ſo far from being well about the time I am charged 'with this fact, that I never to this day perfectly re-'covered. Could then a perſon in this condition 'take any thing into his head ſo unlikely, ſo extra-'vagant; I, paſt the vigour of my age, feeble and 'valetudinary, with no inducement to engage, no 'ability to accompliſh, no weapon wherewith to per-'petrate ſuch a fact; without intereſt, without power, 'without motive, without means.

'Beſides, it muſt needs occur to every one, that 'an action of this atrocious nature is never heard of, 'but, when its ſprings are laid open, it appears that 'it was to ſupport ſome indolence, or ſupply ſome 'luxury, to ſatisfy ſome avarice, or oblige ſome ma-'lice; to prevent ſome real, or ſome imaginary 'want: yet I lay not under the influence of any one 'of theſe. Surely, my Lord, I may, conſiſtent with 'both truth and modeſty, affirm thus much; and 'none who have any veracity, and knew me, will 'ever queſtion this.

'In the ſecond place, the diſappearance of Clark 'is ſuggeſted as an argument of his being dead: but 'the uncertainty of ſuch an inference from that, and 'the fallibility of all concluſions of ſuch a ſort, from 'ſuch a circumſtance, are too obvious, and too no-'torious, to require inſtances: yet, ſuperſeding many, 'permit me to produce a very recent one, and that 'afforded by this caſtle.

'In June, 1757, William Thompſon, for all the 'vigilance of this place, in open day-light, and 'double-ironed, made his eſcape; and, notwith-'ſtanding an immediate enquiry ſet on foot, the 'ſtricteſt ſearch, and all advertiſement, was never 'ſeen or heard of ſince. If then Thompſon got off 'unſeen, through all theſe difficulties, how very eaſy 'was it for Clark, when none of them oppoſed him? 'But what would be thought of a proſecution com-'menced againſt any one ſeen laſt with Thomp-'ſon?

'Permit me, next, my Lord, to obſerve a little 'upon the bones which have been diſcovered. It is 'ſaid, which perhaps is ſaying very far, that theſe 'are the ſkeleton of a man. It is poſſible indeed it 'may: but is there any certain known criterion, 'which inconteſtably diſtinguiſhes the ſex in human 'bones? Let it be conſidered, my Lord, whether 'the aſcertaining of this point ought not to precede 'any attempt to identify them.

'The place of their depoſitum too claims much 'more attention than is commonly beſtowed upon it: 'for, of all places in the world, none could have 'mentioned any one, wherein there was greater cer-'tainty of finding human bones, than a hermitage; 'except he ſhould point out a church-yard: hermit-'ages, in time paſt, being not only places of religi-'ous retirement, but of burial too. And it has ſcarce 'or never been heard of, but that every cell, now 'known, contains, or contained, theſe relicks of 'humanity; ſome mutilated, and ſome entire. I do 'not inform, but give me leave to remind your Lord-'ſhip, that here ſat ſolitary ſanctity, and here the 'hermit, or the anchoreſs, hoped that repoſe for 'their bones, when dead, they here enjoyed when 'living.

'All this while, my Lord, I am ſenſible this is 'known to your Lordſhip, and many in this Court, 'better than I. But it ſeems neceſſary to my caſe, 'that others, who have not at all, perhaps, adverted 'to things of this nature, and may have concern in 'my trial, ſhould be made acquainted with it. Suffer 'me then, my Lord, to produce a few of many evi-'dences, that theſe cells were uſed as repoſitories of 'the dead, and to enumerate a few, in which human 'bones have been found, as it happened in this in 'queſtion; leſt, to ſome, that accident might ſeem 'extraordinary, and, conſequently, occaſion pre-'judice.

'1. The bones, as was ſuppoſed, of the Saxon, 'St. Dubritius, were diſcovered buried in his cell at 'Guy's cliff, near Warwick, as appears from the 'authority of Sir William Dugdale.

'2. The bones, thought to be thoſe of the ancho-'reſs Roſia, were but lately diſcovered in a cell at 'Royſton, entire, fair, and undecayed, though they 'muſt have lain interred for ſeveral centuries, as is 'proved by Dr. Stukely.

'3. But our own country, nay, almoſt this neigh-'bourhood, ſupplies another inſtance: for, in Janu-'ary, 1747, was found by Mr. Stovin, accompanied 'by a reverend gentleman, the bones, in part, of 'ſome recluſe, in the cell at Lindholm, near Hatfield. 'They were believed to be thoſe of William of Lind-'holm, a hermit, who had long made this cave his 'habitation.

'4. In February 1744, part of Woburn abbey be-'ing pulled down, a large portion of a corpſe ap-'peared, even with the fleſh on, and which bore 'cutting with a knife; though it is certain this had 'lain above 200 years, and how much longer is 'doubtful; for this abbey was founded in 1145, and 'diſſolved in 1538 or 9.

'What would have been ſaid, what believed, if 'this had been an accident to the bones in queſtion?

'Further, my Lord, it is not yet out of living 'memory, that a little diſtance from Knareſborough, 'in a field, part of the manor of the worthy and 'patriot Baronet, who does that borough the honour 'to repreſent it in parliament, were found, in dig-'ging for gravel, not one human ſkeleton only, but 'five or ſix, depoſited ſide by ſide, with each an urn 'placed at its head, as your lordſhip knows was 'uſual in antient interments.

'About the ſame time, and in another field, almoſt 'cloſe to this borough, was diſcovered alſo, in ſearch-'ing for gravel, another human ſkeleton; but the 'piety of the ſame worthy gentleman ordered both 'the pits to be filled up again, commendably unwill-'ing to diſturb the dead.

'Is the invention of theſe bones forgotten, then, 'or induſtriouſly concealed, that the diſcovery of 'thoſe in queſtion may appear the more ſingular and 'extraordinary? Whereas, in fact, there is nothing 'extraordinary in it. My Lord, almoſt every place 'conceals ſuch remains. In fields, in hills, in high-'way ſides, in commons, lie frequent and unſuſ-'pected bones. And our preſent allotments for reſt 'for the departed, is but of ſome centuries.

'Another particular ſeems not to claim a little of 'your Lordſhip's notice, and that of the gentlemen 'of the jury; which is, that perhaps no example 'occurs of more than one ſkeleton being found in one 'cell; and in the cell in queſtion was found but one; 'agreeable, in this, to the peculiarity of every other 'known cell in Britain. Not the invention of one 'ſkeleton, then, but of two, would have appeared 'ſuſpicious and uncommon.

'But then, my Lord, to attempt to identify theſe, 'when even to identify living men ſometimes has 'proved ſo difficult, as in the caſe of Perkin War-'beck and Lambert Symnel at home, and of Don 'Sebaſtian abroad, will be looked upon perhaps as 'an attempt to determine what is indeterminable. 'And I hope too it will not paſs unconſidered here, 'where gentlemen believe with caution, think with 'reaſon, and decide with humanity, what intereſt purpoſe [L]. By proper applications, he was brought to himſelf, and, though weak, was conducted to the place of execution; where, being aſked if he had any thing to ſay, he replied in the negative. He was immediately after executed, and his body being conveyed to Knareſborough-foreſt, he was there hung in chains, purſuant to his ſentence. It is exceedingly to be lamented, that a man poſſeſſed of ſuch abilities, and ſuch applica-

' the endeavour to do this is calculated to ſerve, in ' aſſigning proper perſonality to thoſe bones, whoſe ' particular appropriation can only appear to eternal ' Omniſcience.

' Permit me, my Lord, alſo, very humbly to re- ' monſtrate, that, as human bones appear to have ' been the inſeparable adjuncts of every cell, even ' any perſon's naming ſuch a place at random as con- ' taining them, in this caſe, ſhews him rather unfor- ' tunate than conſcious preſcient, and that theſe at- ' tendants on every hermitage only accidentally con- ' curred with this conjecture. A mere caſual coin- ' cidence of words and things.

' But it ſeems another ſkeleton has been diſcovered ' by ſome labourer, which was full as confidently ' averred to be Clark's as this. My Lord, muſt ſome ' of the living, if it promotes ſome intereſt, be made ' anſwerable for all the bones that earth has conceal- ' ed, and chance expoſed? And might not a place ' where bones lay be mentioned by a perſon by ' chance, as well as found by a labourer by chance? ' Or, is it more criminal accidentally to name ' where bones lie, than accidentally to find where ' they lie?

' Here too is a human ſkull produced, which is ' fractured; but was this the cauſe, or was it the ' conſequence of death; was it owing to violence, or ' was it the effect of natural decay? If it was violence, ' was that violence before or after death? My Lord, ' in May 1732, the remains of William Lord Arch- ' biſhop of this province were taken up, by permiſ- ' ſion, in this cathedral, and the bones of the ſkull ' were found broken; yet certainly he died by no ' violence offered to him alive, that could occaſion ' that fracture there.

' Let it be conſidered, my Lord, that, upon the ' diſſolution of religious houſes, and the commence- ' ment of the Reformation, the ravages of thoſe times ' both affected the living and the dead. In ſearch ' after imaginary treaſures, coffins were broken up, ' graves and vaults dug open, monuments ranſack'd, ' and ſhrines demoliſhed; your Lordſhip knows that ' theſe violations proceeded ſo far, as to occaſion par- ' liamentary authority to reſtrain them; and it did, ' about the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. ' I entreat your Lordſhip ſuffer not the violences, ' the depredations, and the iniquities of thoſe times ' to be imputed to this.

' Moreover, what gentleman here is ignorant that ' Knareſborough had a caſtle; which, though now a ' ruin, was once conſiderable both for its ſtrength ' and garriſon. All know it was vigorouſly beſieged ' by the arms of the Parliament; at which ſiege, in ' ſallies, conflicts, flights, purſuits, many fell in all ' the places round it; and where they fell were bu- ' ried; for every place, my Lord, is burial earth in ' war; and many, queſtionleſs, of theſe reſt yet ' unknown, whoſe bones futurity ſhall diſcover.

' I hope, with all imaginable ſubmiſſion, that what ' has been ſaid will not be thought impertinent to ' this indictment; and that it will be far from the ' wiſdom, the learning, and the integrity of this ' place, to impute to the living what zeal in its fury ' may have done; what nature may have taken off, ' and piety interred; or what war alone may have ' deſtroyed, alone depoſited.

' As to the circumſtances that have been raked to- ' gether, I have nothing to obſerve; but that all ' circumſtances whatſoever are precarious, and have ' been but too frequently found lamentably fallible; ' even the ſtrongeſt have failed. They may riſe to ' the utmoſt degree of probability; yet are they but ' probability ſtill. Why need I name to your Lord- ' ſhip the two Harriſons recorded in Dr. Howel, who ' both ſuffered upon circumſtances, becauſe of the ' ſudden diſappearance of their lodger, who was in ' credit, had contracted debts, borrowed money and ' went off unſeen, and returned again a great many ' years after their execution? Why name the intri- ' cate affair of Jacques du Moulin, under King Char- ' les II. related by a gentleman who was council for ' the crown? and why the unhappy Coleman, who ' ſuffered innocent, though convicted upon poſitive ' evidence, and whoſe children periſhed for want, ' becauſe the world uncharitably believed the father ' guilty. Why mention the perjury of Smith, in- ' cautiouſly admitted King's evidence; who, to ' ſcreen himſelf, equally accuſed Faircloth and Love- ' day of the murder of Dunn; the firſt of whom, in ' 1749, was executed at Wincheſter; and Loveday ' was about to ſuffer at Reading, had not Smith been ' proved perjured, to the ſatisfaction of the court, by ' the ſurgeon of the Goſport hoſpital.

' Now, my Lord, having endeavoured to ſhew that ' the whole of this proceſs is altogether repugnant to ' every part of my life; that it is inconſiſtent with ' my condition of health about that time; that no ' rational inference can be drawn, that a perſon is ' dead who ſuddenly diſappears; that hermitages ' were the conſtant repoſitories of the bones of the ' recluſe; that the proofs of this are well authenti- ' cated; that the revolutions in religion, or the for- ' tune of war, has mangled, or buried, the dead; the ' concluſion remains, perhaps, no leſs reaſonably ' than impatiently wiſhed for. I, laſt, after a year's ' confinement, equal to either fortune, put myſelf ' upon the candour, the juſtice, and the humanity of ' your Lordſhip, and upon yours, my countrymen, ' gentlemen of the jury.'

[K] He confeſſed the juſtice of his ſentence.] Two clergymen were directed by the judge who tried him to attend him in York-caſtle, to whom he acknowledged that he murdered Clark. Being aſked by one of them, what was his motive for committing that action, he anſwered, that ' he ſuſpected Clark of ' having an unlawful commerce with his wife; that ' he was perſuaded, at the time when he committed ' the murder, he did right; but that ſince he thought ' it wrong (3).'

' What am I better than my fathers? To die is ' natural and neceſſary. Perfectly ſenſible of this, ' fear no more to die than I did to be born. But the ' manner of it is ſomething which ſhould, in my ' opinion, be decent and manly. I think I have re- ' garded both theſe points. Certainly nobody has a ' better right to diſpoſe of man's life than himſelf; ' and he, not others, ſhould determine how. As ' for any indignities offered to my body, or ſilly re- ' flections on my faith and morals, they are (as they ' always were) things indifferent to me. I think, ' though contrary to the common way of thinking, ' I wrong no man by this, and hope it is not offen- ' ſive to that eternal Being that formed me and the ' world: and as by this I injure no man, no man ' can be reaſonably offended. I ſolicitouſly recom- ' mend myſelf to the eternal and almighty Being, ' the God of nature, if I have done amiſs. But per- ' haps I have not; and I hope this thing will never ' be imputed to me. Though I am now ſtained by ' malevolence, and ſuffer by prejudice, I hope to riſe ' fair and unblemiſhed. My life was not polluted, ' my morals irreproachable, and my opinions ortho- ' dox.

' I ſlept ſound till three o'clock, awaked, and ' then writ theſe lines:

' Come, pleaſing reſt, eternal ſlumber fall,
' Seal mine, that once muſt ſeal the eyes of all;
' Calm and compoſed my ſoul her journey takes,
' No guilt that troubles, and no heart that aches;
' Adieu! thou ſun, all bright like her ariſe,
' Adieu! fair friends, and all that's good and wiſe.'

Theſe lines, found with the foregoing, were ſuppoſed to have been written by Aram juſt before he cut himſelf with the razor (4).

Among his papers were alſo found an elegy on the death of Sir John Armitage, and a poem on the ſtate of public affairs.

tion, ſhould have made ſo diſgraceful an exit; and we are hurt to find ſo excellent a head, joined to ſuch depravity of heart. The progreſs that he made in literature, conſidering the little inſtruction that he received, and the diſadvantages under which he laboured, may juſtly be conſidered as aſtoniſhing; and that his powers of mind were uncommonly great, cannot reaſonably be queſtioned. EUGENE ARAM poſſeſſed talents and acquiſitions that might have claſſed him among the moſt reſpectable of human characters, if his moral qualities had been equal to his intellectual. But vice degraded him, and cauſed a man to fall deſervedly by the hands of the common executioner, who might have been an ornament to his ſpecies.] T.

ARBUTHNOT (ALEXANDER), Principal of the univerſity of Aberdeen. He was the ſon of the Baron of Arbuthnot, and was born in the year 1538 (a). He ſtudied in the univerſity of Aberdeen, and having perfected himſelf in humanity and philoſophy, his relations ſent him to ſtudy the Civil Law in France, where he was five years under the care of the famous Cujacius. Having taken the degree of Licentiate, he returned home in the year 1563, and appeared very warmly in ſupport of the Reformed Religion (b). At this time Queen Mary was reſident in her kingdom; but the Earl of Murray having the ſupreme direction of all things, the Reformed Church of Scotland was in a very flouriſhing condition (c). The friends of Mr. Arbuthnot prevailed upon him to take orders, and whether he received them from a Biſhop or from Preſbyters is uncertain. In 1568, he aſſiſted as a member of the General Aſſembly, which was held in the month of July at Edinburgh (d). By this Aſſembly he was intruſted with the care of reviſing a book which had given offence, and directed to report his opinion of it [A]. A little after, he was appointed Miniſter of Arbuthnot and Logy-Buchan (e). The year following, viz. 1569, on a viſitation of the King's-College at Aberdeen, Mr. Alexander Anderſon, Principal; Mr. Andrew Galloway, Sub-principal; and three Regents were deprived. Their ſentence was publiſhed on the third of July, and immediately thereupon Mr. Arbuthnot was made Principal of that college (f). He was a member alſo of the General Aſſembly which ſat at St. Andrews in the year 1572 (g). At this time there was great ſtir about a certain ſcheme of Church-government, which was called the Book of Policy. It was, in ſhort, an invention of ſome ſtateſmen, to reſtore the old titles in the Church, but with a purpoſe to retain all the temporalities formerly annexed to them, amongſt themſelves (h). The Aſſembly being apprized of this, appointed the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and nineteen other Commiſſioners, of whom Mr. Arbuthnot was one, to confer with the Regent in his council; but theſe conferences either came to nothing, or, which is more probable, were never held (i). In the General Aſſembly which met at Edinburgh the ſixth of Auguſt 1573, Mr. Alexander Arbuthnot was choſen Moderator (k). It was a very buſy meeting, and the Church exerted her power in a very extraordinary manner (l) [B]. In the next Aſſembly, which met at Edinburgh the ſixth of March 1574, there was a charge brought againſt George

[A] Directed to report his opinion of it.] This book was entitled The Fall of the Roman Church. It was printed by one Thomas Baſſenden, printer in Edinburgh. The exception taken at it, was, that the King had the ſtile of the ſupreme head of the church: at the ſame time there was another complaint againſt this Baſſenden, for printing a lewd ſong at the end of the Pſalm book. On theſe matters an order was made, forbidding the printer to vend any more of his books till the offenſive title was delated, and the lewd ſong caſtrated. The Aſſembly alſo made an order, that no book ſhould be publiſhed for the future, till licenſed by commiſſioners of their appointment (1). Hence it appears, that the clergy in all countries have the like appetite for power, and that they are naturally deſirous of dictating in all points of literature.

[B] The Church exerted her power in a very extraordinary manner.] This was eſteemed the 25th General Aſſembly of the Church of Scotland. There were preſent many Earls and others of the nobility, ſome Biſhops, Superintendents, &c. John Douglas Biſhop of St. Andrews had a long charge brought againſt him, conſiſting of various heads, as, That he had admitted a Popiſh Prieſt into the miniſtry, to whom the Superintendent of Lothian had preſcribed certain injunctions, which he had not obeyed: That he, the Biſhop, had not viſited or preached for half a year; that he had collated a perſon ſuſpected of Popery to a benefice; that he had ſuffered Exerciſe (the ſame thing which in England was called propheſying) to decay through his neglect; that he had admitted into the Church, many who were uncapable, and not properly examined. To this accuſation he anſwered, That he had not admitted the Prieſt mentioned in the charge, till he had publickly abjured Popery. The Aſſembly, however, ordered the Prieſt to ſatisfy the injunctions preſcribed in Lothian, and in the mean time not to exerciſe his function. As to his viſiting and preaching, the Biſhop alledged he had done both while he was able; and as to the other heads of complaint, he pleaded either ignorance or inability. James Patoun was accuſed of having accepted the Epiſcopal Office, and yet declining to execute it. He was accuſed of being guilty of ſimony, in reſpect to his practices with the Earl of Argyle, and even of perjury, ſince contrary to his oath he gave receipts, where the Earl received the money. Alexander Gordon, Biſhop of Galloway, was charged with exciting the ſubjects in the city of Edinburgh to rebellion, and with refuſing to pray for the King: That being forbidden by the General Aſſembly, to meddle with the pariſh of Holyrood-houſe, he had nevertheleſs compelled the people to receive the ſacrament from him: That notwithſtanding he had ſworn to obey the King and his Regent, yet nevertheleſs he had owned another authority, and perſuaded the people ſo to do, and had given thanks in the pulpit, for the barbarous murder of Matthew Earl of Lenox the late Regent. He pleaded that all this was pardoned by the late act of pacification: to which the Aſſembly replied, that the States had not abſolved him who was a Biſhop from the cenſure of the Church in Talibus: ſo he was ordained, under the pain of excommunication, to make public repentance three ſeveral ſundays, one in the Church of Edinburgh, another in Holyrood-houſe, and the third in the Queen's College church. Robert Poul was accuſed, That being commiſſioner to viſit Murray, he reſideth not there, nor George Biſhop of Murray, for committing fornication with the Lady Ardroſs (m). He deſired three or four days to prepare his defence; but not appearing at the end of this ſpace, a commiſſion was granted to Mr. Arbuthnot, and other members, to cite before them the Chapter of Murray, in order to queſtion them for their certificate of life and manners, given to George Douglas their Biſhop before mentioned (n). In the ſame Aſſembly, Arbuthnot was named one of the Commiſſioners for ſettling the juriſdiction of the Church, which ſeems to be no more than had been before done about the book of policy (o). This thorny buſineſs required much time and pains, but at laſt however ſome progreſs was made therein, and a plan of juriſdiction was ſtruck out. In the General Aſſembly, which met at Edinburgh the firſt of April 1577, Mr. Alexander Arbuthnot was again choſen Moderator. At this time the Aſſembly were perſuaded, upon ſome ſpecious pretences, to appoint a certain number of their members to confer in the morning with their Moderator, in order to prepare buſineſs (p). This Committee had the name of the Congregation, and in a ſhort time all matters of importance came to be treated there, and the Aſſembly had little to do but to approve their reſolutions (q). At the cloſe of this Aſſembly, Mr. Arbuthnot, with other Commiſſioners, was appointed to confer with the Regent, on the plan of Church policy before mentioned (r). In the General Aſſembly held at Edinburgh the twenty fifth of October 1578, he was again appointed of the Committee for the ſame purpoſe, and in the latter end of the year, actually conferred with ſeveral Noblemen, and other Lay-Commiſſioners, on that important buſineſs (s). In 1582 Mr. Arbuthnot publiſhed Buchanan's Hiſtory of Scotland, in which, though he acted only as an Editor, yet it procured him a great deal of ill-will, and in all probability gave his Majeſty King James VI. an ill impreſſion of him (t). The practice of managing things in Congregation ſtill ſubſiſting, the King forbad Mr. Arbuthnot to leave his college at Aberdeen, that he might not be preſent in the Aſſembly, or direct as he was uſed to do thoſe Congregations which directed that great body (u). This offended the miniſters very much, and they did not fail to remonſtrate upon it to the King: however he remained firm, and they were forced to be content. What impreſſion this might make upon Mr. Arbuthnot's mind, being a very meek and humble man, aſſiſting others at their requeſt, and not through any ambition of his own, is uncertain; but a little after he began to decline in his health, and on the twentieth of October 1583, departed this life in the forty-fifth year of his age, and was buried in the college church of Aberdeen (w). His private character was very amiable: he was learned without pedantry, and a great encourager of learning in youth, eaſy and pleaſant in converſation, had a good taſte in poetry, was well verſed in philoſophy and the mathematics, eminent as a lawyer, no leſs eminent as a Divine; neither wanted he conſiderable ſkill in phyſic. In his public character he was equally remarkable for his moderation and abilities, which gained him ſuch a reputation, as drew upon him ſo many calls for advice, as made him at laſt very uneaſy. As principal of the College of Aberdeen, he did great ſervice to the Church in particular, and to his country in general, by bringing over many to the former, and reviving that ſpirit of literature which was much decayed in the latter (x). Theſe employments took up ſo much of his time, that we have nothing of his writing, except a ſingle book, of which ſome account will be given in the notes [C]. His countryman and contemporary Andrew Melvil (y) wrote an elegant epitaph on this worthy perſon, which alone would have been ſufficient to have preſerved his memory, as it certainly gives a juſt idea of his character.

He alledged want of leiſure, becauſe he was ordained to attend the College of Juſtice; whereupon the Superintendent of Lothian moveth the queſtion, whether it be lawful by the word of God, that the adminiſtration of the word and ſacraments, and the adminiſtration of criminal and civil juſtice be ſo confounded, that one man may occupy both the charges? [ARBUTHNOT (JOHN), an eminent Phyſician, a diſtinguiſhed Wit, and a polite Writer, in the latter end of the ſeventeenth, and the beginning of the preſent century, was deſcended from the noble family of his name in Scotland, and was the ſon of a Clergyman of the Epiſcopal Church in that country (a). He was born at Arbuthnot in Kincardinſhire, near Montroſs, not long after the Reſtoration of King Charles the Second, but in what particular year is uncertain. Having been ſent, at a proper age, to the univerſity of Aberdeen, he applied himſelf diligently to all the academical ſtudies, and particularly to that of phyſic, in which he took his Doctor's degree. The political principles of his father not ſuffering him to comply with the Revolution, he forfeited his Church preferment, and retired for ſupport to a ſmall eſtate of his own (b). The ſons embraced the ſame political principles; on which account they were laid under a neceſſity of ſeeking their fortunes abroad. The Doctor, however, travelled no farther than to London, where he was entertained at the houſe of Mr. William Pate, a Woollen-draper draper (c); ſoon after which, he took up the buſineſs of teaching the mathematics, an undertaking for which he was very well qualified. He was probably engaged in this employment, when Dr. Woodward publiſhed, in 1695, his "Eſſay towards a natural "Hiſtory of the Earth." The account which Dr. Woodward, in his Eſſay, gave of the univerſal deluge, appeared to Dr. Arbuthnot to be irreconcileable with juſt philoſophical reaſoning upon mathematical principles; and, therefore, he drew up an anſwer to that part of the work, under the following title: "An Examination of Dr. Woodward's "Account of the Deluge, &c. With a Compariſon between Steno's Philoſophy and the "Doctor's, in the Caſe of Marine Bodies dug out of the Earth; by J. A. M. D. "With a Letter to the Author, concerning An Abſtract of Agoſtino Scilla's Book on the "ſame Subject; printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, by W. W. (d) F. R. S." This learned piece appeared in 1697, in 8*vo*, and laid the foundation of Dr. Arbuthnot's literary reputation (e); which, not long after, received a conſiderable and deſerved increaſe, by his "Eſſay on the Uſefulneſs of Mathematical Learning: In a Letter from a "Gentleman in the City to his Friend at Oxford (f) [A]." In the mean time, as phyſic was his profeſſion, ſo the practice of it was what he principally had in view. At firſt, indeed, as is uſual with regard to young Phyſicians, he met with no great encouragement; but, after a while, his buſineſs increaſed to a competency; and, by degrees, his ſkill in it, joined with his pleaſing wit and extenſive literature, introduced him into good eſteem and favour with the polite part of the world (g). On St. Andrew's day, 1704, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society (b) [B]; and on the 30th of October, in the following year, he was ſworn Phyſician Extraordinary to Queen Anne, by her Majeſty's eſpécial command. This honour was conferred upon him, in conſideration of his ſucceſsful ſervices to his Royal Highneſs Prince George of Denmark (i). That Prince, being taken ſuddenly ill at Epſom, was recommended to Dr. Arbuthnot, who happened to be upon the ſpot; and his Highneſs recovering by the Doctor's aſſiſtance, ever after employed him as his Phyſician (k). Upon the indiſpoſition of Dr. Hannes, he was appointed, in November 1709, fourth Phyſician in Ordinary to the Queen; and, on the 27th of April 1710, he was admitted a Fellow of the College of Phyſicians (l). About this time, or a little after, Dr. Arbuthnot formed an intimate connection with the celebrated triumvirate, Swift, Pope, and Gay; and it was not long before he added a new luſtre to that conſtellation of wits by the brightneſs of his own (m). [A] His eſſay on the uſefulneſs of mathematical learning.] This is a moſt excellent performance; and we do not know that there is upon the ſame ſubject any thing equal to it in the Engliſh language. Had Dr. Arbuthnot written nothing beſides, this tract alone would have been ſufficient to beſtow upon him a conſiderable rank in the republic of letters. No perſon can peruſe it, who is unacquainted with mathematical knowledge, without feeling, in the ſtrongeſt manner, his own inferiority, in being ignorant of ſo prodigiouſly important and uſeful a branch of learning. The only conſolation he can derive is, that the great truths and principles which have been diſcovered by the cultivation of the mathematics, may be known by thoſe who are not adepts in the ſcience. The advantages which accrue to the mind from mathematical ſtudies, the Doctor obſerves, conſiſt chiefly in theſe things: 1ſt, In accuſtoming it to attention. 2dly, In giving it a habit of cloſe and demonſtrative reaſoning. 3dly, In freeing it from prejudice, credulity, and ſuperſtition. Having diſcuſſed theſe points, he proceeds to ſhew the vaſt extent and uſefulneſs of the mathematics in other parts of knowledge; and that the greater advances we make in Arithmetic, Geometry, and Statics, the more capable we are of conſidering thoſe things which are the ordinary objects of our conceptions. This he hath rendered apparent from ſeveral particulars: ſuch as the courſes, periods, order, diſtances, and proportions of the great bodies of the univerſe; Light; the fluids of Air and Water which involve the Earth; the animal and vegetable kingdoms; and motion. Dr. Arbuthnot goes on to prove that the utility of mathematical learning is equally plain with regard to various other Arts and Sciences. Here he inſtances in Chronology and Geography, Painting, Muſic, and Architecture. From thence he paſſes to the more immediate uſefulneſs of mathematics in civil affairs, with reſpect to which he clearly points out the many advantages they receive from Arithmetic, Geometry, Aſtronomy, Mechanics, Catoptrics and Dioptrics. It is farther ſhewn, that theſe ſtudies are highly ſerviceable to a nation in its military concerns, and that they are of the utmoſt importance in the art of navigation. The eſſay is concluded with a recommendation of the methods proper to be taken for the improvement of mathematical ſcience; and, through the whole, the author manifeſts his admirable learning, and his comprehenſive acquaintance with the diſcoveries which had then been made in every part of philoſophy. If, in any inſtance, he hath carried the matter ſomewhat too far, it is in the little which he hath ſaid upon the ſubject of medicine (1). An eminent writer (Dr. Warburton) hath attempted to prove, that long habit in the ſtudy of Geometry, incapacitates the mind for reaſoning at large, and eſpecially in the ſearch of moral truth (2). This, perhaps, is too bold an aſſertion; and yet it muſt be acknowledged, that thoſe who are moſt converſant in geometrical demonſtration are not always the beſt maſters of the logic of probabilities. However, the utility of mathematical learning, in the three general reſpects inſiſted on by Dr. Arbuthnot, cannot juſtly be denied; and its infinite advantages, in the other particulars he hath mentioned, are incontrovertible.

[B] Elected a Fellow of the Royal Society.] Dr. Arbuthnot communicated a paper to the Royal Society, which is printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, (3) and is intitled, of the regularity of the births of both ſexes. Among the innumerable footſteps of divine Providence to be found in the works of nature, he ſays, that there is a very remarkable one to be obſerved in the exact balance that is maintained between the numbers of men and women; for, by this means, it is provided that the ſpecies may never fall away or periſh, ſince every male may have its female and of a proportionable age. This equality of males and females is not the blind effect of chance; but divine Providence works it for a good end. The Doctor proceeds to demonſtrate this, upon the principles of the doctrine of chances, from tables of births from 1629 to 1710. And having thence ſhewn that Providence brings forth more males than females, and that almoſt in a conſtant proportion, he obſerves that this proportion is neceſſary, from the greater deſtruction of males by wars, &c. He is of opinion that this equality in the births has no other probability from phyſics, than that in our firſt parents ſeed there were originally formed an equal number of both ſexes. The ſcholium which he draws from the whole is, that polygamy is contrary to the law of nature, and to the propagation of the human race (4). A farther account of this paper will be found under the article GRAUNT, the latter end of the note B.

(4) Memoirs of the Life of Dr. Arbuthnot, p. 5, 6.

1714, he engaged with Mr. Pope and Dr. Swift in a design of writing a satire on the abuses of human learning in every branch; which was to be executed in the manner of Cervantes (the original author of this species of satire), under the history of some feigned adventures. "They had observed," says the ingenious and learned Editor of Mr. Pope's Works, "those abuses still kept their ground, against all that the gravest and "ablest authors could say to discredit them: They concluded, therefore, the force of "ridicule was wanting to quicken their disgrace; which was here in its place, when the "abuses had already been detected by sober reasoning; and truth in no danger to suffer "by the premature use of so powerful an instrument." But the prosecution of this noble design, at least in a regular way, was prevented by the Queen's death, which exceedingly disconcerted Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot, who were all of them warmly attached to Lord Oxford's ministry; and a final period was afterwards put to the project, by the separation and growing infirmities of Dr. Swift, by the bad health of Dr. Arbuthnot, and other concurring causes. The imperfect Essay which was drawn out towards this design, under the title of the first Book of the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, is sufficient to make us greatly regret that it was not completed. A very pleasant account of the undertaking, and of the share which Dr. Arbuthnot had in it will be found in the note [C]. "Polite letters," adds the celebrated Editor before mentioned, "never lost more, than "in the defeat of this scheme; in the execution of which, each of this illustrious triumvirate would have found exercise for his own peculiar talents; besides constant employment for those they all had in common. Dr. Arbuthnot was skilled in every thing which "related to Science: Mr. Pope was a master in the fine Arts; and Dr. Swift excelled in "the Knowledge of the World. Wit they had all in equal measure; and this so large, "that no age perhaps ever produced three men to whom Nature had more bountifully "bestowed it, or Art had brought it to higher perfection." We are told by the same writer, that the Travels of Gulliver were first intended as a part of Scriblerus's Memoirs (n). Queen Anne's death made so deep an impression upon Dr. Arbuthnot's spirits [D], that, to divert his melancholy, he went to Paris, where a brother of his resided. His stay there, however, was very short; for he returned to London in the beginning of September (o). During this time, he appears to have been in some suspence whether he should be permitted to hold his place at St. James's (p); but being at length told that he was to lose it, he philosophically observed to Dr. Swift, that "he hoped to "be able to keep a little habitation warm in town (q)." Indeed, considering his attachment to former men and measures, it is not surprising that he should be deprived of his

[C] A very pleasant account, &c.] This occurs in a letter to Dr. Swift, which is dated at Kensington, on the 26th of June, 1714. 'Pray remember * Martin, who is an innocent fellow, and will not disturb 'your solitude. The ridicule of medicine is so copious a subject, that I must only here and there touch 'it. I have made him study physic from the apothecary's bills, where there is a good plentiful field 'for a satire upon the present practice. One of his 'projects was, by a stamp upon blistering plaisters 'and melilot by the yard, to raise money for the 'government, and to give it to Ratcliffe and others 'to farm. But there was like to be a petition from 'the inhabitants of London and Westminster, who 'had no mind to be flead. There was a problem 'about the doses of purging medicines published 'four years ago, shewing, that they ought to be in 'proportion to the bulk of the patient. From thence 'Martin endeavours to determine the question about 'the weight of the ancient men, by the doses of 'physic, that were given them. One of his best inventions was a map of diseases for the three cavities 'of the body, and one for the external parts; just 'like the four quarters of the world. Then the great 'diseases are like capital cities, with their symptoms 'all like streets and suburbs, with the roads, that 'lead to other diseases. It is thicker set with towns 'than any Flanders map you ever saw. Ratcliffe 'is painted at the corner of the map, contending for the universal empire of this world, and 'the rest of the physicians opposing his ambitious 'designs, with a project of a treaty of partition to 'settle peace.

'There is an excellent subject of ridicule from 'some of the German physicians, who set up a 'sensitive soul as a sort of a first minister to the rational. 'Helmont calls him Archæus. Dolæus calls him 'Microcosmetor. He has under him several other 'genii, that reside in the particular parts of the 'body, particularly prince Cardimelech in the heart; 'Gasteronax in the stomach; and the plastic prince 'in the organs of generation. I believe I could make 'you laugh at the explication of distempers from the 'wars and alliances of those princes; and how 'the first minister gets the better of his mistress Anima 'Rationalis.

'The best is, that it is making reprisals upon the 'politicians, who are sure to allegorise all the animal 'œconomy into state affairs. Pope has been collecting high flights of poetry, which are very good; they 'are to be solemn nonsense.

'I thought upon the following the other day, 'as I was going into my coach, the dust being 'troublesome,

The dust in smaller particles arose,
Than those, which fluid bodies do compose;
Contraries in extremes do often meet;
'Twas now so dry, that you might call it wet.

'I don't give you these hints to divert you, but 'that you may have your thoughts, and work upon 'them (5).'

[D] Made so deep an impression upon Dr. Arbuthnot's spirits.] His concern for the Queen's death is very apparent, from the manner in which he wrote to Dr. Swift, on the 12th of August, 1714. 'I thank you 'for your kind letter, which is very comfortable 'upon such a melancholy occasion. My dear mistress's days were numbered even in my imagination, 'and could not exceed such certain limits; but of 'that small number a great deal was cut off by the 'last troublesome scene of this contention among 'her servants. I believe sleep was never more welcome to a weary traveller than death was to her: 'only it surprized her too suddenly before she had 'signed her will; which no doubt her being involved in so much business hindered her from 'finishing. It is unfortunate, that she had been 'persuaded, as is supposed by Lowndes, that it was 'necessary to have it under the great seal. I have 'figured to myself all this melancholy scene; and 'even, if it be possible, worse than it has happened 'twenty times; so that I was prepared for it. My 'case is not half so deplorable as poor Lady Masham's and several of the Queen's servants; some of 'whom have no chance for their bread but the generosity of his present Majesty, which several people, 'that know him, very much commend (6).'

ſituation in the royal houſehold; though it might have been to the honour of Government to have ſhewn a peculiar indulgence to a man of ſuch diſtinguiſhed genius and merit. Dr. Arbuthnot, having quitted St. James's, where he appears generally to have lived whilſt he was Phyſician to Queen Anne, took a houſe in Dover-Street (r). Some time after, in conjunction with Mr. Pope, he was engaged in giving aſſiſtance to Mr. Gay in the Comedy, or rather the Farce, of Three Hours after Marriage (s). This Play was brought upon the ſtage in 1717 (t), and was ill received, being damned on the firſt night of its repreſentation (u) [E]. At the Bath ſeaſon, in the latter end of 1722, Dr. Arbuthnot went to that city, apparently for his health, being accompanied by one of his brothers, who was lately come to England, and whoſe ſingular and amiable character is well drawn by Mr. Pope, in a letter to Mr. Digby (w) [F]. On the 30th of September 1723, the Doctor was choſen ſecond Cenſor of the Royal College of Phyſicians (x). In 1725 he was ſeized with a moſt unuſual and dangerous diſtemper, an impoſthume in the bowels; from which he ſpeedily and happily recovered, to the great joy of his friends (y). He publiſhed, in 1727, in quarto, his work, intitled, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Meaſures, explained and exemplified, in ſeveral Diſſertations (z) [G]. In the ſame year, on the th of October, he was made an Elect of the College of Phyſicians; and, on the 18th of that month, he pronounced the Harveian Oration (a). During all this time, he continued the practice of his profeſſion with good reputation; and among other eminent perſons whom he attended in his medical capacity, was the late Earl of Cheſterfield, who was proud to have ſuch a man for his friend, as well as his Phyſician (b). Dr. Arbuthnot was not, however, ſo deeply engaged in buſineſs, but that he could find leiſure to write ſeveral pieces of wit and humour, among which his Epitaph on the infamous Colonel Chartres, which came out in 1731, hath been particularly admired (c) [H]. [E] And was ill received, being damned on the firſt night of its repreſentation.] An account of the bad reception of this comedy is given under the article GAY, note [I]. We ſhall here add, that, very ſoon after, the following ſatirical reflection was caſt upon it, in the prologue to the Sultaneſs, ſpoken by Mr. Wilks.

Such were the wags who boldly did adventure
To club a farce by tripartite indenture;
But let them ſhare their dividend of praiſe,
And wear their own fool's cap inſtead of Bayes.

Theſe lines were afterwards ironically ridiculed, in the pamphlet intitled 'Gulliver decyphered,' which is aſcribed to Dr. Arbuthnot, and inſerted among his miſcellaneous works (7). With regard to the 'Three Hours after Marriage,' it muſt be acknowledged to be unworthy of the great wits by whom it was written: nor is its ill ſucceſs on the ſtage to be wondered at, when we conſider that the ſatire of the principal character was too confined, too extravagant, and, indeed too unintelligible to the generality of mankind, to be reliſhed by the bulk of an auditory. This play has lately been reprinted, in the ſecond volume of the additions to Mr. Pope's works, a publication which, notwithſtanding the ſenſible editor hath ſaid as much as poſſible in its defence, we can by no means applaud. It is injurious to the memory of eminent men, to obtrude upon the world every ſcrap of a letter that may have been written on the moſt trifling occaſions, and to drag to light the occaſional pieces which they themſelves afterwards conſidered as unworthy of them, and which, therefore, they wiſhed to be buried in oblivion.

[F] Whoſe ſingular and amiable character is well drawn by Mr. Pope, in a letter to Mr. Digby.] This letter is dated September the 1ſt, 1722, and is as follows.

'Doctor Arbuthnot is going to Bath, and will ſtay 'there a fortnight or more: perhaps you would be 'comforted to have a ſight of him, whether you need 'him or not. I think him as good a Doctor as any man 'for one that is ill, and a better Doctor for one that is 'well. He would do admirably for Mrs. Mary Digby: 'ſhe needed only to follow his hints, to be in eternal 'buſineſs and amuſement of mind, and even as active 'as ſhe could deſire. But indeed I fear ſhe would out-'walk him; for (as Dean Swift obſerved to me the very 'firſt time I ſaw the Doctor) "He is a man that can do "every thing but walk." His brother, who is lately 'come into England, goes alſo to the Bath; and is a 'more extraordinary man than he, worth your going 'thither on purpoſe to know him. The ſpirit of Phi-'lanthropy, ſo long dead to our world, is revived in 'him: he is a philoſopher all of fire; ſo warmly, nay 'ſo wildly in the right, that he forces all others about 'him to be ſo too, and draws them into his own Vor-'tex. He is a ſtar that looks as if it were all fire, but 'is all benignity, all gentle and beneficial influence. 'If there be other men in the world that would ſerve a 'friend, yet he is the only one, I believe, that could 'make even an enemy ſerve a friend (8).'

[G] Tables of ancient Coins, &c. exemplified in ſeveral diſſertations.] This work, which is held in great reputation, manifeſts the ſolid learning of its author; and he may eaſily be pardoned, if, in ſo arduous an undertaking, it hath been ſhewn that he hath fallen into ſome errors. Several of theſe were obſerved and corrected by Dr. Benjamin Langwith, in a piece publiſhed in 1747, and which was annexed to a ſubſequent edition of the tables, in 1754. In the hiſtory of the works of the learned, a conſiderable miſtake is noted, which is ſaid to have miſled Mr. Spelman, in reducing the Greek to the Engliſh meaſures. The pleaſantneſs of Dr. Arbuthnot's wit diſplays itſelf in this mathematical performance. He obſerves, for inſtance, that the polite Auguſtus Cæſar, the Emperor of the world, had neither any glaſs in his windows, nor yet ſo much as a ſhirt to his back. Theſe uſes of glaſs and linen were at that time unknown. Mr. Perrault had made the ſame remark with regard to linen (9).

Much about the ſame time, he wrote a very entertaining paper, concerning the Altercation or ſcolding of the Ancients (d). In 1732 he had an opportunity of contributing his endeavours towards detecting and puniſhing the ſcandalous frauds, and abuſes which had been carried on, under the ſpecious name of the charitable Corporation (e) [I]. In the ſame year, he publiſhed his treatiſe concerning the 'Nature and Choice of Aliments;' which was followed, in 1733, by his eſſay on 'The Effects of Air on human Bodies.' Nevertheleſs, he adds, with the greateſt piety, "I thank God for a new leſſon of ſubmiſſion to "his will, and likewiſe for what he hath left me (g)." Dr. Arbuthnot is thought to have been led to the medical ſubjects juſt mentioned, by the conſideration of his own caſe. His diſorder was an aſthma, which, having gradually increaſed with his years, became, at length, deſperate and incurable. Under this affliction, he retired, in 1734, with a view of obtaining ſome ſmall relief, to Hampſtead; from whence, in anſwer to a kind enquiry of Mr. Pope, he gave that friend a particular account of his diſtemper, and of his having no expectations of a recovery (h) [L]. 'Francis Chartres, a man infamous for all manner 'of vices. When he was an enſign in the army, he 'was drummed out of the regiment for a cheat; he 'was next baniſhed Bruſſels, and drummed out of 'Ghent on the ſame account. After a hundred tricks 'at the gaming tables, he took to lending of money 'at exorbitant intereſt and on great penalties, accu-'mulating premium, intereſt, and capital into a new 'capital, and ſeizing to a minute when the payments 'became due; in a word, by a conſtant attention to 'the vices, wants, and follies of mankind, he ac-'quired an immenſe fortune. His houſe was a per-'petual Bawdy-houſe. He was twice condemned for 'rapes, and pardoned: but the laſt time not without 'impriſonment in Newgate, and large confiſcations. 'He died in Scotland in 1731, aged 62. The po-'pulace at his funeral raiſed a great riot, almoſt tore 'the body out of the coffin, and caſt dead dogs, etc. 'into the grave along with it (10).' As Colonel Chartres's character was ſingular in every other reſpect, ſo it is ſaid to have been in this, that he was a coward who had his fighting days. He would ſuffer himſelf to be banged and baſketted for refuſing a challenge one day; and on the next day he would accept another, and kill his man (11).

[I] Under the ſpecious name of the charitable corporation.] It is not our purpoſe to enter into the hiſtory of the charitable corporation, which is ſufficiently diſcuſſed in the publications of the times (12). Thompſon, the warehouſeman of that corporation, who was deeply concerned in the frauds of it, and was reputed a Jacobite, fled, under a borrowed name, to Rome; and offered a large ſum of money to the Pretender, which is ſaid to have been rejected with diſdain. Thompſon was thrown into the priſon of St. Angelo, and Belloni, a banker at Rome, ſent an account of this event to the committee of parliament, which was then ſitting upon the affair of the embezzlements of the corporation. On this occaſion, Mr. Arbuthnot, a banker at Paris, and a nonjuror, tranſmitted a letter to his brother the Doctor in London, and another to Sir Robert Sutton, conveying Belloni's letter to the parliamentary committee. Arbuthnot's letters were neither ſigned with his name, nor written with his own hand. That to his brother was as follows.

'Dear Brother,

'The incloſed packet, I believe, will ſurpriſe you. 'I had the orders to get Thompſon arreſted tranſ-'mitted to me by you from Sir Robert Sutton and 'can't ſend the execution of them a better way, than 'to addreſs them to Sir Robert Sutton again. Sup-'poſe Mr. Belloni's letter to the committee will be 'delivered in time, or if the committee is diſſolved, 'you ſee the ſaid letter is addreſſed to him. I hope 'this favour will be of uſe to the ſufferers, and ſo to 'the nation: my intention at leaſt is, that it ſhould 'be ſo. I go in two days to Bourbon; but my ſon 'will convey my letters to me till I come back, 'which will be in about a month or five weeks. My 'Lord Waldgrave is at Compeigne, ſo I could not 'communicate this to his Lordſhip without loſing a 'poſt. I came from Rouen here yeſternight, and 'the poſt goes away early this morning. I can only 'add my love and ſervice to the family, and that I 'am, with great affection,

'Dear Brother,

'Yours (13).

[K] His treatiſe concerning the nature of aliments, the choice of them, &c.] This performance is of greater extent and latitude than is promiſed in the title: for though the Doctor hath profeſſed to treat only concerning particular rules of diet, yet whoever reads the work will find, that in many, if not in moſt diſeaſes, beſides the cauſes and diagnoſtics, he hath often given us the method of cure by medicine as well as diet (14).

'Hampſtead, July 17, 1734.

'I Little doubt of your kind concern for me, nor of 'that of the Lady you mention. I have nothing 'to repay my friends with at preſent, but prayers 'and good wiſhes. I have the ſatisfaction to find 'that I am as officiouſly ſerved by my friends, as he 'that has thouſands to leave in legacies; beſides the 'aſſurance of their ſincerity. God Almighty has 'made my bodily diſtreſs as eaſy as a thing of that 'nature can be. I have found ſome relief, at leaſt 'ſome times, from the air of this place. My nights 'are bad, but many poor creatures have worſe.

'As for you, my good friend, I think, ſince our 'firſt acquaintance, there have not been any of thoſe 'little ſuſpicions or jealouſies that often affect the 'ſincereſt friendſhips; I am ſure not on my ſide. I 'muſt be ſo ſincere as to own, that though I could 'not help valuing you for thoſe talents which the 'world prizes, yet they were not the foundation of my 'friendſhips; they were quite of another ſort; nor 'ſhall I at preſent offend you by enumerating them: 'And I make it my Laſt Requeſt, that you will con-'tinue that Noble Diſdain and Abhorrence of Vice, 'which you ſeem naturally endowed with; but ſtill 'with a due regard to your own ſafety; and ſtudy 'more to reform than chaſtiſe, though the one cannot 'be effected without the other.

'Lord Bathurſt I have always honoured, for every 'good quality that a perſon of his rank ought to have: 'Pray, give my reſpects and kindeſt wiſhes to the fa-'mily. My veniſon ſtomach is gone, but I have thoſe 'about me, and often with me, who will be very glad 'of his preſent. If it is left at my houſe, it will be 'tranſmitted ſafe to me.

piety of his mind [M]. Though he met with a temporary relief at Hampſtead, and eſpecially from riding, yet, being ſenſible that an effectual cure of his diſeaſe was impoſſible, he thought proper to return to his own houſe in Cork-Street, Burlington Gardens, where he departed this life, on the 27th of February 1734-5 (i).

Dr. Arbuthnot appears, in every reſpect, to have been a moſt amiable and worthy man; and the juſtneſs of the following account of him, which comes from the ingenious pen of Lord Orrery, will be acknowledged by all who are acquainted with the Doctor's life and writings. His Lordſhip, ſpeaking of that part of Swift's epiſtolary correſpondence which only was then publiſhed, adds, "I ſhould have been much pleaſed in finding ſome of Dr. "Arbuthnot's letters among this collection. Although he was juſtly celebrated for wit and "learning, there was an excellence in his character more amiable than all his other qualifi-"cations: I mean the excellence of his heart. He has ſhewn himſelf equal to any of his con-"temporaries in humour and vivacity; and he was ſuperior to moſt men in acts of huma-"nity and benevolence. His very ſarcaſms are the ſatyrical ſtrokes of good nature: They "are like ſlaps in the face given in jeſt, the effects of which may raiſe bluſhes, but no black-"neſs will appear after the blows. He laughs as jovially as an attendant upon Bacchus, "but continues as ſober and conſiderate as a diſciple of Socrates. He is ſeldom ſerious, "except in his attacks upon vice; and then his ſpirit riſes with a manly ſtrength, and a "noble indignation. His epitaph upon Chartres (allowing one ſmall alteration, the "word permitted, inſtead of connived at) is a complete, and a maſterly compoſition in its "kind. No man exceeded him in the moral duties of life: a merit ſtill more to his "honour, as the ambitious powers of wit and genius are ſeldom ſubmiſſive enough to con-"fine themſelves within the limitations of morality. In his letter to Mr. Pope (k), writ-"ten, as it were, upon his death-bed, he diſcovers ſuch a noble fortitude of mind at "the approach of his diſſolution, as could be inſpired only by a clear conſcience, and "the calm retroſpect of an uninterrupted ſeries of virtue. The DEAN laments the loſs "of him with a pathetic ſincerity. The deaths of Mr. Gay, and the Doctor (l), ſays he "to Mr. Pope, have been terrible wounds near my heart. Their living would have been a "great comfort to me, although I ſhould never have ſeen them: like a ſum of money in a "bank, from which I ſhould receive at leaſt annual intereſt, as I do from you, and have done "from Lord Bolingbroke (m)." This teſtimony of Lord Orrery's, to the merit of Dr. Arbuthnot, is confirmed by that of Mr. Pope, who uſed to repreſent his morals as equal to any man's, and his wit and humour as ſuperior to that of all mankind. So prolific was his wit, that in this quality Swift only held the ſecond place *. No adventure of any conſequence ever occurred, on which the Doctor did not write a pleaſant eſſay, in a great folio book, which uſed to lie in his parlour. Of theſe, however, he was ſo negligent, that while he was writing them at one end, he ſuffered his children to tear them out at the other, for their paper kites (n). We learn, from Mr. George Arbuthnot, that his father ſeldom related any thing of himſelf or his writings; which he neglected ſo much when finiſhed, that he was ſometimes at a loſs to find them. The integrity of his character is well expreſſed in a letter to Dr. Swift: "I have not ſeen any thing as yet, to make "me recant a certain inconvenient opinion I have, that one cannot pay too dear for peace "of mind (o)." Dr. Arbuthnot always made it a point to ſtand up for the honour of

[M] The Reſignation, Calmneſs, and Piety of his mind.]

'My Dear and worthy Friend,

'YOU have no reaſon to put me amongſt the reſt 'of your forgetful friends; for I wrote two long 'letters to you, to which I never received one word 'of anſwer. The firſt was about your health; the laſt 'I ſent a great while ago, by one De la Mar. I can 'aſſure you, with great truth, that none of your 'friends or acquaintance has a more warm heart to-'wards you than myſelf. I am going out of this 'troubleſome world, and you, amongſt the reſt 'of my friends, ſhall have my laſt prayers, and good 'wiſhes.

'The young man whom you recommended came 'to this place, and I promiſed to do him what ſer-'vice my ill ſtate of health would permit. I came out 'to this place ſo reduced by a dropſy, and an aſthma, 'that I could neither ſleep, breathe, eat, or move. 'I moſt carneſtly deſired and begged of God, that he 'would take me. Contrary to my expectation, upon 'venturing to ride (which I had forborn for ſome 'years, becauſe of bloody water), I recovered my 'ſtrength to a pretty conſiderable degree, ſlept, and 'had my ſtomach again; but I expect the return of 'my ſymptoms upon my return to London, and the 'return of the winter. I am not in circumſtances to 'live an idle country life; and no man, at my age, 'ever recovered of ſuch a diſeaſe further than by an 'abatement of the ſymptoms. What I did, I can 'aſſure you, was not for life, but eaſe. For I am, 'at preſent, in the caſe of a man that was almoſt in 'harbour, and then blown back to ſea; who has a 'reaſonable hope of going to a good place, and an 'abſolute certainty of leaving a very bad one. Not 'that I have any particular diſguſt at the world; for 'I have as great comfort in my own family, and from 'the kindneſs of my friends, as any man; but the 'world, in the main, diſpleaſeth me; and I have 'too true a preſentiment of calamities that are like 'to befal my country. However, if I ſhould have 'the happineſs to ſee you before I die, you will find 'that I enjoy the comforts of life with my uſual 'chearfulneſs. I cannot imagine why you are fright-'ed from a journey to England! the reaſons you 'aſſign, I am ſure, are not ſufficient; the journey I 'am ſure will do you good. In general, I recommend 'riding, of which I have always had a good opinion, 'and can now confirm it from my own experience.

'My family give you their love and ſervice. The 'great loſs I ſuſtained in one of them, gave me my 'firſt ſhock; and the trouble I have with the reſt, 'to bring them to a good temper, to bear the loſs of 'a father, who loves them, and whom they love, is 'really a moſt ſenſible affliction to me. I am afraid, 'my dear friend, we ſhall never ſee one another 'more in this world. I ſhall, to the laſt moment, 'preſerve my love and eſteem for you, being well aſ-'ſured you will never leave the paths of virtue and 'honour for all that is in the world. This world is 'not worth the leaſt deviation from that way. It 'will be great pleaſure to me to hear from you ſome-'times; for none can be with more ſincerity than I 'am, my dear friend, your moſt faithful friend and 'humble ſervant, religion. We are told, that he was often with Lord Chesterfield in a morning, and more than once declared himself, in his Lordship's presence, a patron of Christianity (p). But the Doctor's zeal and steadiness in this respect will best appear from one of his own letters. "My neighbour, the Proseman, is wiser, and more cowardly and despairing than "ever. He talks me into a fit of vapours twice or thrice a week. I dream at night of "a chain, and rowing in the gallies. But, thank God, he has not taken from me the "freedom I have been accustomed to in my discourse (even with the greatest persons to "whom I have access), in defending the cause of Liberty, Virtue, and Religion. For "the last, I have the satisfaction of suffering some share of the ignominy that belonged "to the first confessors. This has been my lot, from a steady resolution I have taken "of giving these ignorant impudent fellows battle upon all occasions (q)." There is nothing which more distinguishes Dr. Arbuthnot's character, than the chearfulness of his temper. In a letter written to Dr. Swift, in 1723, he says, "As for your humble ser-"vant, with a great stone in his right kidney, and a family of men and women to provide "for, he is as chearful as ever in public affairs (r)." It was not to public affairs only that this disposition was confined: for it evidently appears to have accompanied him in every situation, and under every affliction of life; a circumstance which we the rather take notice of, as a reflection to the disadvantage of it hath been thrown out by a late writer [N]. Upon the whole, we may conclude, after the most impartial survey of Dr. Arbuthnot's character, that his memory is intitled to distinguished honour, as a man of wit, a man of science and literature, and a man of religion and virtue. In saying this, we do not mean to assert, that we entirely approve, in every instance, of his choice of the objects against which his humour and satire were directed. In some of his political principles we greatly differ from him; and we think that cases might be mentioned, in which his ridicule was too severely pointed at men of real abilities and merit. The Doctor is said, but at what [N] As a reflection to the disadvantage of it hath been thrown out by a late writer.] Mr. Pulteney, in a letter to Dr. Swift, giving an account of Dr. Arbuthnot's death, says; 'he lived the last six months 'in a bad state of health, and hoping every night 'would be his last; not that he endured any bodily 'pain, but as he was quite weary of the world, and 'tired with so much bad company:' upon which Dr. Hawkesworth hath observed, that 'this, ad-'mitting the fact, is very remarkable of a man of 'Arbuthnot's turn; a man of humour, whose mind 'seemed to be always pregnant with comic ideas, 'and turned chiefly, if not only, to that which is 'ridiculous even in vice itself. That to such a man, 'to whose fancy almost every character and every 'event furnished a comedy, death should be welcome 'because life was insipid, is a melancholy and strik-'ing proof, that even in laughter the heart is sorrow-'ful; or that those who are best qualified to make 'others merry, are not always merry themselves; 'that their mirth is not an effusion of hilarity that 'overflows their own breasts, but often the mere 'effect of a painful effort, exerted chiefly for the 'gratification of vanity, the said concomitant of 'vexation of spirit. See the Doctor's own account 'of himself (which seems not perfectly to agree with 'what is here said of him) in his letter, dated Octo-'ber 4th, 1734 (17).' As Dr. Hawkesworth was sensible that Mr. Pulteney's representation was inconsistent with Dr. Arbuthnot's own letter, he should have spared his gloomy and groundless reflections. Mr. Pulteney's expressions might be thrown out pretty much at random, and there is evidently a sarcastic turn in them, arising from the political altercations of the times. Dr. Arbuthnot's habitual and real chearfulness of temper is apparent from the whole tenor of his life and writings: and it is evident, in particular, from the letter just referred to, which is inserted at length in the preceding note. He does, indeed, there say, 'that the world, in the main, dis-'pleaseth him;' which any man might well say, who, like him, laboured under an incurable disorder, was dissatisfied with the prospect of public affairs, and had a conscious hope that death would remove him to a state of superior blessedness. Nevertheless, in the very same sentence of that letter, he declares, that he had not any particular disgust at the world; and that he had as great comfort in his own family, and from the kindness of his friends, as any man. He likewise adds, (to Dr. Swift) 'If I should have 'the happiness to see you before I die you will find 'that I enjoy the comforts of life with my usual 'chearfulness (18).' This turn of mind in Dr. Arbuthnot, is strongly marked in two lines of Swift, in the poem upon his own death.

Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay

(19) Swift's Works, Vol. vi. p. 255.

The view which is here given of the different degrees of sensibility in these three eminent wits, may be thought, perhaps, to derogate something from the honour of Dr. Arbuthnot, and to intimate that he was greatly inferior to Pope and Gay, in the strength of his friendship, and the feelings of his heart. But such a conclusion would by no means be a just one. As to the strength of Dr. Arbuthnot's friendship for Dr. Swift, nothing can be more indubitable. It appears to have continued, with unabated fervency, from the beginning of his intimacy with the Dean, to the end of his life. In a letter written to Dr. Swift, so early as in the year 1714, he thus expresses himself: 'Dear friend, the last sentence of 'your letter quite kills me. Never repeat that me-'lancholy tender word, that you will endeavour to 'forget me. I am sure I never can forget you, till 'I meet with (what is impossible) another, whose 'conversation I can so much delight in as Dr. Swift's; 'and yet that is the smallest thing I ought to value 'you for. That hearty sincere friendship, that plain 'and open ingenuity in all your commerce, is what 'I am sure I never can find in another man. I shall 'want often a faithful monitor, one that would vin-'dicate me behind my back, and tell me my faults 'to my face. God knows I write this with tears in 'my eyes (20).' Above twenty years after, in the near prospect of his dissolution, he uses a like warmth of language, as may be seen in the letter before referred to, in the note [M]; so that nothing can be more clearly proved than the sensibility of his mind, as well as the strength of his friendship. All, therefore, which can justly be inferred from the lines above quoted is, that Dr. Swift intended to mark the chearful disposition of Dr. Arbuthnot: and, with such a disposition, although he might deeply feel the death of his friend, he would soon return to his usual vivacity. Nor is this a reflection upon him. Such a temper may well consist, as in Dr. Arbuthnot it manifestly did, with the sincerest benevolence and humanity. It may be accompanied with the warmest heart: and where that is the case, it is a very desirable disposition. It possesses the ardour and activity of friendship, and yet is favourable to the happiness of life; while a more splenetic turn of mind adds a double anguish to the distresses that befal us. Considering the calamities to which we are unavoidably subject, it is of great importance to cultivate and to maintain a chearfulness of spirit, joined with sensibility, and with the exercise of every friendly, generous, and sympathizing affection. Happy are those who, like Dr. Arbuthnot, seem by nature formed for an union of these delightful and amiable qualities, particular period we are not informed, to have been ſome time Steward to the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy (s). He was a married man, and, beſides other children, had two ſons, George and Charles; the latter of whom was educated at Chriſt Church College, Oxford, and entered into holy orders [O]. Two daughters ſurvived him, who are ſince dead, unmarried. George, who is ſtill living, is firſt Secondary in the Remembrance-office, a place of very conſiderable profit. He is poſſeſſed of an ample fortune beſides, and is a a gentleman of known and acknowledged worth and character. Dr. Arbuthnot ſhared the ſame fate with his friends Pope and Swift, in having ſeveral literary brats illegitimately fathered upon him; and among the reſt, the famous Romance of Robinſon Cruſoe (t). There came out, in 1751, in two volumes 12*mo*, The Miſcellaneous Works of the late Dr. Arbuthnot; to which is prefixed the following advertiſement: "The contents of theſe volumes, and what "is inſerted in Swift's Miſcellanies, comprehend all the pieces of wit and humour of "this admirable author." Although this collection, which hath gone through various editions, undoubtedly contains ſome of his genuine productions; yet every reader of taſte and diſcernment will eaſily perceive, that many, if not moſt of the tracts here aſcribed to him, cannot have proceeded from his excellent pen: and George Arbuthnot, Eſq; upon the peruſal of them, hath teſtified, that the greateſt part of them were not written by his father [P].]

[O] And entered into holy orders.] He was a ſtudent of Chriſt Church, and took the degree of A. M. on the 26th of June, 1731. Before this he had had the misfortune of engaging in a duel with one Mr. Ferrabee of the ſame college. The cauſe of the quarrel was a jealouſy in a love affair; and Mr. Charles Arbuthnot received a wound, in conſequence of which he lay for ſome time in a languiſhing condition. Though his antagoniſt was the aggreſſor, it was with difficulty that he could get into orders, or obtain his degree. He was the author of a copy of verſes, addreſſed to the King, and prefixed to the firſt edition of his father's Tables of Coins, Weights, &c. The verſes, which are written with a good ſpirit of poetry, ſeem to have been inſerted as a teſtimony of the ſon's loyalty; for they have little or no particular relation to the ſubject of Dr. Arbuthnot's work (21).

(21) Supplement, ubi ſupra, p. 6. note [M].

[P] That the greateſt part of them were not written by his father.] We have already mentioned the examination of Dr. Woodward's account of the Deluge, the Eſſay on Mathematical Learning, the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, the Tables of antient Coins, Weights, and Meaſures, his brief Account of Mr. John Ginglicutt's treatiſe concerning the Altercation or Scolding of the Ancients, and his two books upon Aliments and Air, as among Dr. Arbuthnot's genuine productions. We ſhall here add his Hiſtory of John Bull, in two parts, an admirable piece of wit and humour, whatever may be thought of it in a political view. The feeble imitations of this performance, which have appeared from time to time in the public papers, have only ſerved to diſplay its ſuperior excellency.

It is uſually publiſhed in Swift's works (22), and is followed by four other witty pieces, compoſed by the Doctor. Theſe are, 'The Art of Political Lying.' 'Reaſons offered by the Company of Upholders againſt Part of the Bill for viewing and examining Drugs and Medicines;' 'The Petition of the Colliers, Cooks, Blackſmiths, &c. againſt catoptrical Victuallers;' and 'It cannot Rain but it Pours: or London ſtrewed with Rarities.' Dr. Arbuthnot was the author, likewiſe, in conjunction with Mr. Pope, of 'Martinus Scriblerus περὶ βαθους; or his Treatiſe on the Art of Sinking in Poetry;' and of 'M. Scribleri Virgilius reſtauratus;' both which productions are probably parts of the great intended ſatire on the abuſes of human learning (23). He might have aſſiſted in other writings; but it is not now eaſy or neceſſary to diſtinguiſh every little inſtance in which his pen was employed, whether in connection with his great friends Pope and Swift, or upon different occaſions. In the two volumes of miſcellaneous works aſcribed to him, beſides the examination of Woodward, the eſſay on the mathematics, and the paper on the altercation of the ancients, we ſhould imagine that 'Gulliver decyphered,' and the 'critical Remarks on Capt. Gulliver's Travels,' came from Dr. Arbuthnot. Whether he wrote, 'The Notes and Memorandums of the ſix Days preceding the Death of a late Right Rev. ——,' and 'The Hiſtory of John Bull, part the 3d,' ſeems to be ſtill more uncertain; though they may not, perhaps, be deemed unworthy of him. It is ſtrange that ſome of the tracts inſerted in the collection ſhould ever have been thought to be the Doctor's. Where the ſubject admits of it, we uſually find a learning in his wit, and a wit ariſing from his learning, which are very diſtinguiſhable. The letter to Dean Swift, in the ſecond volume, occaſioned by his Dedication to a Great Man, concerning dedications, was written by Mr. Gordon (24). Among ſome pieces added to the late editions, are 'The Freeholder's political Catechiſm,' and 'ΓΝΩΘΙ ΣΕΑΥΤΟΝ, Know yourſelf, a poem.' The Political Catechiſm is an excellent performance, which hath lately been ſeparately republiſhed; but we know not of any reaſon for ſuppoſing it to be Dr. Arbuthnot's. The poem, which is of a philoſophical nature, and is printed in Dodſley's Miſcellanies (25), was undoubtedly our author's. We have been favoured with ſome verſes made by him in his laſt illneſs, which may be acceptable, as a farther indication of the pious diſpoſition of his mind. They were written before a book of Tables of Annuities.

How nicely we compute in every caſe
When death brings in the pence, or ends the leaſe!
Then reckoning wrong, and by falſe hopes allur'd,
We leave our laſt reverſion uninſur'd.
By different rules, we count our life and gains;
Too ſmall what's ſpent, too bulky what remains.
The Devil inſur'd our lives before the fall;
Told mother Eve ſhe ſhould not die at all.
This lye, too coarſe now for the dulleſt clown,
He ſoftens thus, Thou ſhalt not die ſo ſoon.
O fatal term of infinite amount,
Not leſſen'd or compounded by diſcount!
In thee are endleſs loſs or gain compriz'd,
Sure, yet unheeded, and, though great, deſpis'd.
The rich and poor their worldly comforts ſhare
In lots unequal, but with equal care.
The poor man's cares, like briers in barren ſoil,
Spontaneous ſpring, without manure or toil.
The rich with pains their cares or plant or ſow,
Which in a garden mould luxuriant grow.

Dr. Arbuthnot was ſkilled in muſic. Sir John Hawkins mentions an anthem compoſed by him; and the ſame author hath publiſhed a burleſque parody, ſaid to be made by the Doctor, upon a ſong of Mr. Pope's; which ſong was written at the earneſt requeſt of the Earl of Peterborough, for Signora Cuzzoni, on her leaving England (26).
